"Set him down,he's always wanting something nobody else ever thought of or heard of. Thinks he will run things, take 'em right out of our hands and I am sick of it," said Mr. Precedent in a whisper to some of his friends. He was the "has been" type of man, true to his name.

Mr. Reiley proposed that the seventy-five adult members of the congregation make a personal offering for two years, fifty to pay two dollars each and twenty-five to each pay one dollar. In less time than it takes to tell it there was a chorus of no's from Mr. Precedent's set.

"I am not going to pay no two dollars when somebody else pays only one," said Precedent.

Mr. Reiley continued after the interruption. "I believe there are twenty-five ladies who could be counted on to help. I think they would count it a pleasant time to each earn a dollar in some novel way, thus really making it only one dollar from their liege lords. The reason why I counted twenty-five members at one dollar each is because I have thought this matter over often and observed that they are not more than half as well off financially as the fifty. I believe in equality, brethren, but let each one decide for himself. Any plan at all to suit the majority will suit me. Let's do something. Present whatever plan is adopted to the congregation and get rid of this mortgage. I think the idea will suit the congregation. Twenty-five dollars every year for interest is wasting the Lord's money, not in riotous living perhaps, but uselessly, to say the least. We had better pay the twenty-five dollars to missions; to paint and paper; to the pastor's library. If it must be that such a sum has to be raised every year let us give it to some one of these purposes."

A burning match could not fire a haystack quicker than "missions" and pastor's needs did some of Precedent's set. Not a fire of enthusiasm for missions or in behalf of pastor; far from that.

Felix Rathburn jumped to his feet in a moment. "You have all heard me talk. There are men in the local congregation who should do the preaching. The Scriptures plainly teach this. A pastor is a more useless expense than interest money. I like Mr. Clemons as a brother and fellow-worker but it was through no wish of mine, or vote either, that he came here as a pastor."

Rathburn made his customary long speech on the subject. Even his best friends thought he rode this hobby because he regarded himself as the "qualified member of the local body" to do the preaching. As to whether such a qualified member should be supported by the congregation the same as a pastor ought to be, he had never said, but on this occasion he was quite explicit. As to how Mr. Qualified Member would get his living we will leave the reader to learn from the Rathburnites themselves. Quite likely work six days at the carpenter trade and preach one day. Salvation is free.

Mr. Rathburn hardly sat down before Major Meinor began talking vehemently against missions. He was a home mission man when foreign missions was presented. Home mission time found him an anti. On this occasion he said, "We're missioned to death. The last few years it has been nothing but missions, missions, missions. This talk about sending twenty-five dollars to missions don't meet my approval. Foreign missions—not at all! Presbyterians coming to us had better leave their Presbyterianism behind them. We are for Christian union! I suppose some folks would still be Presbyterians if they had been let run things there."

At this juncture Mr. Morgan, the chairman, said, "We have now been here an hour and a half. It is growing late."

Mr. Reiley knew no definite action had been taken. They must first see a way to pay it. Trying to arouse an interest in the matter by proposing feasible plans was his object. He would rather raise the whole amount at once by popular subscription. He thought he would bring the meeting to some conclusion.

"Brethren, I dislike to make a motion to adopt a plan I proposed myself, not that I object to the plan, but I am going to do so to-night."

The motion was lost by one vote. There was great glee among Precedent's set. Rathburn and Meinor were glad they had scored a point and saved the day. Mr. Reiley did not stay long to chat after adjournment, but shook hands around and went home.

A friendly brother whose home was in the same direction referred to Major Meinor's slur and Mr. Reiley said, "My wife and I were very sincere when we left our old church in which we had been reared and cast our lot with you people. We conscientiously believed that every true lover of the Lord should preach Christian union and be where he could consistently do so. That I tried to 'run things' in the Presbyterian Church is not true and was said as a slur upon my motives by some Presbyterians simply because we left them. Those very people would gladly welcome us back. Mr. Meinor simply used the cudgel of an enemy and does not illustrate the Christian union spirit himself. My wife and I have had occasion to ponder over many things. We are very active but do not wish to be in any one's way."

The kind-hearted Mr. Steele said, "My dear Reiley, I know how you feel. One of the hardest things for persons coming from the sects to get over is the lack of this spirit in the practical work of the church. It is true that there is a deficiency of Christian spirit in all churches, both in pulpit and pew, indeed that is what hinders the gospel, but other bodies are not calling for the union of Christendom, and more is expected of us, as ought to be, naturally. Forty years ago I was a devoted Methodist, but, like you, I welcomed the sweet plea to my heart as sincerely. I had some bitter experiences. I was a young man then and wanted the whole world to accept the plea. I had the 'Methodist zeal,' which is, by the way, a good thing, and I was willing to serve anywhere. Everything was very different. I tried to adapt myself to the changes as you have. I will not tell you now of my trials. One old sister consoled me as I hope to console you. She said: 'Henry, the idler never has any trouble. Others bear his burdens.' The soldier with scars and wounds was in active service. Action encounters obstruction. Take courage and thank God you are not at ease in Zion."

Dear Father Steele did not know how much he helped Reiley. Meinor's sting was gone. But still on other matters Reiley was heartsick, courageous man though he was. Such board meetings were chronic affairs. His wife asked him if he was ill. "Yes, almost ill-natured." Then he told her of the meeting.

"It grieves me to see such wasted time and talent. I feel more distressed at not being understood at all than if I had simply been misunderstood."

"Well, Preston, there never was any wasted time if used in the Lord's name," was his wife's gentle reply.

"Yes, yes," said Preston Reiley "but that isn't what I meant by wasted time and talent."

In the morning Reiley went out to milk as usual. When he had about finished, "Cherry" kicked the bucket over and ran across the yard fairly snorting.

She knew she had done mischievously, and as she stood over there in the corner puffing, she looked back at her bad work. Mr. Reiley stood motionless for a moment or two in amazement. "Cherry" had done just such a trick often but not lately, and he thought she had quit her meanness, so while milking his mind was occupied with that "board meeting." He picked up the bucket and smiled and smiled as he walked to the house, saying to himself, "I have those fellows now."

Mrs. Reiley saw this barnyard performance and did not appreciate those smiles. She said, "If you had promised to make the ice cream for the society at Mrs. Hart's this afternoon you wouldn't feel like smiling. It was through my advice that Cherry quit kicking the bucket over. I told you to always punish her whenever she did it with that barrel stave there in the corner by the barn. Not beat her but punish her. She knew enough to quit it and it has been a long time since she did this. You ought to have punished her this morning instead of standing there riveted to the ground."

Reiley laughed mischievously at this and said he wished she would take his place in the "board meetings" if she could get an old cow to do right and quit her meanness. Then he told why he was so amused, and went off to his work.

He said to himself, "That's my story. I am going to tell it to each one of them if I have to make a social call at each place." Just before he reached the blacksmith shop he met Mr. Precedent. The usual greetings were exchanged. Mr. Precedent always liked Reiley, and said, "Hello, Reiley" as if he was glad to see him. It did not occur to him that it was the least bit modern to say "hello," or that Reiley was gracious to him after so much personality. The objection he had to Reiley was that "when he moved here he got in with the wrong set in the church. He made a mistake in that which I hope he will some time see. Maybe he learned a lesson last night," thought Precedent. He looked at him and talked in a sort of how-do-you-feel-now style.

In a very short time Reiley said, "I had a funny experience this morning. The cow kicked over a bucket of milk."

"You are the first man I ever heard call that kind of luck a funny experience," Precedent quickly said. He was satisfied now that Reiley had learned his lesson and wished to avoid the subject.

"It was funny to me in this way," said Reiley. "We call our cow 'Cherry'; she's a good one, not the best in the world perhaps; she gives a big mess of milk, not the best milk in the world probably, but it is better than none, so we like her. When she blazed away and kicked over that bucket of milk and ran off, she left nothing but an empty bucket," here Reiley laughed a long laugh.

Precedent looked at him as if he thought him silly and said with the spirit of advice and caution, "When I was a young man of your age a thing like that would have made me mad and I don't see anything in it now to laugh at."

"It was just like this," said Reiley, eyeing Precedent closely, "you can present an idea or proposition that may not be the best in the world, but better than none at all, only to see a brighter and older man than yourself kick it overboard, talk a blue streak about something else and leave nothing more than an empty experience—an empty bucket."

Mr. Precedent winced. A "brighter and older man" like himself getting a sharp prod like that did not suit very well. He knew that he was brighter and older, therefore his pride recoiled all the more at such a comparison.

"I intended making a social call on you to-night just to tell my funny experience this morning, my cow story, but since I have met you I will postpone my call," said Reiley, starting on.

"Oh, come anyway, I want to talk with you," said Precedent.

"Well, maybe I will, but I must go to work," and Reiley was soon at his accustomed place in the blacksmith shop.

Mr. Precedent thought of Reiley's story all the time. "Did he mean that I had no more reason than a cow? I believe he manufactured that story out of whole cloth, no sane man would call such an experience funny. It's a fact that the subject presented was not discussed at all by some of us, but that's Morgan's fault. He's a poor chairman, too slow and easy. I remember though once he tried to bring us to time, make us stick to the subject, and we wouldn't be bossed, and soon told him so." Precedent would not let these thoughts and acknowledgments escape intentionally.

At noon just when Reiley was ready to go to dinner Major Meinor came with a plow and wanted it sharpened right away if possible. Reiley was glad of the opportunity. No one would interfere. The Major was surprised at Reiley's ready acquiescence, not that he was an unobliging person, but that he was not more like himself. If Meinor had been in Reiley's place in that meeting he would have been unsociable for a month and complained to every listening ear. Reiley's was the only shop in town and he certainly could have been unkind.

It was not long until the plow was ready, then Reiley told his story. It did not hit the Major as easily as it did Precedent. He was duller of comprehension. When Reiley asked him why he was in favor of continuing the mortgage he said he was in favor of paying it and would help to do so, but before he drove away he gave Reiley a scoring "against missions."

"Well, Major, my idea of missions is that it is sending the gospel to the unevangelized wherever such persons may be. If we consume everything upon ourselves we had better get a John Chinaman wall around us and make no pretensions to taking the Lord at his word. If that's Presbyterianism I am not ashamed of it. But in saying this I had better save my breath to cool my soup," said the blacksmith.

Mr. Reiley hurried home to dinner, feeling both pleased and displeased. Maybe he had said too much. The Major resolved over and over again to help lift that mortgage, but he did not like something, hardly knew just what, if he did feel a little softhearted toward Reiley for taking part of his nooning to sharpen the plow. He could excuse him for the rejoinder in behalf of his former church, if it was wrong.

Mrs. Reiley told what she thought was the serious side of the milk story to several of her neighbors who helped her out of the ice cream dilemma.

It was not very long after the ladies had assembled that Mrs. Jennie Rathburn very directly asked Mrs. Reiley to tell the ladies how she was going to earn her dollar to pay the mortgage off the parsonage.

Mrs. Reiley was astonished and still more so when told that her husband had stated at the board meeting that "twenty-five ladies were going to each earn a dollar in a novel way to pay off the parsonage mortgage."

She said her husband had spoken of the meeting but had told her nothing of the kind, at which there was a titter, one lady remarking, "Just as I expected!"

Essie Dawson was the only girl in the society and she was present on this occasion. She immediately noticed the unkind manner toward Mrs. Reiley and said to Mrs. Rathburn, "I would be glad to earn a dollar to lift the mortgage. If we all would lend a hand the thing would soon be done. I think it is likely that Mr. Reiley has been misquoted."

Mrs. Rathburn did not like any one that even thought differently from her and she was more jealous of a younger sister than of those of her own age. Her fashion with the young ladies was to annihilate them with a look which she imagined produced the desired effect. Eyeing them with such feelings of superiority never occurred to her as very bad manners that simply created prejudice against herself. When the criminal is before his victim he tries the cold, scrutinizing eye on him to produce fear and weakness and his success is not due to any superior grace. Mrs. Rathburn had never viewed this habit of hers from any standpoint at all, only "just to wither 'em."

When she tried to annihilate Essie with that look she missed it, for Essie, knowing her fashion well, simply glanced at Mrs. Hart as if to say, "What do you think?"

Mrs. Hart, awake to the situation, quickly replied, "When this society's only girl is so willing to do a good deed like that I should feel ashamed of my example as an older member not to do as much."

One after another fell in line until every one present was in favor of such an endeavor except Mrs. Rathburn, who was very much occupied with her corner of the quilt, so much so that you would suppose she was oblivious of her surroundings.

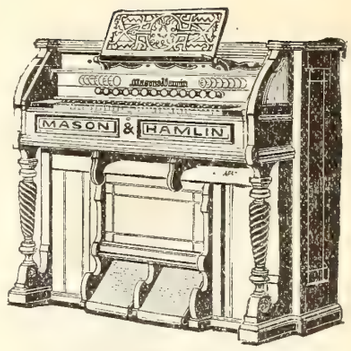
Mrs. Meinor and Mrs. Precedent were not present. Mrs. Meinor would likely respond, the ladies all said, but they were silent as to Mrs. Precedent. She was opposed to societies of any kind. Nothing in the Bible about them.

On her way home Essie stopped at Mrs. Precedent's and told the parsonage story. It met a cool reception. Mrs. Precedent was glad to hear the news, but she would never let you know it. She told her husband all about it and he told her his morning's experience with Preston Reiley and said, "I have made up my mind that no person shall set an example for me—James Fennimore Precedent."

At church Lord's day morning Mr. Precedent told Mr. Morgan to call a meeting of the board up there in the corner immediately after service. It met.

Mr. Precedent addressed the chair and the brethren: "I have been thinking that mortgage ought to be paid and the morning sermon has settled me on that point entirely. Mr. Clemons talked about being as honest and earnest in the Lord's business as in your own. I make the motion that a committee be appointed to see every member of the church for an offering."

Mr. Reiley arose to second the motion but Messrs. Rathburn and Meinor shouted it without addressing the chair. Mr. Morgan appointed the committee, naming Preston Reiley first, then one from each of the "sets."



Mr. Precedent again: "Mr. Chairman and brethren, our friend Reiley here is a hard-working man; hasn't the leisure time I have and I am willing to serve in his place. I think he ought to be excused."

Reiley nodded approvingly at him although he and others saw the funny point.

The board adjourned. Going out at the door Reiley said, "Bro. Precedent, I'll just make and pay my pledge now, save you time and trouble coming to see me," and he handed him ten dollars. This did not suit Precedent for that was just what he was going to give himself, but he would fix it on the list all right.

At home he took a big sheet of fool's cap and headed it James Fennimore Precedent, ten dollars; Mary Ann Precedent, one dollar.

He saw Meinor and Rathburn and they pledged two dollars, which reminded him of Reiley's first proposition, but he brushed it to one side as you would a cobweb.

He saw quite a number who pledged very liberally for their circumstances but none of them gave ten dollars and in their estimation no one had or would but Mr. Precedent. He met Essie, secretary of the L. A. S., and she told him that the society would pay twenty-five dollars.

"I wasn't asking the society for anything, just yourself," said Mr. Precedent.

"I know that," said Essie, "but my dollar goes in that fund."

Mr. Precedent went on. "To think that concern is to do more than twice what I do! I never did have any use for sewing societies of any kind."

At home he looked over his list and counted one hundred and fifty dollars. He had not put down Reiley's offering nor that of the society, but he intended to do so later. He thought he would investigate that society's offering. Prejudice made him sceptical and his pride fairly bolstered it up. He went to see Mrs. Hart (folks in the "other set") and she told the same story as Essie, who would belong to no "set."

Not being satisfied he went to see Mrs. Rathburn, whom he knew to think thoughts quite similar to his own on such concerns. She did not wish to say positively—"Mrs. Meinor would know, for she took more interest in such affairs."

So Mrs. Meinor was next interviewed. "Yes, it's true and that's where my dollar goes. I wasn't present on the day the ladies agreed to do it, but several who were told me about it. Mrs. Rathburn was there."

"Well, how is this? I have you and your husband down for two dollars already. Do you intend to pay two dollars yourself?"

"That's Mr. Meinor's pledge and he will pay it. I have already earned and paid my dollar."

Mr. Precedent trudged homeward. "I am tired to death; if this is gadding around and not work I'll take the work. No wonder those sewing society women call gadding work. I never saw it before. If the rest of this committee have done as well as I have we already have the money in sight."

The rest of the committee had ninety-five dollars. A number gave without being solicited and a number who merely attended the church. Adding Precedent's list of one hundred and eighty-five dollars they had two hundred and eighty dollars.

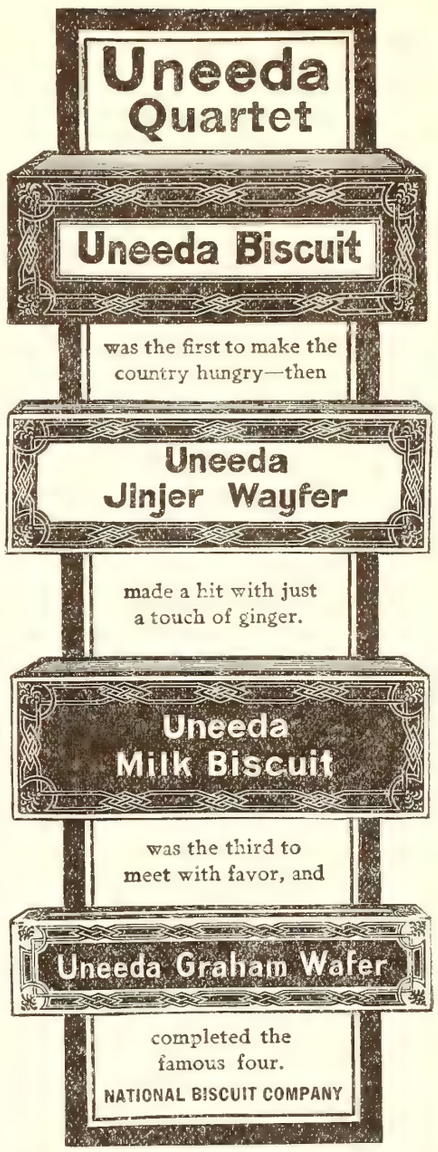
The first Lord's day in October Mr. Morgan announced the results. The society had decided that if their offering was not needed they would use fifteen dollars in paint and paper at the parsonage and make Bro. and Sister Clemons a present of the ten dollars. They had not been remembered any way since coming here. Mr. Morgan wanted to know what to do with the remaining V. Put it in the treasury, use it for a thank offering or what?

Preston Reiley made a motion that it be sent to the missionary convention then in session, as a thank offering. It carried with great enthusiasm.

Messrs. Precedent, Rathburn and Meinor did not like it but the enthusiasm was too much for them, so they kept still, resolving next time to make all motions. The future history of these gentlemen would show, however, that they repeatedly broke bad resolves.

Mrs. Rathburn was overheard saying to several ladies, "Well, well, so many ladies each paid one dollar. Isn't it strange how often several persons will have the same thoughts? I intended all the time to be one of them and am surprised that any one should think differently. I had my dollar earned long before Mr. Precedent was calling round soliciting."

And so it came to pass that the mortgage was paid. An offering was made to missions, there was paint and paper at the parsonage, the pastor's library was remembered and twenty-five ladies each earned a dollar in ways so novel and interesting that a long story alone would hardly suffice to tell all the details of each one's effort.



Mr. Clemons had just been wondering how he could renew certain subscriptions and get two books he very much needed. Had taken the matter to the Lord in prayer; here it was answered. "Praise his name!" said the devout pastor.

Mrs. Clemons succeeded in surprising everybody by making two new dresses out of two old ones with a little help from that ten dollars. She was almost perfect in economy. To waste was sin, she thought, and more reprehensible in her than in the prodigal son, for had she not the lesson of his folly to help her?

Mr. Reiley and others thought how graciously the heavenly Father gives all that we ask for, and more, how he blesses a service in his name.

How wise were Reiley and his friends never to say, "I told you so." Hearts full of praise have no exultant feelings. New life dawned in Fairview Church.

For many mornings when Reiley went out to milk he fairly petted that old cow and, strange as it may seem, she never upset another bucket of milk.

The Vexing of Verdi.

Verdi, the great composer, was a philosopher whom no amount of praise could turn from a calm regard of the enthusiasm that his music awakened. Since his death, recently, numerous anecdotes have been told, but none of them illustrates this trait more fully than one which now comes to light.

A friend was endeavoring to impress upon the veteran composer how dear he was to the public. "You make a mistake," was the calm reply. "If the public likes my music it listens and applauds. If it does not like my music it turns its back and walks away. My music that pleases is applauded. I think the public and I are even."

He could not forget, and indicated the fact freshly in these words, that his best successes were refused in the beginning by the audiences that heard them.

Of his Traviata it was said: "What, end the opera with an aria? Verdi cannot even write a chorus to close it."

With the earlier performances of Aida, and because the melody had a tinge of the Oriental, which was necessary to the subject, the cry was raised that Verdi had appropriated eastern melodies, being unable to compose any of his own.

Thoroughly democratic and simple in his bearing, he listened one day to a long speech made by the governor of Lombardy at the close of a performance. The speech was to the effect that he wanted the baton with which Verdi had that day conducted, but he took a roundabout and flowery path to express his wish. In the midst of the speech Verdi said curtly, and waving the baton: "Is that what you want? Then take it."

In rehearsal he caused general terror. At one of the earlier rehearsals of his Requiem the nervousness of a trumpeter played strange antics with his tone.

"What instrument do you play at home?" benignly asked Verdi, leaning forward; "the violin?"

Again, in rehearsing the same work, the violoncellos played a passage poorly. The first player of these instruments happened to be the noted virtuoso, Piatti. "I do not play the 'cello myself, Signor Piatti," said Verdi; "but if I tried I should regret doing no better than that." After this the eyes of every 'cellist were glued on his notes, and the trumpeter felt better than he had the day before.

The gentle side of Verdi showed in his daily life, away from music, from which he was glad to escape. His intimate friends, with few exceptions, were of other professions than his own. The surest way for a musician to win his attention and favor was to entertain him with something entirely foreign to his calling.—Saturday Evening Post.

PETE.

"While Linda May is getting her meat," said Pete, "we'd better be buying the candy, 'cause it'll take a long time. How much money are you going to spend, Mr. Brown?" Edgar answered recklessly that he thought a quarter would be about the thing. "No," said Madge, "we're not going to have you spend that much of your money for us. A dime will be about right: and you give it to me and I'll take it to the bank and change it into pennies." So pretty soon Madge, Linda May and Pete had three pennies apiece, and Edgar had the tenth penny. "Now we don't want to get it all at one place," Madge explained. "You can get more by dividing out. Pete, you begin at the north end of town, and I'll begin at the south, and we'll take every grocery store and baker-shop as they come, and when we've run out, Linda May can take the other places. Just get one penny's worth at each place. "Where shall I go?" asked Edgar, holding his penny. "You be standing around," said Pete, "and we'll bring you the sacks to hide in your pockets. 'Course we won't go into a store carrying candy; then they'd know we'd been other places and it tud hurt their feelings." "It is very nice of you to think of that," said Edgar. "Yes," said Pete, "'sides, it tud make um mad an' they wouldn't give but one piece for a penny." "Oh!" said Edgar. Linda May had to wait a good while for her steak. When she came running out, she found Edgar standing before the post office. Just then Pete came up. "Come on," said Pete. Edgar and Linda May followed her to Martin's grocery store. "Now you watch me," said Pete to Edgar; then she walked to the glass case. A man with big whiskers stepped up. "Anything to-day, little girl?" he said. "I will wait for Mr. Martin," said Pete with dignity. Mr. Martin didn't seem in a hurry to wait on Pete; in fact, he knew Pete; but he came at last.

"Mr. Martin," said Pete, "how many caramels do you sell for a penny, to-day?" He answered, five. "You gave me ten last week for a penny," said Pete. "Well," said Mr. Martin, "I was reckless that day, I reckon." "I suppose, now, you couldn't give me six?" suggested Pete. Mr. Martin was afraid not. Business was bad, he said. "Well," said Pete, "you get ever so many red-hots for a penny, and a whole stack of lemon-drops. So you can just give me half and half please, and throw in one caramel; and Mr. Martin, let's see the sack bulge out. Mr. Martin, you don't sell candy like Griggs and Bimby, does he, Linda May? Mr. Martin gives a whole lot for your money. Mr. Brown, you want to come here when you get your candy. Don't he, Linda May? You needn't weigh that, Mr. Martin, I'll take it just as it is. I'll trust you if you'll trust me. Here, Mr. Brown, stick it in your pocket." When they were outside, Edgar said, "But do you like red-hots and lemon-drops?" "Not so very well," said Pete, "but look how much you get for the money!" "But," said Edgar, "wouldn't you rather have nice caramels, even if you only have a few—I ask merely for information, Pete, not that it matters to me." "Oh, no," said Pete, "what you want is piles of it." "Yes," said Linda May, "the main thing about candy ain't if it's so good, but how long'll it last?" Pete nodded decidedly. "Well," said Edgar, "I see how you got this, but you can't say the same thing to other grocers. You can't tell them they sell cheapest, too." "No," said Pete, "you go at it a different way."

"Yes," said Linda May, "you do just the opposite." "Yes," said Pete, "you tell them, 'O, you ought to see what Mr. Martin gives me for a penny!' That does um." "They can't be as generous as Mr. Martin," Linda May explained, "because zit ain't in um to be, but saying that to um puts um up to the best that is in um." They left town tired and happy, Edgar with ten sacks of candy in his pockets, Linda May with her steak and Pete leading the dog as a special favor—and to keep his nose off the meat. A difficulty presented itself. How could they divide the candy, since Linda May couldn't stop on the road? Of course the contents of each sack had to be divided into four piles. In some cases it would be necessary to cut a big piece of candy in two with Edgar's knife. "If you stopped at our house just long enough to divide her up," said Pete wickedly, "Miss Dollie might think you was just waiting your turn at the butcher-shop." "She might ask if I went in your place," Linda May objected. "Anyway, I told her I wouldn't." "We could divide it on top of the fence," suggested Madge. "I told her I wouldn't stop," said Linda May conclusively. "Then I tell you what," said Madge. "We'll keep the candy here and not take a bite, and to-morrow I and Pete'll come to visit you and bring it, and we can divide it in your storm cellar." "But Mr. Brown can't come." "Why can't he?" Linda May laughed; "Aunt Dollie don't like him," she said; "she don't want him to come!" Edgar blushed. "Well," said Madge, "of course that makes it different. I don't know what we can do about him." "You needn't mind about me," said Edgar, "you girls can have all the candy." "No," said Madge, "you are one of us, you know." Edgar smiled brightly. "We could all go to prayer-meeting to-morrow night," said Pete, "and get 'way back and sit in a row while Brother Gruck is speaking—he always speaks about an hour—and then—" "No," said Linda May, "Aunt Dollie never lets me sit 'way back. I never got to sit 'way back in church in my life. I don't know how it would feel," she added wistfully. "I have another suggestion," said Pete, undiscouraged. "Me and Madge had better eat up the candy, this time, and we'll call in Letitia." Linda May said that wouldn't do her any good. "'Twould me," said Pete, smacking her lips. By this time they had reached Mrs. Morris' house. Pete asked, "Are you going to wash Lucifer off of your hand?" "I don't believe," said Linda May, smelling her hand earnestly, "that it sticks now; I think it's worn off." "Let me smell," said Madge. "Me too," said Pete. "Mr. Brown," said Linda May, "you smell my hand; you can tell better." The young man bent over the little hand and smelled it as gravely as if making an important chemical test. "It certainly is suggestive of dogs," he said. "I thought I could tell it too," said Madge. "Will Miss Dollie be apt to smell you, Linda May?" "She's a great smeller," said the other, in a pessimistic tone—which means that she could not help looking on the dark side of the question. They had now passed Mrs. Morris' house, and Pete and Madge declared they must go back. Linda May, true to her promise not to stop on the road, walked slowly on; very slowly; you could hardly tell that she was moving. Edgar, who now held the dog, stood on the corner in perplexity, his pockets bulging and bristling with the sacks of candy. "Why not take three sacks apiece?" he said. "No," responded Madge, "each one must have her share of every sack." "Yes," said Pete. "Yes," called Linda May, as she walked slowly on.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

Jesus Appears to Mary.

The present lesson is parallel in time with that of last Sunday. A careful comparison of the accounts of the various evangelists seems to show the following order of events. In the group of women that came first to the tomb of Jesus, Mary Magdalene was conspicuous. She is named first by the other three evangelists, while John names no others. The remarkable deliverance Jesus had wrought in her behalf, in casting out of her seven demons, had won her most ardent love, and had given her a prominent place among the Galilean women who followed the Nazarene, and ministered to his wants from their purses. On that first Easter morning, Mary reached the sepulcher before the other women, and finding it empty, hastened away to tell Peter and John, "They have taken away the Lord out of the tomb, and we know not where they have laid him." The other women tarried at the place, until, becoming bolder, they entered the tomb, where they saw the angels, and received the tidings of the Savior's resurrection. They at once hurried away to tell the rest of the twelve. Meanwhile, Peter and John came running to the sepulcher, only to find the empty tomb, with the burial cloths neatly folded and laid aside. After they had gone, Mary Magdalene came again, and stood weeping at the entrance of the sepulcher. It was then that she had the vision of the Christ; very soon after which the other women came back again, and Jesus appeared to them also, as told in the narrative of Matthew. This seems to us to be the simplest arrangement of the various accounts.

By the empty tomb the heart of Mary was breaking. When her Lord died on the cross, it seemed that nothing could be added to the cup of her bitterness. But now, denied the poor comfort of embalming his dear body, and washing away the blood-stains from his wounded hands and feet, her grief is overpowering. And the added thought, that his enemies had taken away the body, to subject it to horrible indignities, perhaps, or at least to give it dishonored burial, was too awful to contemplate. To have our best beloved die—that is surely sad enough. But to have their graves robbed, their precious clay dishonored—that is intolerable. No wonder that she stands and weeps.

Stooping, Mary looked long and earnestly into the empty tomb. Suddenly she started. Whose were those white forms, set like watch men at the ends of the grave where Jesus had been laid? She had not been with the other women when they saw these heavenly messengers a little while before. Bewildered, she gazed on them without speaking, knowing not what to say. "Woman, why weepest thou?" she heard them ask, in gentlest tones. From her downcast heart came the answer, "Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." No sadder utterance ever fell from mortal lips. Had her conjecture been correct, and the body of Jesus been stolen by his enemies, it would have been a cruel act to deprive those who loved him of the poor privilege of giving it the last tender rites of sepulture. But what is the baseness of those who would take from the trusting young disciple of the Lord Jesus his living Savior, and leave him but the despair of an unanswered longing and an unrequited love. He who, in the face of nineteen centuries of Christian history, would seek to destroy the hope of the Christian believer, proves himself untrue to the holiest affections and the noblest ambitions of the human race.

Mary turned away from the tomb, her soul agitated by the vision of the white-robed forms, but not yet so much as dreaming that her Master was alive. Through her tear-dimmed eyes she saw someone standing by her, but she thought it was the man who kept the garden in which the sepulcher was. The stranger asked her, as had the angels, "Woman, why weepest thou? whom seekest thou?" She did not even recognize his voice. "Sir," she answered, "if thou hast borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away." She craved only the poor boon of burying her Lord; but it would prove a sweet consolation to her, and to all his followers, in their present deep sorrow. Then the Master spoke to her in the old, familiar tone, and addressing her by name, "Mary!" Ah, it was the same word with which he had spoken to her that memorable day, so long ago, when he bade the evil spirits go out of her. The surge of emotion that swept over her rendered her almost speechless. It was too good to be believed, that her Lord was living! "Rabboni!" My Master! was all that she could say. She reached out her hands toward him, and caught hold of his robe, as if to prevent his again disappearing from her gaze. Gently the Master said to her, "Cling not to me; for I am not yet ascended unto the Father." The translation "Touch me not," is incorrect, and should be as given above. Such is the meaning of the word, and Jesus did not forbid the women whom he met soon after this to touch him, and even to clasp his feet. He meant that Mary need not fear he would at once depart, but that she should go and tell his brethren that she had seen him, and that he would reveal himself to them, and then ascend to God, his Father and theirs.

"Go tell my brethren." Yes, these humble, despised, even doubting ones were his brethren. What condescension has he manifested in receiving them into his fellowship, and filling their hearts with a divine hope. With what joy must Mary have run to take the message, and with what exultation did the words break from her lips, "I have seen the Lord!" She was the first who could claim that wondrous vision. This poor woman, victim of an awful malady, became the first witness of the risen Christ, in the way of personal testimony. A little after, the other women came and told how Jesus had met them, and saluted them with his familiar greeting, "All hail!" John came, and declared that the open tomb was proof enough to him that the Lord had risen indeed. Then came Peter, and with deep emotion declared that he had seen the Lord. Faith began to awaken in the hearts of the incredulous; and, while they were not yet convinced, they were so wrought upon that they gathered together, all except Thomas, and waited to see what further marvellous tidings might come to them. Before the day ended, their doubt was dissolved, and their faith established.

TOPIC FOR APRIL 14.

Foundations.

I remember hearing of a man once who built his house down in the valley on a beautiful building spot, it seemed. He filled his house with frescoes and paintings and furniture most costly. He took possession and had a house-warming. It was just the sort of place he had desired all his life. Then the rainy season came, the streams rose and burst out of their banks, torrents gushed down the hillsides, rains descended, winds blew and beat upon that house, and down it came and great was the fall of it!

Another man I've heard of who built high up on the top of the cliff. Some would say it was a dizzy height for a house, pretty cold in winter, and open always to the storm. But the owner built there, because he wanted rock beneath his feet and the free air of heaven about him. The rainy season came and all the waters ran away from this house. The winds blew and shook the timbers till sometimes they groaned; but what of that? The foundation was solid enough, deep down in the limestone strata, to hold all in place. It fell not, for it was founded upon a rock. Which of the two men had the better judgment?

And so we go on building on swamps and sands—do we not?—refusing to be guided by the experience of foolish and wise men. We build on such sandy foundations as:

1. Success. There is a periodical in this country, gaining a great circulation by worshiping at the shrine of success! We are all doing the same thing, more or less. It is the successful people who count. Success may be but a sandy foundation.

2. Money. This is only another form of success—in our country. It is just a certain kind of sand—golden sand. It has wings, and flies out from under the foundation. It is like California sand—which is mostly fleas.

3. Position. There are many to whom high consideration from those about counts for more than anything else. To stand well, to be bowed to with respect, to be pointed out in the streets or roads as so-and-so; this is a foundation upon which many build to their destruction. It is a thing worth seeking, to be well thought of by neighbors, community and country; but there are other things higher.

Some of us are trying all the while to build the house upside down, to build the cornices and the decorations before building the foundations. Some people want all the polite polish of education, for example, before learning the rudiments of things. They want to gallop through; and indeed they usually do. They want, if they are servants, all the consideration of long known employees, without laying the foundation of faithful service.

There are certain foundations that all of us must lay:

1. Square Honest Thought. Unless our convictions are sure as the strata, and are intelligently laid, all our superstructure of thinking—which materially influences our doing—may go awry.

2. The Moral Law. We are none of us without the sense of right and wrong. We must abide by that sense as surely as the hills by their foundations. If we sacrifice our own ideas of good and evil, what is there left for us to hold to? Not one jot or one tittle must we yield in our respect for the laws of right, and our obedience to them.

3. The Serenity of a Christian Life. All of us will have storms, sorrows, winds that blow and rains that fall; but none of us need be shaken from our foundation of calm, if we desire not to be. Happiness is an aim of life and it can be attained. In spite of untoward circumstances, it can be obtained. Happiness can be got; and it should be built into the foundations of our lives.

4. The Foundation other than which can no man lay. Jesus of Nazareth is corner stone enough for any life. Whoever shapes his life by Christ's cannot build far wrong. Here is, after all, the essential foundation.

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE?

A large interrogation, truly! It would be difficult to frame a more fundamental question than this, which has been chosen as the title of the new book by W. J. Russell. No more valuable volume for young people has ever been issued. What is Your Life? is easily worth $10,000 to any young man or woman who will faithfully follow its teaching. The general scope of the book is shown by the titles of some of the chapters: "The Value of Time," "The Body and Good Health," "Character Building," "Good Books and Good Reading," etc. The volume is not only helpful and profitable, but is also interesting and entertaining. Mr. Russell has avoided that didactic, dogmatic, prosy style so usual in works of this class. He has written in a bright, lively vein. His book will be read by young people who would refuse to read the average volume of advice to the young.

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE? By W. J. Russell. Cloth, 316 pages. Price, $1.00.

Missouri Mission Notes.

Bro. Lampton is now in his second meeting for the board. His first was at Carondelet, St. Louis. The St. Louis city mission board co-operated with the state board in supporting him while there, and we have many expressions of the very largest gratification from the members and preachers for the good work that he did. He is now in a meeting at Hume, and already we are beginning to hear of the blessings that are coming through the labors of this consecrated man of God. He is an evangelist in the best sense, as that office is described in the New Testament, and he is doing "the work of an evangelist." His time is fully taken up until the middle or last of May.

Bro. Gaylor is, as usual, doing splendid work in the south part of the state. He has revised the work at Marshfield. He has held a meeting at Northview which has resulted in a splendid ingathering, the appointment of a building committee, assuring the building of a house. He is one of the board's best workers. He is now at Niangua.

Bro Hooton, too, is at work in the Springfield district, and at last accounts was in a meeting at Sparta. Bro. F. J. Yokley, true, loyal man that he is, wrote me that he would give the board a meeting. I said, "Go to Oronogo." He is now there. He reports the time not very propitious, that it will take a tabernacle and a seige to make a permanent impression. But he is hammering away anyhow. W. F. Turner has the burden of things churchly upon his heart, concerning Joplin and vicinity, and is determined that another church in that growing city must be built.

Bro. Horace Siberell is getting hold of things in Cape Girardeau and vicinity. He has to face conditions such as he never met before. But he is showing his power of adaptability by fitting himself at once into this new environment with the greatest success.

Bro. T. H. Popplewell is having a great meeting at Ponca, Okla., 57 have been added to date. This meeting has hindered him from entering the field for us, but we could not call him from such a work; it will not be long now before he is at work. There is no doubt of his success. We are expecting the greatest satisfaction from the engagement of this splendid man. We have already more calls for his services than he can fill this year.

These are a few of the men that are at work for the board; they are nearly all new men in the field. This means a great enlargement of the work, and a consequent increase of the expenses. This calls for greater generosity on the part of the churches in support of the work. Some of them are responding nobly to the need. E. B. Redd says Platte City will make it $50 this year. Cameron doubled her apportionment. South Street Church, Springfield, raised $500 for missions in the rally, of which the state gets 15 per cent. Smithton, under the leadership of F. W. Ferrell, had a rally, surprised themselves, and sent in the full apportionment, $10. Tarkio, not to be outdone, has a rally and word comes that we may expect $25, whereas, heretofore, they have sent but $10.

These are the indications of what, we trust, is a general awakening to the great importance and the imperative need of the state work, and it is surely time for this to be. There has been altogether too much indifference, too much lethargy in this matter. If we are to do our whole duty: if we are to do a work worthy of so great a people: if we would not have our numbers become our shame in place of our glory, we must push state missions to the front. Hundreds of our churches have not, as yet, made any response. Many preachers have not brought their people to see the need of this work. We are trying to reach them. Will you help us?

Yours in His name.

T. A. ABBOTT.

420 East Ninth St., Kansas City, Mo.

P. S. I have several inquiries for preachers from churches that say they cannot pay over $600 per year. Yet they want good men.

DR PRICE'S CREAM BAKING POWDER

Dr. Price's Baking Powder supplies a pure, wholesome leavening agent, which makes the biscuit and cake of highest healthfulness at medium cost and protects the food from alum, which is the greatest dietary danger of the day.

The foremost baking powder in all the world.

NOTE.—Alum baking powders are low priced, as alum costs but two cents a pound; but alum is a corrosive poison and it renders the baking powder dangerous to use in food.

Book Notes.

Elsewhere in this issue will be found our special offer of the Moran Series of instruction books in shorthand. Among the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST there are hundreds of young people who should immediately respond to this offer. Within a few weeks they will be free from school duties for the summer. Probably, in most instances they have no clearly defined plans for spending the weeks and months until the re-opening of school. If they could but realize how their school work would be made easier by a knowledge of shorthand, they would not for a moment hesitate to send for this splendid series of instruction books and spend their vacation in mastering stenography. How easy to take notes of lectures if it can be done in shorthand! You do not have to have a teacher. With these books and proper application and practice, you may quickly become proficient.

Perhaps, young woman, you have decided that you do not wish to be dependent on your father for support, but prefer, like your brother, to do something to earn your own living. What will you do? Do you want to become a saleswoman in a store, where you will have to stand behind a counter for ten hours each day, and in return receive from $3.00 to $7.00 per week? Is it not much better to be a stenographer at $15.00 or even $20.00 or $25.00 per week—easier work and more pay? If you are a thoroughly competent and capable stenographer you can command such a salary, and you can become a capable and competent stenographer by carefully studying the Moran Series of instruction books and diligently practicing. It will cost you only $5.00 to prepare yourself for a position that will pay you from $900 to $1,200 per year. It's a pretty good investment we offer, isn't it?

O. A. Carr, President of Carr-Burdette College, Sherman, Texas, has this to say about Shem, the historical romance by Breckenridge Ellis: "The author of 'Shem' has wrought a good work and I have read it with great pleasure. The dialogue throughout, among all the characters, is well conducted. The author shows an accurate knowledge of the topography of Jerusalem and Bethlehem, and the Old Testament facts have been happily interwoven with the romance. I watched closely to see if the story remained true to its scenes, for Jerusalem, the present city and its traditional topography, are as familiar to me as if I had seen them yesterday. Yes, the author writes as if he had just visited his scenes, and this is very satisfactory. It is high praise of 'Shem' to say that the thoughts, sentiments, passions, characters are such as 'our girls' can read with profit." The price of Shem is only Fifty Cents, prepaid. Send your order to-day.

Every minister of the gospel should have a copy of the Christian Ministers' Manual, by F. M. Green. It is just the thing to assist the preacher at weddings, funerals, dedications, all kinds of special occasions. It contains hints and suggestions about preaching, church finances, the official board, etc., etc. It is by far the best thing of the kind ever published, and the low price places it easily within the reach of all. We will send it, post paid, on receipt of Seventy-five Cents.

Twenty thousand copies of Alone With God have already been sold and there is no diminishing in the demand for the book. J. H. Garrison is the author of several very popular works, but this one stands at the head. Probably no single work in all our literature has had such a sale. We sell a great many copies to be used as gifts. Has it never occurred to you that this book makes a very choice present for a relative or friend? For this purpose, the full morocco binding ($1.25) is most used, though the cloth-bound edition ($.75) is a neat and handsome volume.

If you have a copy of our General Catalogue (and if you have not it is your own fault, for you have only to ask for it,) turn to the list of tracts and pamphlets on pages 60, 61 and 62. Look carefully through this list and we are certain that you will find the titles of some that you will want to read. We have a large assortment on all subjects and at all prices, from 35 cents per hundred to 25 cents each. Remember, too, our offer of 35 tracts, from this list, for $1.00. This does not mean that we will send any 35 that you may choose, but 35 that we select. This is a liberal offer, for among the 35 that we send are many pamphlets of 30 and 40 pages each. This opportunity for any one who wishes to secure a great deal of good literature for very little money.

Nebraska Secretary's Letter.

A good report comes from the Bible-school and C. E. Society at Liberty Ridge. Report made by Bro. C. A. Phillips.

The newly organized church at Kennard sends a freewill offering for state work. The new Bible School at Tekamah did likewise. This is the proper way for a congregation to begin work. It suggests that the pastor is alive to the interests of his congregation.

Wickham and Givens reported 25 additions at Firth, 23 being baptisms. Their next meeting is at Scotts Bluff. This is a new point near Gering and has recently built a new house. Bro. Wickham has been ill.

E G. Merrill has closed his work at Arapahoe, and gone to Paola, Kan. Simpson Ely will dedicate the church at Nelson, and then hold a meeting. This comes in April.

One added at Harvard recently.

Morrison reports 58 additions in the Salem meeting. This is a splendid showing and the church and pastor rejoice. District No. 1 will be there in convention, April 8-11.

No. 8 convention will be held in Beaver City. Date later.

G. C. Johnson, of Hiram, O., has located at Indianola, and preaches also at Bartley. J. H. Roberts, of Bartley, has resigned and goes to Willow Springs, Mo. So reports the corresponding secretary of No. 8.

Geo. Lobingier, 1821 P St., Lincoln, is available for supply preaching at any time. He has already supplied acceptably and churches needing such assistance will be well served to call him.

Fifteen added at Exeter in the Atwood meeting. Much bad weather and a smallpox scare interfered. The Atwood family are at Seward at this writing.

No Lemon-ade for readers this week.

Bro. R. M. Harris was to commence a meeting with the church at Rising on the 25th. He would have as a singer for a part of the time, W. H. Myers, the chorister of the David City church, and also the pastor of that congregation, Bro. Harmon, to assist in the preaching.

I suppose the Scoville meeting has begun at Omaha. It is with great pleasure that we learn of Bro. S. T. Martin's determination not to leave the work in that city. It has been marvelously strengthened under his ministry, and the continuance of this good work means so much for the state in general.

W. T. Hacker preaches at Valparaiso the 31st of March, and at Nelson the first Lord's day in April. It is hoped that some good church will call Bro. Hacker soon.

H. H. Harmon was called to Auburn on account of the serious illness of a niece, and W. H. Myers filled his pulpit on the 24th. Some Ulysses auditors report the effort as most successful. W. A. BALDWIN.

I have learned
To look on nature, not as in the hour
Of thoughtless youth; but hearing oftentimes
The still, sad music of humanity,
Nor harsh nor grating, though of ample power
To chasten and subdue. And I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts: a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man:
A motion and a spirit, that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things. Therefore am I still
A lover of the meadows and the woods,
And mountains; and of all that we behold
From this green earth; of all the mighty world
Of eye and ear, both what they half create,
And what perceive; well pleased to recognize
In nature and the language of the sense,
The anchor of my purest thoughts, the nurse,
The guide, the guardian of my heart, and soul
Of all my moral being.

POPULAR HYMNS No. 2

By C. C. CLINE

The ruling purpose of the author has been to give to the public a worthy successor of Popular Hymns. He has not sought to duplicate it, but to make a book as well adapted to the new methods of Church, Sunday-school and C. E. work as the first was to the conditions twenty years ago when Popular Hymns was launched upon its long and useful career. POPULAR HYMNS NO 2 is better than its predecessor, not because it contains better music, but because the music is better adapted to the present wants of all the working forces of the army of the Lord.

Evangelists will find the Gospel Proclamation in Song a department of the book eminently suited to every phase of a successfully conducted revival.

Choristers will find the average choir supplied with a rich selection of beautiful and impressive solos with choruses, duets, quartettes, invocations and doxologies specially selected for the distinctive part a choir is expected to take in the service.

Pastors who are responsible for the kind of pasture upon which the sheep and lambs are fed will NOT find a sentiment out of harmony with New Testament Christianity. He will find it a companion vade mecum for his pocket Testament, containing gems for public worship, for the prayer-meeting, for funeral occasions, for Baptismal, Thanksgiving and Convention services. He will find that an expensive hymnal will not be needed unless it be to keep in the style.

Christian Endeavorers will find in Popular Hymns No. 2 all that they can wish, because it is full from back to back with soul-stirring sentiment set to soul-inspiring music, the only kind C. E's care to sing. The Solos, Duets, and Quartettes may be impressively used to enrich every session of the Society.

S. S. Superintendents who believe the Sunday-school should be the nursery of the church, the church at work saving the young, will find Popular Hymns No. 2 richly supplied with music within the voice compass and heart reach of the children, giving them a desire to remain and participate in the song service of the church. Like its predecessor,

"IN FAITH, UNITY; IN OPINION AND METHODS, LIBERTY; IN ALL THINGS, CHARITY."

Vol. xxxviii. St. Louis, Mo., Thursday, April 11, 1901. No. 15.

Current Events.

Progress in the Philippines. The capture of Aguinaldo and, still more, his oath of allegiance to the United States have given a considerable impetus to the progress of surrender among the insurgents. It is always unsafe to predict positively, but it looks at present as if the bottom were dropping out of the insurrection. Even Mr. Bryan has turned his attention now to depicting the difficulty of establishing civil government when hostilities have ceased. This, he says (and very truly) is the "real problem," but his despondency over the outlook seems somewhat unnecessary. The Commission is energetically and successfully attacking this real problem. There have been received at Washington copies of two acts of the Commission providing for the organization of provincial and municipal governments. Municipal presidents and councilors are to be chosen by vote of the qualified electors. Provincial governors are to be elected by the municipal councilors, and the other provincial officers (secretary, treasurer, supervisor and fiscal,) are to be chosen by the Commission, subject to civil service examination after March 1, 1902. Qualified electors are all male persons over twenty-three years of age who belong to one of the following three classes: "Those who, prior to August 13, 1898, held the office of municipal captain or member of any ayuntamiento; those who own real property to the value of 500 pesos or who pay annually 30 pesos or more of the established taxes; and those who speak, read or write English or Spanish." Secretary Long has authorized the enlistment of 500 Filipinos to serve as marines in the navy.

Russia Will Withdraw. While all the world was waiting to see what would happen in Manchuria since China had refused the demands of Russia and none of the other Powers except Japan apparently cared to take a hand in the matter, Russia herself has come forward with an explicit statement that she will withdraw from Manchuria as soon as order is restored in the Chinese Empire. In other words, her justification for being in Manchuria is precisely the same as that of the other Powers for maintaining troops in Pekin and vicinity, and her intention is equally innocent. This assurance came as the direct result of American influence and perhaps deserves a place in our long list of recent diplomatic triumphs. Russia's solemn and official pledge to evacuate Manchuria as soon as order is restored, must mean either that she does not expect the restoration of order at all, or that she means to postpone for the present any further encroachment in that quarter. It is scarcely conceivable that she intends to ignore the pledge. It is too plain and definite. It would be not only bad morals but (what is of far more consequence) extremely bad politics to lie so openly, explicitly and unnecessarily. As a result of this declaration of Russian intentions, the outlook in the far east is considerably more pacific than it was a week ago, but Japan is going on with her war preparations and has ordered the merchant vessels which carry her flag to be ready for transport service. There is an unconfirmed report that diplomatic relations between the Russian minister in Pekin and the Chinese commissioners have been broken off; but this is not official. Mr. McLeavy Brown, the British director of Korean customs, who was almost dismissed by Russian influence, is to be retained. Li Hung Chang, who is about the only prominent Chinaman who favored giving Manchuria to Russia, is put in an awkward position by the failure of that plan. The generals of the Powers have decided to keep 6,000 troops between Pekin and Tien Tsin. Gens. Chaffee and Wogack (Russian) dissented from this opinion, holding that a smaller number would suffice and that it was not necessary to occupy so many points.

Russia's Domestic Troubles. Perhaps one reason why Russia has accepted China's refusal of the Manchurian treaty so meekly, is that she is having troubles at home which demand attention. Beginning with the riot of the students in St. Petersburg on the anniversary of the liberation of the serfs, there have been numerous disturbances in various parts of the empire on a variety of pretexts. For thirty years Count Tolstoy has been the chief literary spokesman of Russian discontent, but never until recently have the authorities cared to molest him. Since the publication of "Resurrection" he has been excommunicated by the Russian Church and it was recently reported that he has been exiled to Siberia. More credible reports, however, say that he has only been ordered not to enter Moscow or to leave the Russian empire and that he is being closely watched at his country home. It is significant and ominous that the civil and religious authorities should consider it necessary at this late day to adopt restrictive measures toward the aged reformer. It is dangerous for any government to be so constructed that it cannot adjust itself to changing conditions. The stronger the resistance to change, the more sweeping will be the revolution when it comes, and Russia may be even now on the verge of an outbreak which will prove stronger than the Czar's government. A popular uprising in the reign of a benevolent and well-meaning Czar like Nicholas II. would be a cruel stroke of fate, but it would be entirely natural, for the fault is not with the Czar but with the system. Alexander II., the most liberal of the Czars in this century, freed 20,000,000 serfs and was assassinated. The domestic virtues and personal amiability of Nicholas II cannot save his system of government from resistance and possible overthrow.

The Election in St. Louis. The municipal election in St. Louis April 2 resulted in the election of the entire Democratic city ticket headed by Rolla Wells, by a plurality of about 8,300, and 13 out of 28 members of the House of Delegates. Lee Meriwether, candidate for mayor on an independent Municipal Ownership ticket, ran only about 6,000 behind the Republican candidate. Taking the returns at their face value, they indicate a weakening of Democratic loyalty to the Chicago platform, seen in the election of a gold Democrat against the repeated protests of Mr. Bryan; a wonderful growth of municipal ownership sentiment, which was increased by the street railway strike of last year and by the corruption which has attended the granting of new franchises recently; and a general condemnation of the Republican corruptionists who have been in control of the City Hall during the past four years. The Democratic ring which, with headquarters in the governor's office, controls the boards of excise, police and election commissioners, was equally deserving of rebuke and would have received it had not this very ring held control of the instrument by which public opinion delivers its rebukes—the ballot-box. This being the case, the face value of the returns is worth little or nothing. The amount of fraud practiced at this election can as yet be only roughly estimated. Proof is coming in abundantly. Through the connivance of the election commissioners, thousands of names were fraudulently placed on the registration books. With the assistance of the judges and clerks of election (Nesbit law appointees), repeaters and "Indians" voted under these fictitious names. The power of the police was employed to give a free field to the repeaters. The April grand jury will have its hands full. That will be of little use, however, so long as the sheriff professes his inability to find any one who is indicted. Thirty-five election officers were indicted by the February grand jury for fraud in the November election. The indictments were published three days before the municipal election. Yet ten of these indicted men served again as judges or clerks of election. It was claimed that the amendments to the Nesbit law would secure impartial and unobjectionable election officers. This shows how it works.

Presidential Possibilities. The crop of Democratic presidential and vice-presidential aspirants is already large—Republican too for that matter, but that is a less interesting problem. Already the Democratic hot-house is full of presidential hopes and candidates, to be forced into a marketable condition for 1904. Every Democrat who is elected to anything in the next three years will consider it a sign that he is to be the leader of his party in the next race. Many who have stood by Mr. Wells in his St. Louis campaign regard his victory as a sign that reorganization must be upon the platform of the gold Democrats, and that Mr. Wells himself might perhaps appropriately figure on the national ticket. The re-election of Carter Harrison as mayor of Chicago gives his name a prominent place in the list. He is mentioned for vice-president. He is now undoubtedly the dominant force in the party in his state. His nomination would mean no reorganization, at least none involving a positive break with the past eight years. Tom L. Johnson, who was elected mayor of Cleveland on the same day on which Harrison won in Chicago and Wells in St. Louis, is "mentioned" for every office in sight. It is said that he already has his eye on the Ohio governorship, a senatorial seat from the same state, and the presidential nomination in 1904—a comprehensive ambition. Perhaps he hopes, by firing into the flock, to bring down some kind of a bird by even a random shot. Mr. Johnson is strong on municipal ownership and his candidacy would lend itself to a vigorous campaign, with opposition to trusts as the paramount issue. These men are all from the central states. But there is believed by many to be a demand for an eastern leader to supersede the Nebraskan. Mr. Gorman, of Maryland, hopes that this demand may point to him as the man of the hour, after Maryland's new election law shall have returned a legislature which will restore him to the Senate. In the interest of clean and wholesome politics, it is to be hoped that Mr. Gorman's retirement will be made permanent, but he will probably get the senatorship at least. There is plenty of need still for a strong opposition party, and an opposition wisely led is about due to win in 1904. But there are no hot favorites in the race for leadership: it is an unequaled opportunity for the dark horse.

Civil Service Reform. There is a belief in some circles that our present methods of civil service reform need reforming. The system of competitive examination for appointment to government offices has been given somewhat wide application, though probably not wide enough. But it is said there is now no way of keeping up the standard of efficiency after the office has been secured and there is being developed a class of public servants who, while they won their appointments according to the merit system, hold them without regard to diligence or efficiency, and consider that they have a right to the place for life. What is needed is a still more rigorous application of the merit system. Let appointments be made with reference to the fitness of the applicants, but let no office-holder, however appointed, be allowed to think that he owns his office or to retain it if indolent or inefficient. It is entirely conceivable that a person should pass the civil service examinations and still prove a lazy, inefficient and unworthy public servant. Examinations are only the first part of the test. The second and more important part is the actual work. The recent appointment of William A. Rodenburg on the Civil Service Commission is said to be due to the President's belief that he is the man to remedy these evils. Mr. Rodenburg has not been conspicuous as a friend of civil service reform in the past and as Representative from Illinois he voted against the appropriation for the maintenance of the Civil Service Commission. His work will be watched critically by those who consider that the present administration has been unfavorable to civil service reform.

Mark Twain's Defense. Our humorist laureate got himself into a bad scrape when he criticized the missionaries in China in the North American Review for March and he has not bettered it by the defense which he makes in the same magazine for April. The original criticism, it will be remembered, was based on a report that Mr. Ament, a missionary of the American Board, had collected from the Chinese villages in which Christians were slain and property destroyed, thirteen times more than the value of the destroyed property. It soon developed that the "thirteen" was a cable error for one-third and that this third was used for the support of the widows and orphans of the slain. No matter, says Mark in his defense. It is as bad to collect one-third in excess as thirteen times. Besides it is rank extortion to collect from villages as a whole without stopping to find which particular villagers were guilty of the crimes. Our erstwhile humorist in his new role of critic seems not to know that the practice of demanding and paying indemnities is quite usual among civilized nations. And when a nation pays an indemnity for the misdeeds of some of its citizens, the innocent have to bear their share of the burden. When citizens of a foreign power suffer injury in this country, as in the case of the Italians at New Orleans, some years ago, the United States government pays the damages. When the government pays, every taxpayer pays, the innocent with the guilty. Similarly when there are disorders and murders in China, it is right that the Chinese government as a whole shall be held responsible. At present the national government is hard to locate. It is not doing business. Since it has temporarily surrendered its office as the preserver of order, it is necessary to have recourse to the town and village governments which are still tangible realities. When Mr. Ament collected from the villages, the money came from the innocent and the guilty alike, just as it does when our government pays an indemnity. We are trying to collect a claim from the Turkish government for the destruction of lives and property of Americans in the last Armenian massacre. The money will come from the Sultan's treasury, but the Sultan gets it by taxing the people. If we ever collect there will be heard a wail from our now lugubrious humorist, bemoaning the fact that in holding the whole nation responsible we are exchanging Christian for Turkish morals. The only thing for us to do is to set up some courts of our own in Turkey and try to find the offenders. The Sultan might not like it, but what of that? We must head off the humorists somehow.

Brevities. The Indiana Supreme Court has decided that a physician is not compelled to respond to a call and is not liable for damages if death results, owing to his failure to respond.

An equestrian statue of Gen. John A. Logan was unveiled in Washington, D. C., on Tuesday of this week. The statue, which was made in Italy, is unique in being mounted on an enormous block of solid bronze.

It appears that Aguinaldo has not been officially invited to visit this country as at first reported. He will be heartily welcomed, however, if he comes—except, of course, by the Anti-imperialist League, with which he has lost caste since taking the oath of allegiance.

The new corn king, George M. Phillips of Chicago, who is making almost as big a flurry as young Leiter did a year or two ago, has pushed up the price of corn in spite of the efforts of the "shorts" to break him. He is still in the rocket part of his career. The stick episode comes later.

The conditions of Mr. Carnegie's gift to St. Louis were complied with on April 2, when the people voted to double the tax for the maintenance of the public library. The choosing of the site for the new building is now the interesting question. The chances are in favor of the site of the present Exposition building.

Gen. Cassius M. Clay, of Kentucky, now in his ninety-first year, is again on the war-path. He has trained his cannon on the natural approach to his premises, laid a cane across the front walk as a dead-line, and hoisted the red flag. As an insurgent, General Clay is a success. He proposes to maintain the extra-territoriality of the Clay premises.

Mr. Dalzell, Member of Congress from Pennsylvania, has just returned from a trip in Cuba. He believes that a majority of the Cuban people favor the acceptance of the terms offered by the United States and that the resistance comes chiefly from the politicians who are holding out in expectation of terms which will give larger scope for their own operations.

It is reported that the women of Berlin have organized a club for the control of husbands. Such a movement arising in a land where the hausfrau is proverbial for her domesticity is distinctly ominons. And control with club, too. Horrors! Let us avoid the threatening word and call it the Deutschehausfraufreiheitgesellschaft. It can't get far with that name to carry.

The West Point hazing investigation is out of the way just in time to give place to a flurry on the same subject at Harvard. The latter case has to do with initiation into secret societies. The Dean thinks action by the faculty unnecessary since the students can stop the practice whenever they please by refusing to join societies which practice barbarous or humiliating rites of initiation.

It is rumored that Mr. Carnegie has in mind the endowment of a theater, according to the plan long advocated by Mr. Richard Mansfield and approved by Sir Henry Irving. The idea is that an endowed theater, not being solely dependent upon its box office, would not have to appeal to a depraved public taste for support, but would be free to elevate and educate taste. There is no doubt about the stage needing to be elevated.

The Seat of Authority.

The article elsewhere in this issue entitled "The Bible and the Inner Light," brings up the question once more as to the seat of authority in religion. One has but to listen to a discussion of modern biblical problems or to read the current literature on these subjects to realize how fundamental this question is in all our religious thinking. Our correspondent, to whose article we have referred above, asks us to devote an editorial to the pointing out of the relation between the Bible and the inner light.

The question does not seem to us to be "Which is the greater authority, the Bible or the Inner Light?" as our correspondent puts it. The light that shines in God's word, and that inner light to which Jesus referred when he said, "If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is the darkness," are not to be thought of as rival authorities, each seeking to subject men to its control in opposition to the other, nor as different lights, deriving their illuminating quality from different sources. Jesus Christ is "the light of the world." He was "the true light, even the light which lighteth every man, coming into the world." The men who wrote the books which make up the Bible were enlightened, some more, some less, by this light which, coming into the world, shone in the life and teaching of Jesus of Nazareth with a clearness and brilliancy hitherto unknown among men.

Here is the real source of authority in religion; that is, it is the source of light—a perfect revelation of the character and will of God. What, then, is the relation between this light which shone in Christ and the light of the Bible? The latter is a medium through which that light shines, with varying degrees of clearness according to the measure of true light from Christ which each writer possessed. What is the relation then between the light of the Bible and what has been called "the inner light"? It is the same light, so far as it is light at all, shining through different media, and of course, with different degrees of illumination.

Now, if it be remembered that the writers of the Bible were picked men, having exceptional opportunities and exceptional endowments, and that their writings are a picked or chosen literature surviving all the tests to which centuries and millenniums of study and investigation have subjected them, it is plain why the collective teaching of this body of inspired writings should be regarded as a safer standard of truth on the great themes which they treat than the individual light of any single person, or any number of persons not thus specially chosen and endowed to make known Christ's mind to the world. In saying this, however, we would not ignore or despise that light which dwells even in those who have been denied the light of revelation, for to this light the gospel must make its appeal, and from it receive whatever response its messengers can hope for.

It should be added, however, that those who speak of the authority of religion as internal rather than external do not thereby intend to disparage the authority of Christ or the Bible, but rather to emphasize the idea that it is only as Christ and the truths of revelation are enthroned in the heart that they really become a controlling force over the lives of men. Not until Christ finds us in our central being, and the heart, the intellect and the will receive him with glad acclaim, has he come to coronation over our lives and characters. As Christ in us is "the hope of glory," so the Christ within is the hope of that loving and loyal obedience which alone leads to glory. What The Outlook probably means by the new criticism undermining "the old authority of the Bible," is the changed view which regards its statements as in the Bible because they are true, and not as true because they are in the Bible. In other words, the Bible is a medium through which the light shines, not the source of that light. It is the literary record of God's revelation to men who spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit.

No criticism, new or old, can ever undermine the truth recorded in the Bible, nor the authority of Him concerning whom both prophets and apostles testify that He is the Son of God, the revealer of the Father, the Teacher of the world. The supremacy of the Bible over all other literature consists chiefly in this, that Christ lives and breathes in it and speaks through it as "one having authority" because having the light and love which the world needs. He never despises that light in the hearts of men of which He is the source, but ever seeks to increase it by fresh revelations of His truth and grace. Nor does any one possessing a measure of the "true light," and living according to it, ever reject any truth, command or ordinance taught or enjoined by Christ. Any so-called "inner light" which sets at naught the teaching of Christ, or the teaching of those trained and qualified by Him to convey His will to men, gives incontestable proof of being a false light.

The seat of authority in religion, then, is Jesus Christ, whose teaching is embodied in the New Testament, and whose Spirit, given to them that obey Him, writes that teaching upon the heart and leads them into an ever-enlarging apprehension of His doctrine, and to its increasing application to their own needs and those of the world. But this involves the conception of the transcendent God as also immanent, not in nature alone, but in humanity as well, and pre-eminently in His Church, and converts what was once regarded as an external, arbitrary authority into an inward, impelling law—"the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus."

The Aftermath of Revivals.

Speaking after the manner of men, the revival season will soon be over. The past winter has been very fruitful in the number of additions made to the churches. From almost every part of the country encouraging news has been received with respect to evangelistic effort. Some of the greatest meetings ever reported have been held, and the results have been published in all the leading papers of the land.

We have not very much faith in statistical Christianity. Numbers do not always count in the real strength of the cause. Sometimes one man is worth more than a thousand. It was said of the first Napoleon that he counted for more than all his legions. Looked at from this point of view, it must be taken for granted that simply the number of additions made during the revival season must practically count for little in the strength of the churches. It would be impossible, when casting the net where there are all kinds of fish, not to capture some that are of little or no use. Doubtless, in all the revivals that have been held throughout the country, more or less of this worthless material has been gathered. Still, after making due allowance for a considerable number of additions that must count for little or nothing, the general result ought to be very helpful to the churches and ought to give promise of great things in the future.

As already intimated, it is almost certain that some of the material gathered will not be valuable for good, no matter how carefully or how wisely this material may be used in the management of the church's life. Some of it must drift, no matter what may be done by the respective pastors or churches. Nevertheless, a very large proportion ought to be made valuable for strength and efficient work. How shall this be done? This is a question that must confront every church where there have been revivals and the importance of the question cannot be overestimated.

With a view to helping the pastors and churches solve this important question, it may not be amiss to make a few practical suggestions:

1. These new converts must be dealt with personally. No kind of general treatment will meet the case. They must be visited and each case thoroughly studied, and such treatment used as will meet that particular case. Perhaps it will be impossible for the pastor to do all this work himself. Indeed, it is not best for him to do it all, even if he could. A revival season ought to help the members of the churches, as well as bring in converts. These new additions ought to give new fields for enterprise and work among the members. Every addition to the church gives new opportunities to every member of that church to become an efficient worker. The pastor ought not, therefore, to depend upon his own visits, but should, in every possible way, encourage the membership to meet the obligations resting upon them. This is quite as important as the effect on the converts themselves; and nothing will be more helpful than this to the church as a whole; that is, the enlisting of the members of the church in this sort of work. However, none of this work can take the place of the pastor's own ministrations. He should see all of the new converts as soon as possible, become familiar with their needs and also with their possibilities, and they should be put to work at once in whatever direction they can best serve.

2. Every pastor should have a special meeting, at least once a week, for a month or two, for the special benefit of these new converts. They should be notified and urged to attend these meetings, where the pastor should give them special instructions with respect to their Christian life and their activities in the church. If these meetings are properly used, they ought to be of great benefit in bringing all the new converts into sympathetic touch with one another, and with the general work of the church. This would be a great point gained, and would add very materially to the usefulness of these members in the church.

3. It is useless to depend upon a prayer-meeting for this special training. Nor will the Christian Endeavor Society meet the case entirely. These new converts should be encouraged to attend the prayer-meeting, and also join at once the Christian Endeavor Society. Still, these meetings will not answer all the conditions of the case, consequently some such meeting as has been suggested must be provided in order that these new converts may be interested in the work of the church, and trained so that they may become efficient in it.

4. Another suggestion may be valuable where it can be made practical. Sometimes it is impossible to have these new converts meet at the same time and place. When this is the case, it may be well to have sectional meetings at different times and places, so as to suit the circumstances of the converts. This will often appear to be necessary in the large cities; and where this is the case, there is all the more need for the sectional meetings we have suggested. When members are scattered so that it is difficult to have them meet at a common center, this very fact is an additional reason why they should be cared for immediately in some effective way. When they are, by their location, largely out of touch with the members of the church, there is greater danger that they will drift and finally be practically lost to the church. A little attention at the start may bring these members into active relations with the church, and thus save them from the danger to which attention has been called.

5. These new members should be brought into a class for instruction in the Bible. It is better to have them in a class by themselves when this can be done. Nor will it answer all the needs of the case to have them in a class in the Sunday-school. While it may be well to have them there also, it will be much better if one evening during a week should be given to these new converts for special instruction in the Word of God. This instruction should generally be given by the pastor himself, though where he cannot take this extra service, some one who is well qualified may be selected to do this important work.

Unless these "babes in Christ" shall be fed on the "unadulterated milk" of the Word it will be impossible for them to grow, and the pastor who depends on his Lord's day sermons to do this will probably find, when it is too late, that he has largely failed. The Lord's day sermons are for the most part too general in their character and too comprehensive in their scope, and often too recondite to be eminently useful in developing these new converts into strong men and women in Christ Jesus. They need to be treated as babes and fed on milk and not strong meat.

6. These converts themselves should be put to work as soon as possible. Nothing will develop spiritual strength sooner than spiritual exercise. They should be made to feel that they can do something in the church of God. For they are not there simply to furnish opportunity to the older members of the Church, but are there for work to be done by themselves. Doubtless this work must first be of a very simple character, but a wise pastor will be able to devise ways and means by which he can put all these new converts to doing something, whether it amounts to anything or not in doing good to others. It will do the new converts good, and this is the main matter.

7. The church must not expect too much of these new converts. Babes in Christ ought not to be measured by the strength of men and women. It will often require much patient waiting before the new life will grow into full proportions. We see this exemplified in the New Testament churches. Many of these churches were very feeble when they had been in existence several years. But the apostles had patience with them. They labored with them. They exhorted them. In no case did they seem to get out of patience with them. Even as regards the seven churches of Asia Minor, there is much that is commended in most of these, while there was "somewhat against them." This is the spirit which should characterize the churches where revivals have been held. The new converts should be well treated; tenderly, patiently, prayerfully, hopefully dealt with. This treatment will largely lead to the best results. And if this is the spirit manifested by the pastor and the people; and if the suggestions which have been made should be put into practice, it will be found that this revival season will have contributed largely to the spiritual growth of the churches. But if these churches should pursue the course of Elijah and rest under their juniper trees while the Jezebel of evil is actively engaged in the destruction of spiritual life, then the aftermath of our revival season will have little in it of encouragement for the future of our cause. But we hope better things of those who have charge of our churches where these revivals have been held.

Hour of Prayer.

The Divine Comforter.*

Text.—As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you; and ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem.—Isa. 66:13.

God is not only magisterial, He is motherly. It is refreshing to turn from the God that governs to the God that comforts. Some men have such hard natures that they cannot think of God except as a great Ruler; but we are told that He is the Father of mercies, the God of comfort. Mercies are His children, bearing His image, and comfort is His chief function.

Like as a Mother.

For nobility of patience and tenderness and sacrifice, we turn to the world's mothers. Sweetest and most enduring of all memories are the cradle songs and the evening prayers, and many a gray head has bowed low with trickling tears while the air seemed to vibrate again with the words, "Hush, my dear, lie still and slumber," and "Now I lay me," has breathed perfume from lips that were soon to be silent and sealed in the last long sleep. What true man, and what false man in his true moments, does not echo the words,

"Over my heart in the days that are flown,
No love like a mother's love ever has shone"?

And over and over again the inspired writers speak of our God as a God of love; they hold up His image, not stern and repellent, but full of endearment and entreaty, mother-like in His tenderness and devotion. This doubting, despairing, tired world He is seeking to cradle and soothe. Calvary is God's heart-beat, manifested in human history. Matchless and measureless as is the divine love, it flows alike to every creature. The fierce and angry passions of men cannot repel it; it settles about them like an atmosphere, shot through with sunshine, and softens and refines and transforms. Trouble, disappointment, sickness, and the shadow of death are ministers of His mercy.

*Prayer-meeting topic for April 17.

Children of Consolation.

Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies and God of all comfort; who comforteth us in all our affliction, that we may be able to comfort them that are in any affliction, through the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God (2 Cor. 1:3-5). In one form or another, the word "comfort" occurs in this short passage five times. After that, who will dare to say that God is malign, or indifferent, or absent? Here it is plainly declared that at least one purpose God has in comforting us is "that we may be able to comfort them that are in any affliction." If God is the God of comfort, and we are the children of God, then we must be sons and daughters of consolation. The sun pours forth his energy upon the ripening sheaf, that the sheaf may be crushed and ground, and give food to the sower. So God sheds forth mercy and comfort upon His children, that they may become sources of strength to others; and they can keep His favor, and the riches of His grace, only by sharing them.

Christians are kept from this gracious ministry by the selfishness of sorrow, the monopoly of care. They permit themselves to be eclipsed by the shadow of their own griefs. They pet and fondle themselves; they have no compassion for others, because they expend it all on themselves. Not only so, but they often demand sympathy, when they should be exhibiting it. The Thessalonian disciples are admonished—(1 Thess. 5:11), "Wherefore comfort yourselves together, and edify one another, even as also ye do." Keep on in the practice of this sweet ministry:—

"So others shall
Take patience, labor, to their heart and hand,
From thy hand and thy heart, and thy brave cheer,
And God's grace fructify through thee to all.
The least flower with a brimming cup may stand,
And share its dewdrop with another near."

To the Heart.

Our aim is generally wrong; we aim at the head, when we should search for the heart. "Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned" (Isa. 40:1,2). The word for "comfortably" is rendered in the margin of the revised version, "to the heart of." What professor of oratory will show us how to speak to the heart of the sinning and sorrowing? There is no school for this accomplishment, save the school of Christ. From Him we are to learn the dialect of divine love. "Never man spake like this man;" but may we not hope that after years of faithful discipleship, we may learn His language, and bear His message, and speak as if we too were citizens of the realm celestial?

Prayer.

We praise Thee, O God, for the revelation of Thy love, for the manifestations of Thy mercy. The world is full of smiting storms and crushing cares and pursuing enemies, and we thank Thee for the shelter of the Rock, for the Man who is a covert from the wind. Thou hast healed our wounds and soothed our sorrow, and the heartache is all gone. Enable us, O Father, to share this ministry of comfort, in Jesus' name. Amen.

Editor's Easy Chair.

"Spring is a little backward this year," people said during the cold, cloudy days which prevailed the past week. Why do they say that spring is backward, instead of wondering whether we will have any spring this year or not? But no one is deceived by April snows or frosts. Every one knows that spring is coming. It may be delayed a little while by unusual meteorological conditions, but these must give way to the physical order of things, and Spring will soon be here, waving her green banners in triumph over all opposing forces. People believe this because they believe in the continuity of the established order of things in the material world. When we come to understand that there is a moral order as surely as there is a physical order in the world, men will no longer doubt the triumph of righteousness over evil of every kind. Even Matthew Arnold, despite a too rationalistic tendency, could not fail to see in the world "a power not ourselves which makes for righteousness." This is the victorious power before which all iniquity shall ultimately go down. Not to believe this is the worst form of practical atheism.

This "power not ourselves which makes for righteousness," which Matthew Arnold recognized, is understood by most people to be God, the Creator of all things, who is, to use a Pauline phrase, "over all, and through all, and in all." The tendency among the best thinkers of modern times is not to get God out of the universe, nor out of the world in which we live, but to recognize his presence here in all the ongoings of life, of change, and of history. Time was when religious thinkers were accustomed to see God only in the extraordinary events and the marvelous facts of history. Now they are beginning to see Him as the abiding force in the healthy and normal growth and development of all living things and in those milder and less noticeable changes in thought, in custom, and in law, which make for the world's advancement in civilization. It was this old idea of God as manifesting himself only in supernatural ways that led many believers to think that when any change or advance was accounted for by natural causes God was ruled out of that event, or change, as having nothing to do with it. This is to forget that God uses ordinary as well as extraordinary means for the accomplishment of his purposes, and that his presence is as manifest, at least to the eyes of an intelligent believer, in the former as in the latter.

We have been passing through a peculiar experience here in St. Louis in our city affairs. We have had for four years a very inefficient administration of the business of the city, and it is believed by most of the people of the city to have been characterized by corruption as well as incompetency. In the election last week, the party responsible for this state of things was defeated, as it should have been, but the peculiarity of the situation grows out of the fact that no one acquainted with the inside working of the election machinery doubts that fraud was used by the opposite party on a somewhat large scale. The registration list was padded with names which represented only imaginary beings, and these were voted by repeaters on election day. To what extent this prevailed is yet to be found out by the investigations of the grand jury, which is now at work on it. It is certain that we have fallen upon evil times in our cities, and it may be that matters will have to grow worse before they can grow better. Some time the honest citizens of this and other cities will become aroused to their danger and disgrace, and will rise in their might and hurl from places of power and responsibility the whole brood of unworthy, incompetent, self-seeking, conscienceless ward heelers and bummers who have been parasites, sucking the life out of our municipalities. We doubt if this can ever be done until party lines are ignored and honest men get together to protect themselves and the city against thieves. Municipal reform is the crying need in American politics, and our friendly critic, Mr. Bryce, is evidently right in saying that the one conspicuous failure in American political life is the government of our cities.

The fact mentioned above adds emphasis to the necessity not only of city evangelization but of a greater concentration of religious effort on the part of the churches already planted, for the moral education of the people, for the promotion of all true reforms and for the general advancement of the kingdom of God. Christian union ought to find its first practical illustration in our great cities, where it is most needed, because Satan is more strongly intrenched there. The church ought to be the leader in the redemption of our cities, but this it cannot be without closer co-operation than has yet been realized. Would that the churches of some one city would set an example in this respect, and show to the world what can be done by the joining of the forces of righteousness in order to suppress vice and enforce law, establish order, and promote the highest welfare of the people. Why would not St. Louis, which has had some bitter experience in the way of municipal corruption, be a good place in which to give this object lesson? This last question we submit to the Evangelical Alliance of St. Louis.

Questions and Answers.

What should be the attitude of the church toward those members who persist in attending dances?

An Inquirer.

Indulgence in any questionable amusement or over-indulgence in any amusement is rather a sympton than a disease of the spiritual life. The main point is to get all Christians to view the whole subject of amusement in its proper light and in its proper perspective. Inculcate such a view of life that amusements will be considered not the main thing but as a secondary matter which must under no circumstances be allowed to interfere with duty or usefulness. A person who engages in any amusement, not caring whether it injures his Christian influence or conflicts with his Christian duty or not, has a view of life which is entirely inconsistent with the profession of Christianity and the church should deal with such an one accordingly. It would be a serious matter, however, for a church to exclude from membership one who tried conscientiously to do his duty and made that the thing of first importance, but could not see that the amusement in question interfered with it. What is needed in such cases is patience and instruction.

Were St. John the Beloved and Jesus first or second cousins? If neither, what relation were they?

A Reader.

Jesus and the apostle John, called the beloved disciple, were not related. Probably our correspondent confuses the apostle John with John the Baptist. It is stated that Mary, the mother of Jesus, and Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist, were cousins. (Luke 1: 36.) If this means first cousins (which it does not necessarily) then Jesus and John the Baptist were second cousins.

Was King Edward VII. a Roman Catholic before coming to the throne of England? It has been so stated in one of our Minneapolis papers.

W. H. Knotts.

No, the present King has always been a member of the Church of England. The King's oath of installation contains a declaration of the falsity of the cardinal doctrines of Romanism, but this does not imply that he had ever believed them before. A similar declaration has been required of every English sovereign since the deposition of James II., the last Catholic King of England.

What does the word "governments" mean in 1 Cor. 12:28? Please explain Eph. 6:12. Could we apply this to our nation?

T. F. George.

"Governments" in the passage cited doubtless refers to the gift or capacity of governing the church. The church requires both teachers and administrators, and the capacity to fulfill these functions was considered in the apostolic days rather a gift than an office. Eph. 6:12 means that the enemies of righteousness are not merely "flesh and blood"—that is, not merely individual sinners—but wickedness organized and entrenched in institutions. We do not believe that our nation as a whole is an organized force for iniquity, but it has within it some institutions which answer this description. The saloon is the most obvious.

A writer in the Christian Evangelist recently referred to the discovery of some articles in Egypt as dating from the first dynasty, probably 6500 years ago. Does not the Bible teach that man was created only about 6000 years ago? A Subscriber.

No, the Bible does not teach anything about the date of the creation of man. Ussher's Chronology teaches that Adam was created about 4000 years B. C., but Archbishop Ussher's opinions on that point are not equivalent to divine revelation. The Bible is inspired to give us a history of God's progressive revelation of himself to man, not to serve as a text book in archæology. There is no need for reconciliation between the Bible and science, or for the harmonization of Genesis and geology, for there can be no conflict. The Bible is a book of religion, and religion can no more conflict with science than music can conflict with philology.

The Young Man in the New Century

BY AMORY H. BRADFORD, D. D.

The spirit of prediction is rife at the beginning of the new century. Many are prophesying about the Twentieth Century Church, the Twentieth Century Charity, the Twentieth Century Nation. Those who know the least are most ready to turn prophets. Ignorance is usually the condition of infallibilty. In writing of the place of the young man in the twentieth century I shall endeavor not to lay myself open to my own indictment, for I shall speak rather of his opportunity than of his achievement.

There is no reason to think that the demands on young men in the twentieth century will be essentially different from what they were in the nineteenth. Progress is due to the efforts of no one class. At one time the young are more prominent, and at another time the old. Even the adage, "Old men for counsel and young men for war," is not altogether true. Often the greatest captains have been elderly, and, not infrequently, mature heads have been found on young shoulders.

The most distinguished preachers in the world are beyond sixty years of age. The statesmen who ruled the generation just closed were largely aged men. Bismarck, Caprivi, Crispi, Gladstone, all did much of their best work after they were seventy. Salisbury is more than seventy, and the Pope is over ninety.

Longfellow, in his famous alumni poem, Morituri Salutamus, gives a list of some of the achievements of the elderly. Cato learned Greek at eighty; Theophrastus wrote his characters of men at ninety, and Chaucer his "Canterbury Tales" at sixty; while Goethe, when he finished "Faust," was more than eighty years of age. On the other hand, most of the leaders of the American Revolution were under forty. Both Hannibal and Napoleon led their armies into Italy when they were twenty-six. William Pitt was Prime Minister of England at twenty-four. Raphael died at thirty-seven. Keats "felt the daisies growing over him" before he was twenty-two. Shelley, whose song always reminds one of his "Sky Lark," died before he was thirty. Calvin wrote his "Institutes" when he was twenty-six. Frederick W. Robertson, one of the greatest of modern preachers, laid down his ministry at thirty-eight.

The early leaders of modern missions were impelled by the enthusiasm of youth. Henry Martyn died at thirty-two, and Harriet Newell at about twenty. William Carey was only a young man when he left Great Britain for India. The foreign missionary enterprise in this country was started by four students at Williams College. The Iowa Band, which did so much to make Iowa the Massachusetts of the Interior, was composed of youthful graduates of Yale. The Christian Endeavor Society belongs to youth, while the Student Volunteer Movement, perhaps the strongest missionary force now at work in the world, had its beginning in the consecration of young men.

These illustrations show that modern civilization and Christian progress are due to no one class and to no one age. The pre-eminent preachers and poets of the last part of the nineteenth century entered into their glory as elderly men. The same was true of the statesmen and soldiers. At other times those younger have been equally prominent. These facts teach us that the twentieth century will belong to the young only in the sense that those who are now youthful will shape the beginning of movements which will culminate when they are old.

Another important question is this: Will the young man of the present century be Christian or pagan? The tendency toward paganism is strong, but the true antidote for discouragement is to be found in an intelligent study of the past. Are the students of our schools and colleges less inclined to be earnest and manly than one hundred years ago? Any one at all conversant with the facts must answer in the negative. Contrast the Oxford and Cambridge, and the Harvard, the Yale and the Princeton of a hundred years ago with the same institutions to-day, and there will be no doubt concerning which way the tides are moving. They are all setting toward righteousness and manliness, toward a realization of the duty of intelligence and culture to devote themselves to the kingdom of God.

What are some of the distinctive opportunities which face the young men of the new century? Leaving out of consideration problems of thought, I select three appeals which are singularly earnest at this time.

The first of these is that of human brotherhood. We have reached a condition in national and social development in which further progress is impossible without a new and keener realization of the brotherhood of man. The disturbances among the nations are almost all caused by failure to recognize that we are all of one blood. The Occidental despises the yellow races and the yellow races look down upon the Western people. Social unrest is everywhere due to two causes, disregard of brotherhood on the part of the well-to-do, and race prejudice. The rich grind the faces of the poor. In more than half the nations the Jew is still ostracized. In our own country, both North and South, the treatment of the colored man is one of the enormities of history. Brotherhood has been a dream in the past; it must become a reality or the wheels of progress will cease to move. Those who have grown old in prejudice are hard to change. The hope of the future is in the courage and the clearness of vision of those who are young.

The next task that makes its appeal to young men is the promotion of the unity of the world. Physical forces for the last century have been busy binding the nations together. In place of many small states have grown mighty empires. Progress along these lines has been so swift that no nation can isolate itself, and no nation dare act alone. What more inspiring ideal than that of a United States of the World as there are already a United States of Australia and of America! This ideal will be made reality by the young. The prejudices of the past do not die easily, but they are dying. The young man of the future in a real sense will be a citizen of the world. Patriotism will not cease, but it will be enlarged and glorified. With the realization of unity controversies will be settled by conference and arbitration. War will be what Charles Sumner long since called it, "a relic of barbarism." National unity is already more than a dream; and yet it is far from a reality. Those who realize the brotherhood of man, however, will not be long in hastening the brotherhood of nations.

The evangelization of the world is already the inspiring ideal which is winning the allegiance of hundreds and thousands of the cultured and consecrated of every land. The title of Mr. Mott's book, The Evangelization of the World in this Generation, is a bugle-call in itself. Expansion of the missionary enterprise will largely depend upon the young. As men grow older they grow skeptical as to the value or possibility of such efforts, but youth thrills with anticipation at the prospect of difficult and hazardous undertakings. The missionary method will be greatly changed in a few years. Native workers will have a larger place, and there will be less call for heroism from the outside. The appeal to consecration, however, will only be changed; it will not disappear. I do not dare to predict how swiftly the process of evangelization will move, but I am sure that the world needs the gospel, and equally sure that a new race of apostles and, if need be, of martyrs will be ready to undertake and continue its proclamation.

This, in a word, is my answer to the inquiry, What of the young man in the Twentieth Century? His mission will not be essentially different from what it has been in other centuries. It is good neither for the young nor the old to be alone. Every good cause needs them both. The tendency to paganism among the young is superficial. Unseen currents are setting toward loftier ideals and deeper consecration. Three great appeals are made to young men as the new century is entered: The appeal of human brotherhood, the appeal of the growing unity of the world, and the appeal for a united, universal and enduring effort in behalf of Christian evangelization.

A Morning Song.

By Ira Billman.

My beloved one comes in the morning,
And his presence is morning to me;
Through the night all the earth is adorning,
My beloved, my morning, to see.

While the fields and the woods are awaking,
In the morning my voice shall he hear;
For my heart sweetest music is making,
When my lover, my morning, is near.

When the far-away mountain is purpling,
'Tis my morning is speeding apace,
And my vision will soon be encircling
His all-luminous, beautiful face!

O the joy of the thought of his coming,
My beloved, my morning so fair;
Like the dawn when the blossoms are humming,
And the world is a-wing in the air.

Calcutta Letter.

The death of the Empress of India has been the matter of supreme interest here since its occurrence. It is gratifying to note the apparent veneration that the natives of all classes and religions have for "Victoria the Good." During her illness they anxiously watched for dispatches from England. When her death was announced they spoke of her with bated breath. Sincere mourning is universal among natives, Eurasians and Europeans alike.

Upon the day of the funeral the whole great city was as quiet as though a Puritan "Sabbath" had arrived, a great contrast to the busy and noisy Sundays. All the native workshops and bazars had received notice the day before to remain closed all day. To serve the notice, policemen had gone from street to street beating a drum to attract attention, and then reading the proclamation to one group of men after another. Everyone was in mourning, the natives in white, the Europeans in black. Christian services were held in the morning at the various churches. In the afternoon there was a monster native meeting upon the maidan, or vast open park of the city. The town seemed to empty all its inhabitants there for the occasion. As I passed along College street, one of the chief arteries leading northward to the native quarter, it was one mass of moving humanity. The tram-cars were packed. Hundreds of loaded cabs and private carriages were passing along. Sidewalks and driveways were thronged with men. Only Calcutta, "the tightest packed sardine-box in the world outside of China," could pour forth such living streams of human beings. All were on the way to their memorial service. It seemed a "multitude which no man could number." It was surely a foreshadowing of a good day yet to dawn in India—that meeting of all castes and religions of India's sons to mingle together out of respect to the great Christian Queen.

The following week a memorial service was held in the College Y. M. C. A. building, and packed the large assembly hall with native students. That noble Christian gentleman, Kali Charan Banurji, addressed them, and called attention to the Christian principles that made Victoria great and good.

Even now, a month after the Queen-Empress' death, all social functions are suspended, the ladies of the city are all dressed in mourning and the men are wearing black ties, and black bands upon their hats.

And the spirit of genuine mourning manifested here at the capital prevails over all India. The Viceroy's proposal that funds be raised to erect a national memorial for the Queen has been eagerly acceded to by all classes. Maharajahs, Nawabs, and other native princes and men of wealth seem to vie with one another in their gifts, several of them having subscribed as much as a lakh of rupees, equaling about $40,000, for the purpose. His Excellency, the Viceroy, has proposed that the national memorial to be erected here at the capital take the form of a magnificent Victorian Hall, a building that shall be a museum of Indian and Anglo-Indian history. It is not intended to make it a museum of arts, sciences, industries, or natural history; other existing institutions already provide for such things. Nor is it designed to make it a museum of universal history. Rather is it to contain only such objects and records and tablets and portraits and busts as will illustrate the history of India, native and British. The history of Christian missions is to be given a well earned place beside the political and social and industrial history of India. Lord Curzon deserves credit for projecting a memorial, at once so worthy of the Empress, and of this great domain of her empire. I trust it will be carried to a successful issue.

Aside from this, many districts and communities are raising large sums for local memorials. A most noteworthy movement of this kind is that now voluntarily proposed by a number of native ladies in Calcutta. Feeling an especial interest in the late sovereign as a woman, they have undertaken to raise a large fund by popular subscription from women throughout the country. That all classes of women may have some part in this work, sums as low as one pice, or half a cent, will be received. Great as she was in her life as a unifying power in her vast empire, the Queen-Empress seems destined to be still greater in her death.

India is nothing if not extreme. She is so in her population, her religions, her wealth, her poverty, her harvests, her famines, and many other things. So, when she expresses her grief, she does it extravagantly. Thousands of telegrams of condolence and poems in memoriam have poured into the Home Department here since the Queen's demise. They are still coming; upon a single day this week 950 came. And the language in which they are couched! Truly the Queen is dead, and the Queen's English is being murdered.

One loyal subject thus struggles to express himself: "By the noble demise of her Majesty gloomness extends over whole India, which sorrow pierced my heart, alas what I may write." Another says: "I express my sorrow at the death of Queen-Empress Victoria, and offer up prayers to God that he may place her soul in heaven, and make her successor more successful." A third declares that "her image will be adored as that of a venerable goddess;" while a fourth hopes that she may find extinction of soul in Nirvana.

The poetic effusions have a truly oriental flavor. We are told that—

"All objects, rational and irrational;—
Birds, beasts, fishes and amphibians,
Oceans, brooks, trees, and all objects natural,
Breathe the same feeling, the same condolence."

A second poetic genius breaks forth thus—

"Tell me, ye reck'ners! what yon star could be,
Looking pearl-like in a maiden's bright eye—
A drop of tear to see the world convulsed at demise of the Queen."

The grief of another drives him to an "elegiac poem" from which the following verses are culled—

"Alas! our gracious Queen expired
Who was to all so kind;
So early from this world retired,
And left us all behind.

"Behold! with what a doleful face
Each morn the sun doth rise!
And how the moon at night deplores
Our noble Queen's demise.

"How merrily she passed her days,
How peacefully she reigned,
And how well she improved her realms,
And what she wished she gained.

"'Twas only latterly, just when
Her star was on decline,
That people rising here and there
Began to fight and pine.

"The hearts of all her heirs and friends
Bleed with the pangs of sorrow,
Their tearful eyes are bad to-day
And might be worse to-morrow.

"God bless our Queen Victoria's soul
With thy eternal grace!
Prolong her dear successor's life
Just as a special case."

But enough; Babu English was ever a strange product, and the evident sincerity of many of the curious dispatches and poems should cover a multitude of sins.

A few weeks' experience here has demonstrated the wisdom of the C. W. B. M. in deciding upon Calcutta as the place for our India Bible work for students. I am now teaching four regular Bible classes, giving special Bible lectures on Thursday evenings in the large hall of the College Y. M. C. A. building, besides delivering many other regular and occasional addresses from week to week. And if I were able to undertake it, there is practically no limit to the number of Bible classes and private Bible readings I might be carrying on with the native students. Doubtless other student centers are also needy, but Calcutta is the greatest and most important. Mr. John R. Mott, the international secretary of the students' Y. M. C. A. work, in urging Mr. G. T. Manley, of England, to enter Calcutta for student work rather than Allahabad, said he must not allow the number of workers already here to deter him, for in proportion to the student body, this city had the smallest number of student workers of any of the university centers in the country. Certainly there is room for our proposed work here, and it is being warmly received by both Christian workers and native students.

During the winter Mr. Manley has been giving a series of lectures upon "Christianity and Science," under the auspices of the College Y. M. C. A. Mr. Manley is a young man of rare ability, an ordained clergyman of the English Church, was senior wrangler of Christ's College, Cambridge University, and has since held a professorship there, but he has not been disobedient to the heavenly vision calling him out to this dark land. He is one of nature's noblemen, and it has been a privilege to associate with him in student work. He returns this week to Allahabad, where the English Church is doing a large work among the students. His stay in Calcutta has been greatly blessed.

My own work is at present being done in connection with the College Y. M. C. A. Its faithful and genial secretary, Mr. B. R. Barber, has been a friend in need to me ever since I landed in India. The future seems full of promise for our work in the greatest student center in the world.

BIRD LIFE IN APRIL

By OLIVE THORNE MILLER
Author of "Nesting Time," etc.

"First the blue and then the shower, Bursting bud and smiling flower."
—Mary Mapes Dodge.

April is the battle ground of the seasons in our climate. Not so much "winter lingering in the lap of spring" as the poet has it, as summer pushing forward, impatient to get her buds unfolded and her flowers out of the ground. In this month she usually manages, in the words of the immortal Hosea, to "toss the fields full of blossoms, leaves and birds," her leaves half open and her modest spring bloom ready. Hepatica the pioneer, bloodroot lighting up the shadowy corners, houstonia sprinkling the fields, and arbutus opening sweet eyes under last year's leaves.

About the third week in the fickle month she generally succeeds in giving us a foretaste of what we may expect when she gets complete control, and sets us thinking of mountain and sea-shore. The bird world shares the unrest of the season. A few hardy warblers hurry past us, full of business, the myrtle with his four mystic badges, the pine, with breast of gold and the fascinating black-throated-green, en route for the evergreen forests he loves so well. Two or three linger and finally stay; the modest-clad black and white, the water-thrush of flirting tail, and the oven-bird masquerading as a thrush. But May is pre-eminently the warbler's month.

Now comes the leader of our summer choir, the calm-eyed, silver-voiced wood thrush, making the mornings and evenings glorious for us. But his next of kin, the hermit, steals by in silence, his emotions carefully repressed, his music sealed up in his heart, saving all his sweetness for his wooing ground farther north. Not so chary of his charms is the smallest singer of all—the kinglet with ruby crown. A mere pinch of grey feathers he looks, with a gorgeous crown of ruby when he expands it to sing. He lingers for days in country neighborhoods and even in city parks and pours out his joyous song for our delight. He is well worth many excursions to hear. Especially so as other famous singers are about as well; the misnamed purple finch in all his glory of crimson and snow-white; and the aristocrat of the sparrows, the white-throat, singing as he goes, a song so distinctive that he has a local name wherever he is. By the Anglo-Saxon of New England he is disrespectfully called "Peabody bird," but by an Indian tribe of the same section—according to Mr. Long—"Killooleet" or "Little Sweet Voice."

Now begins the cheery evening song of the whip-poor-will and the brown-robed house wren may be seen bustling about ready for housekeeping and looking for summer quarters. Swallows appear with the first of the winged-insect hosts. The barn, the cliff and the rough-winged swallows and the purple martin look over our premises and choose their places. A few impatient or bold spirits begin building. Some of the hawks and owls are already settled to their summer work, and now the crow and grackle and even the robin and bluebird open the nesting season for smaller birds.

We read everywhere the confident statement that certain birds will do so-and-so and others will do quite otherwise. But it is never safe to predict what birds will do. Besides having marked individuality, and not being the slaves of habit we have considered them, they are constantly changing their ways. Perhaps the spirit of unrest is in the air, but whatever it is that impels us Americans to move on and ever on, the same propensity seems to infect our birds. They are always ready to try new food or new ways to do things. In the single habit of nesting, several birds have radically changed their customs within the memory of man. Swallows and swifts have become almost parasitical on the structures of men. Formerly tenants of hollow trees, caves, niches in rocks and similar natural places, they now flock to our buildings, inside and out. Barn and eave swallows seize upon our barns, rough-wings choose crevices in our public buildings, and swifts pre-empt our chimneys. Purple martins have heretofore confined their dependence on us to houses built for them, but last spring I found a progressive colony comfortably settled in the heart of a noisy city, under the arch of an ornamental terra-cotta cap to the cornice of a business block.

Woodpeckers too have learned to accept our protection and the shelter of our roofs. At least two species have adopted the labor-saving fashion of cutting a door through our walls and establishing themselves within. Wrens are always making experiments to better themselves. They are not at all particular where they set up their domestic gods. They like best a comfortable wren-house, but will cheerfully accept an old hat, or the sleeve of a coat hanging in a shed, a niche in an empty house, or a hole in a post. I have seen a wren's nest in a hollow iron hitching-post in a city street, the birds entering through the hole for the hitching strap. And I have an oriole's pretty grey hammock, that had been taken possession of by a wren, filled with a mass of sticks in wren fashion and used as a nursery for pert wren-babies. Nor are wrens the only ones who appreciate a saving of labor. I have another oriole cradle in which a warbler built her nest and reared her bits of nestlings.

Perhaps the most wide-awake and quick-witted bird to avail himself of improved conditions is the unwelcome alien, the English or house sparrow. However we may deplore his presence, no one can deny him the sharpness of the street gamin and the ability to know a good thing when he sees it. Not only does he avail himself of all the erections of man for his unsightly nests—the niches in the ornamental parts of our buildings, our window sills, over our doors, behind our closed blinds, under our piazza roofs, in our open-work trolley posts, under our electric light caps—but he takes advantage of the industry of his neighbors. He seizes the woodpeckers' laboriously excavated homes, he robs the eave swallows of their adobe houses, he settles himself in every wren and bluebird and martin house he can find, never hesitating to fight for one when he cannot get it without. He even goes so far sometimes as to insist on using the door through which a woodpecker enters her home between our walls, no doubt making a separate nest inside.

Such evidences of progressive ideas on the part of birds are constantly coming to notice. The interest of bird-study is by no means exhausted. There is much to be found out. For what do we really know about the life-habits of even the birds we call common? We know to a fraction the size of the eggs, the length of every feather and the smallest detail of anatomy, because it is easy enough to study dead birds. But who shall tell us of the life? Who has time and patience and understanding and insight to enter into their little lives, to interpret their actions and understand their emotions? Who even shall present their bare facts while sternly repressing his own imagination? Truly this shall require a more profound student than has yet arisen. He who would accomplish this must give his days and nights to it. Evidences of a deeper life than we have given them credit for are constantly appearing to those who become really intimate with individuals. Higginson in his delightful Out-Door Paper says: "The daily existence of every bird is a remote and bewitching mystery." If it has in these latter days become a little less mysterious it is not a shade less bewitching.

The story of a nest and the life about it, faithfully and sympathetically studied, is one of the most fascinating studies I know. It is full of vicissitudes, of joy and happiness, as well as anxieties and cares. Like our own home life, it develops character and brings into view qualities of mind and peculiarities of manner seen at no other time. It inspires the student with intense interest, and no less with profound astonishment at the resemblance of bird-life to the human.

The student of bird-habits needs a good manual to identify, a good glass, a settled notebook habit, an unflinching love of truth, and beyond these plenty of time and patience. Enthusiasm and devotion will grow. With this equipment he will find a whole new world open before him.

The Presuppositions of Our Pioneers.

By George Darsie.

There were certain things which our pioneers took for granted—things that seemed to them so axiomatic and so manifest as to require neither statement nor argument. In consequence they were carried in their minds, were made the basis of their great plea, but were seldom or never given specific formulation. These are called in this article their "presuppositions." And they stand related to the essential points of their plea as the foundation to the building. If our pioneers were mistaken in their presuppositions they were fundamentally mistaken in their cardinal positions. If they were correct in them, the disclosure of that fact makes their cardinal positions the surer and stronger.

1. Our pioneers took nothing for granted more constantly and more confidently than that the Bible is an infallible book. "To the law and to the testimony," was their concise challenge to every doctrine and to every practice. "Thus saith the Lord" was to them an end of all controversy. They might dispute concerning the meaning of an utterance of Holy Writ, but never concerning its truth. They did not dream that God's word could be mistaken. Of course, they well knew that there were sometimes errors in the translation and interpolations in the text of Scripture, but never in the real statements of the sacred writers. They might ask, "Does the Bible actually say that?" but they would have been shocked beyond measure at the intimation that what it says needs correction or modification. Thomas Campbell's famous dictum, "Where the Scriptures speak we speak, and where the Scriptures are silent we are silent," whose public enunciation his biographer declares to have been the sounding of the keynote of our great movement, implies nothing more forcibly than the infallibility of God's holy book. The great aim of our fathers was not to prove the Bible, but to understand it, not to dispel the doubtings of unbelievers, but the blindness of a Christian public who held it as a divine revelation, but needed a clearer vision of its contents.

2. They further took for granted that the revelation of God's will contained in the Bible is a final revelation. They believed that the last "amen" of the New Testament marked the end of God's inspired communications to the children of men until Christ should come again. They looked upon our Savior's last great commission to his apostles as binding upon them and upon us until that time, and as containing in it the substance of all succeeding revelations to the close of the canon. They naturally understood that to be the implication of his great promise contained therein. "Lo! I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." Hence it was that latter-day religions in their eyes were just so many sorts of religious imposture. The varied "isms" of modern times that vex the minds of men and seek to beguile them from the simplicity that is in Christ, were too young by nearly a score of centuries to make good their claims to a divine origin. A revelation of God's will that closed for good and all eighteen hundred years ago could not be even tortured into approval of something which so violates its utterances both in letter and spirit. In the eyes of our clear-thinking fathers nothing not as old as the New Testament, in the realm of religious faith and duty, has any title to the respect and acceptance of mankind.

3. A further presupposition was that the religion of Christ, set forth in the Bible, is a perfect religion. That coming not by evolution but by communication, not through human culture but through divine revelation, it comes to us stamped with the image and superscription of the Most High. They felt able to say, like Paul, "But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of men is not after man. For I neither received of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." And so coming, they held its perfection to be a necessary implication. For the profane and bungling hand of man to touch it with a view to alter, amend or improve it, seemed to them inexpressible sacrilege. They were indeed ready to repeat the twice-named curse of the great apostle upon even an angel from heaven who should preach any other gospel. And thus holding it a perfect religion, with consuming zeal they sought its restoration to the world "in letter and spirit, in principle and practice, in form and power." This was the secret of their sublime confidence in it, and of their amazing power in proclaiming it. In their hearts they felt that it was the great crying need of the race, and that no other blessing comparable to it could be conferred upon it.

4. That this perfect religion was a cure-all for the ailings of the religious world, was another presupposition. No physician ever prescribed for a patient with completer confidence. Many, indeed, were the ailings of the body religious in their day. Feeling them keenly our fathers sought with all diligence to apply the remedy. It was a day of bitter sectarianism. God's people stood ready to proscribe each other for the slightest causes. Churches were split to pieces on the most trivial pretexts. One important body of Presbyterians became two communions on the question of taking a judicial oath. Thomas Campbell was degraded from the ministry because he asked members of other branches of the Presbyterian Church to come to the Lord's supper. Narrowness, bitterness, hatred between different religious bodies everywhere prevailed. Our fathers lifted their voices like a trumpet for the cessation of sectarian strife and for the unity of the people of God, basing their appeal on the restoration of the New Testament gospel and church, the only basis on which they ever can or will become one.

It was, too, a day of creed-bondage. The tyranny of human symbols had become an intolerable yoke. Nothing could break it but the proclamation of the liberty wherewith Christ makes men free, and the substitution of the exceeding broadness of the word of Christ for the cramping shibboleths of human invention. It was no less also a day of religious mysticism. The gospel was supposed to be a great mystery. Men's minds were befogged and confused and deluded on the subject. Human tradition and philosophy had obscured the once plain way of salvation. To restore the simple gospel of the apostles' day was the sure and only remedy. And so different was it, as our pioneers preached it, from the gospel then preached, that it seemed like a new revelation. But what relief it brought, and how eagerly it was welcomed!

5. A final presupposition was that their plea would find universal acceptance. So eminently reasonable and desirable did it seem to them that they were confident it would "take the world," and that speedily. They did not at first think it needful to build any churches, for they believed that all church buildings would easily fall into their hands. It was a rosy view they held, and a hopefulness which, to us as we now look back, causes an involuntary smile. They did not reckon sufficiently on the conservatism of human nature, the hardness of the cake of custom, and the natural hostility of those whose craft was in danger from a plea so radical. And yet their faith in the success and acceptance of their principles was well grounded. Their only mistake was that they looked for results too soon. In the long run their most ardent hopes are certain of realization. Their great plea is taking the world. It has already influenced all religious communities. The whole religious world is showing the leavening of their principles. And the day will come when the universal acceptance of the plea our fathers made will justify the sublime confidence with which they launched it in the world.

The Base of Supplies.

By Baxter Waters.

Jesus' peculiar work consisted in training a few disciples. He gave time to store their minds and hearts with God's love and truth. That being done they would begin at once, and at home, to extend that evangel and to thereby transform other lives.

He did not once recite the conditions of barbarism in Rome, nor of the "lost in Africa" to arouse their sympathies—but rather called attention to the unshepherded multitudes and publicans and sinners. These came under the all-inclusive Lost and must share a Savior's love. He inspired his apostles with such a precious gospel of power and with such a knowledge of God whose mercy knew no bounds and whose love was like a father's, that they burned with a holy zeal to impart it to whomsoever they met. So wherever they went they preached that word. They were mightily concerned now about the Samaritans whom they formerly hated; about publicans and sinners hitherto unnoticed by messengers of God's grace.

These home barriers, these sectional strifes and unbrotherly feelings toward neighbors and different classes must first be broken down before there can be a pure, clear love for humanity, or what we call the "world." The word must have free course and run along lines of least resistance, and through currents which have a source high in the heart of God. Unless we love our brethren—our countrymen—whom we have seen, how can we make up that deficiency by pretending to love some people in a foreign land? Or think ye that we can cover our sins of disloyalty and sectional hatred by doling out offerings to peoples on whom we still look down, and sneeringly call "heathen"?

There cannot be a real missionary spirit unless it begins at home, and finds its expression there, and then extends itself outward indefinitely. The plea for foreign missions is illogical till we have done our utmost for our own land. But we must keep in mind that we make our home forces strong in order to graciously bless all nations and that we can most effectively fulfill that world-wide mission when the base of supplies is enlarged and fortified and made strong. Store the batteries.

1. We should look to it that we do not start so many churches, but rather care for those struggling for existence.

2. We should look to the strategic points—"whither go the throngs." Give heed to Ephesus, Rome and Athens. Special heed should be given to the educational and commercial centers.

3. The growing countries; the new states and territories; the great South awakening to a phenomenal prosperity. Our best preachers and most faithful workers should be supported in these fields, and we should not be afraid to expend generously as well as wisely, knowing that we are setting up a light for the whole world, and believing that "not one good shall be lost." "Give and it shall be given unto you."

Chicago Letter.

Dr. A. K. Parker, for twenty years pastor of the Centennial Baptist Church of this city, has been appointed to a professorial lectureship in the University of Chicago. He will also act as recorder and divinity librarian. His appointment will add considerable strength to the faculty of the seminary, and at a point, too, which has been long weak. Dr. Parker has for many years been recognized as the Nestor among Baptist preachers of Chicago so far as scholarship is concerned, though others have been more popular as preachers. Dr. Parker's church has a four o'clock vesper service instead of the usual night meeting. This arrangement is the wish of the pastor rather than the demand of the community. Dr. Parker will take an extended European trip immediately, and on his return will enter upon his new duties.

At the recent meeting of the Congregational Social Union, the speakers impressed upon the gathering the need of more Congregational Churches, and endeavored to arouse interest in larger gifts for city missions. They now have about 100 churches in this city, and annually expend for support of missions about $40,000. The Presbyterians have voted to spend $100,000 in the next five years in aiding weak churches to become housed in permanent homes. Undoubtedly the greatest hindrance to our work is the absolute lack of any money to supplement the efforts of local churches in building homes. If it could be borne in upon the consciousness of our brotherhood how next to impossible it is to start and build a church in Chicago without foreign aid, it would seem that more money would be forthcoming. The proof that it is "next to impossible" is that it has never been done by us or other religious bodies.

It has been some years since larger and more appreciative audiences at noontime were gathered than are now meeting for six consecutive Mondays at the Central Association building. The attraction is Dr. Coe, of Northwestern University, who is delivering his series of lectures on "The Psychology of Religion." His book, of which the lectures are the substance, has given him a widely known name. His delivery is good and his thought as clear in extempore address as though written. The unlikely still happens. The Methodist Church has given to the world this scholar, whose findings do not comport with the ideas of emotionalism usually accepted by our Methodist brethren.

The Chicago Record and The Chicago Times-Herald have been amalgamated under the name The Record-Herald, with H. H. Kohlsaat editor. Mr. Lawson, former editor and proprietor of the Record, will give his exclusive time to The Daily News, an evening paper. Mr. Kohlsaat has, during the past six years, given the public a clean, independent paper; and thus when in his salutatory he says: "Everything that went to make two frank, nonpartisan, clean, truthful and independent journals will be blended into one, stronger, bolder, and I fervently trust more effective for all that adds to the prosperity and happiness of a community and a people," the best of the public has confidence that he will make his pledge good. Mr. Kohlsaat comes from a family of Disciples. I have heard that he now leans to Christian Science. He has never been identified with our work in this city.

The mayoralty campaign is on in full force. Not for several years has there been so much personal acrimony in a campaign as is displayed in this one. Mayor Harrison is the Democratic candidate, while Judge Haney is the Republican nominee. It is exceedingly difficult for a layman in politics to determine the respective merits of the two aspirants for the mayor's office. Both are machine men, both have practically the same platform, both are enthusiastically supported by good and bad men, both are equally villified, and both graciously claim fitness for the high office. Mayor Harrison is unfortunate in having a record as mayor to be assailed; while Judge Haney is unfortunate in not being able to explain how his name was once Hennesey and is now Haney. The Irish constituency want an explanation. Although there is not much difference in the platforms, Harrison is urging municipal ownership, while Haney is setting forth the need of clean streets and a better police administration. With one exception the city papers are for Haney. Harrison has also won the opposition of ex-Gov. Altgeld. [Harrison was elected by a plurality of 28,000.]

The Monroe Street Church, of which Charles C. Morrison is pastor, has $10,000 raised for its new church. Roland A. Nichols has just concluded a meeting at the Union Church with over twenty accessions. The West Side Church is corresponding with several of our best preachers, with a view to choosing a pastor. Claire Waite is doing a commendable work at Douglas Park. The church there will likely erect this summer a small building on the lots of the Church Extension Society. The Austin Church has engaged a hall seating 600 at 48th Ave. and Indiana Street for its evening service. C. G. Kindred is crowding the building of the Englewood Church every Sunday. W. B. Taylor has concluded his meeting with the Keeley Street Union Church, and is now aiding the Humboldt Park Church in its business affairs. Lloyd Newcomer has closed his pastorate with the Garfield Park Church. He has been supplying for the Irving Park Church, soon to be ministered to by Bro. McKnight. Evanston is still without a preacher. Dr. H. L. Willett addressed the Ministerial Association Monday, March 25, on "The Fallible and Infallible Elements of the Bible." Bro. Tinsley, pastor of the North Side Church, is struggling with its large debt, but is hopeful. This does not seem to be the year of large meetings in Chicago. The additions, however, at regular services have been unusually numerous.

The Methodists of Chicago and the west have lost an able leader and a good man in the death of Dr. Arthur Edwards, editor of the Northwestern Christian Advocate.

George A. Campbell.

Austin Station.

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

One of the most significant occurrences in the political world of late was the turning down of Boss Thomas C. Platt by Gov. B. B. Odell. Mr. Platt wished the Republican party to pass certain police measures through the legislature affecting New York city, and called together his "Sunday-school" at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, for the purpose of lining up the party leaders in favor of the measure. But Gov. Odell gave him to understand that he would promptly veto any bill meddling with the police situation in the metropolis. Mr. Platt found by quizzing his Sunday-school class that they favored the position of the governor in the matter and so advised their leader. Then the leaders decided not to have any such measure presented at least for the present. Mr. Platt for the first time in many years bowed in submission to the will of his party leaders. It plainly indicates that this boss's influence is on the wane. But it may also show that there is a likelihood that he will be replaced only by another—in the person of Mr. Odell—though this is only a surmise. At any rate, many in New York rejoice at the indication of coming freedom from the political boss who has so long held sway in New York. Bossism is fraught with many evils, whether it be in politics, society or religion.

The Rev. Dr. W. S. Crowe, of the church of the Eternal Hope, this city, preached a sermon recently in which he assailed the validity of the resurrection of Christ. He said "had the burial of Jesus been in a plain, common grave, Christian theology might have been different. In the year 70 Titus' army besieged Jerusalem. So desperate was the situation that at last the Roman soldiers broke into the tombs of the wealthy Jews, dragged forth the bodies and rifled them. Henceforth it was perfectly safe to say that Christ's had been safely resurrected." (If the theological statement of Dr. Crowe is to be measured by the accuracy of the English he uses, it cannot stand the test. There is no such word as "resurrected" in the English language.) "Paul was the first to write of Christ's reappearance after death, but Paul never dreamed of any such thing as a bodily reappearance. A physical reappearance would have been a most wonderful thing, a million-fold the most wonderful thing in human history. A thing so wonderful must be done for wonderful reasons. The only adequate reason for it must be to convince the world of Christ's peculiar divinity. If he wished to convince the world by such a marvel, he certainly would have done differently. Christ certainly would have appeared in the palace of Pilate and before the assembled people. The wonder should have been as public as the sunlight. If Christ had come back after three days in the region of the dead he surely would have told his disciples what he had seen and heard. They would have had much curiosity on that point. Jesus would have satisfied their curiosity."

If this is the best argument that can be made against the resurrection of Christ, surely infidelity must have a struggle not to believe. I suppose it is the best; it is put forth by one of the strongest men of that type in this city.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Your question concerning emphasis in preaching is an important inquiry. Preaching without emphasis, if such preaching were possible, would be colorless and therefore powerless. The preaching of the gospel must be emphatic to be effective. But if each fact, truth, principle, precept, promise and warning of the gospel is made emphatic nothing is emphasized. The preacher who attempts to emphasize every word of his discourse becomes monotonous.

Emphasis should be determined by time and place. The message should be fitted to the persons to whom it is delivered. There was great variety in the discourses of the Hebrew prophets. The character of a given discourse was determined by the needs of the people at the time of its delivery. The Jewish prophets always and in every place thundered against sin and plead for righteousness; but the character of the special sins of which the people were guilty varied, and the kind of righteousness, speaking specifically, to which the people needed to be called also varied. Hence the great variety in the character of the discourses of the Hebrew prophets. A similar variety is seen in the preaching of the apostles of the Christ. What a difference between the discourse of Peter on the day of Pentecost in Jerusalem and the address delivered by Paul in Athens! Both Peter and Paul preached the gospel, but to different classes of persons. And what a difference between the discourses of Paul at different times, in different places and to different peoples. Compare his address in Athens with his sermon in Pisidian Antioch. Wise men, as preachers, were these earliest missionaries of the Lord Jesus. They adapted their preaching to the capacities and special needs of their hearers. The wise preacher of to-day does the same thing—he adapts his message to the intellectual capacity, the culture and the special necessities of the people to whom he speaks his word.

"Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God," was the great sermon of Jonathan Edwards. Edwards was born in 1703, and died in 1758. This discourse was delivered in the midst of the great revival in New England, in the eighteenth century. There is a tradition which says that men were so alarmed when Mr. Edwards delivered this discourse that they cried aloud, and some seized the pillars in the church that they might not slip into the awful chasm of a burning hell! I read this discourse last summer in Cambridge to a company of Harvard students. The reading was frequently interrupted, not by cries of fear, but by laughter! There was nothing terrible in that discourse to nineteenth century students in the oldest of our American universities. There is nothing in it to excite terror in the mind of any intelligent person at the present time. Our views of God, man, sin, salvation and punishment are so unlike the views entertained by the people of New England in the first half of the eighteenth century that the sermon excites only merriment. Some one a few years ago endeavored to generate a religious revival in this country by the printing and gratuitous circulation of President Edwards' sermon on "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God." Of course no revival resulted.

But I suppose your inquiry refers definitely to the place of emphasis now in the preaching of the Disciples. If we understand our position, our duty is to preach the word of life to the whole creation; but we want to fit this word to the people of our time, with their peculiar experiences of doubt, belief, fear, temptation. It is, therefore, necessary to study the times in which we live. Do not think that I am blasphemous when I say that the preacher ought to read the daily papers, the monthly magazines and current literature in general, quite as much as he reads the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. In this way he will learn what the people are thinking about, what they are interested in, and what they are discussing. The preacher ought to know where the people place their interrogation points. But he cannot learn all that he ought to know about the people by the reading of current literature. Much can be learned from the daily papers, and the weekly; from monthly magazines and from the books now issuing from the press, but not all. Men should be studied at first hand. Go among the people and talk to them—or better, encourage the people to talk to you. See them in their homes, shops and factories. See them and talk with them in street cars and on railway trains. Do not talk religion. Talk business, talk politics, talk literature, science, art, music, the drama. Ask questions. The more thoroughly one understands people in their daily lives, in their personal experiences, other things being equal, the better, the more effective, preacher he will be. When I say "Do not talk religion," I do not, of course, mean that religion should never be a subject of conversation when you are engaged in a study of the people. I mean to suggest that those whom you seek to understand should be permitted to lead in the selection of topics. Again and again the subject of religion will present itself and you will find out what is thought on that subject—but allow it to come up in such a way as to not interfere with the freest expression of opinion. Do you catch my meaning?

There are those who seem to think that emphasis should be placed to-day in our preaching precisely where it was placed by Alexander Campbell from the year 1823 to the year 1830—that is the time of The Christian Baptist. That is where it ought to be placed. If the people have learned nothing during the last seventy years, and if the editorials in The Christian Baptist embodied Mr. Campbell's idea of what to preach and how to preach it, and if Alexander Campbell were inerrent in his opinions!

But Alexander Campbell himself gave up The Christian Baptist method when he began the publication of The Millennial Harbinger. He saw that The Christian Baptist had accomplished its purpose, that the people had so far changed as to demand, on the part of their teachers, a change of method, and so there came in Mr. Campbell's style and method a marked change.

There has been a great change during the last quarter of a century. Many things in theology have been surrendered which were strongly advocated a few years ago. New questions are now to the front. New difficulties present themselves. The people are interested in a different class of topics. Some of the old questions are yet unsettled, but their form has changed.

Take as an illustration the problem of union among Christians. The points now to be made plain are not the sinfulness of schism, and the importance of union, but the nature of the desired union and the basis on which it can be secured.

The Interdenominational Conference in Japan

By Laura D. Garst.

The third general conference of Protestant missionaries in Japan was held in Oct., 1900, in Tokio. Two previous conferences in 1872 and 1883 respectively, had cheered and strengthened and rendered the workers more efficient. Eleven veterans who were present in 1872 were also in the conference last October. Among these none are more honored than Dr. and Mrs. Greene, the parents of eight fine children, all of whom have had to be separated by the great Pacific from their parents during the period of their advanced education. The weather during this last conference was propitious.

The attendance was large, registrations reaching 500. The meetings were held daily for one week in the Y. M. C. A. hall. The program was well arranged and successfully carried out.

The music was inspiring. One Japanese lady rendered several beautiful and effective solos, showing that the Japanese are capable of development in this direction. Greetings were sent from Chinese Missionaries.

Early morning prayer-meetings and evening consecration meetings were held at different points. Many happy social functions swelled the enjoyable features, none more appreciated than the magnificent reception tendered the conference by U. S. Minister Buck and Mrs. Buck who are staunch friends of and able assistants to the missionaries. It would be better if all representatives of our government to foreign lands were as truly representative of the best in our country as Col. and Mrs. Buck. Among the "general impresssions" of the conference we find such expressions as the following:

"God-called convention;" "answer to prayer;" "appreciative attitude toward the Japanese;" "appreciative attitude of Japnese toward the missionaries;" "watch and pray—harvest time coming;" "nearer to Christ, nearer to each other;" "remarkable for (1) size, (2) fraternal spirit, (3) high standard of papers." The president summed up his impressions in the words: "(1) Optimistic idea; (2) more intimate acquaintance with each other and each other's work; (3) foundation, united prayer; (4) deepening of spiritual life."

In the Japan Mail, the leading English journal in Japan, the convention was eulogized as follows: "The convention will long be remembered for the length of its constituency roll, the breadth of its charity, the height of its aim, the depth of its piety, the unity of its spirit and the glory of its final achievement." The program was far too lengthy to admit of even a cursory review of each paper. We will glance at a few prominent features.

Politics have continued to evolute until conditions now closely resemble the public sentiment of the West. Legal reform has greatly advanced.

International relations are entirely changed by the practical workings of the new treaties.

Japan is in a fair way to dominate in far eastern questions.

Growth of population from 37 1-2 millions in 1884 to 43 1-4 millions in 1897.

Army more than doubled. Navy quadrupled. One of the happiest signs in is the effort to simplify the language, largely abolishing Chinese characters, which have been an unbearable yoke on the present and previous generations. Rather than the "new national consciousness" being credited with marked advance in many desirable directions "the new conception of the value of the individual" would seem to have been the chief motive power.

Japan is growing into close sympathy with the western world. Her doubts and hesitations are those of her sister nations in the west. When they have fought their way through to clearer and fuller faith, Japan will stand at their side and share in their victory.

In a paper on

attention was called to the fact that the total working force of 1,345 workers (native and foreign) gives but one worker to every 34,000 of population approximately. Necessary deductions for those on furlough and in other lines of work bring the proportion down to 1 to 100,000 population. A puny force indeed!

Sixty-seven places are occupied. Only five cities have over 20 resident missionaries in them. Some of the prefectional capitals are still unoccupied.

Under the head of Woman's Evangelistic Work we find in 1899, 260 workers, foreign. Of the 43 ken or states, only 28 are occupied, 15 remain to be entered.

Day schools and the temperance work were noted as specially successful departments of the work by and for women.

"The past 25 years have seen 20,000 women brought into the Christian Church, familiar with their Bibles and earnest in their lives."

The large annual prayer service, held at different prominent points, was attended in 1900 by 600 Japanese sisters.

More touring was earnestly recommended. The only difficulty in carrying out such recommendations lies in the pitiful scarcity of workers. If one department is properly worked another must suffer.

Work in the Lin-Chin Islands was commented upon. Began in 1846 and after long years of peculiar discouragement, abandoned for 40 years. Resigned in 1891. Such is the influence extending from the three homes of evangelists that the remark is made: "These Christians must have something that we know nothing of; whoever heard of one of us being kind to the poor or helping a man out of trouble?"

The Ainu are the aborigenes of Japan. They inhabit the northern island of Yezo. Are but 17,000 in number. Are dying out and the language becoming obsolete. Some of their "guardian deities," supposed to possess souls, are skulls of animals, feathers, birds' nests, snakes' skins. The bear is their special god. Also foxes, wolves, moles, mice, eagles, kites and many other animals and birds are worshiped.

In the papers on Boys' and Girls' Schools, nineteen schools for boys were reported and sixty for girls, with 5,000 pupils in the latter. Schools are not self supporting, though the majority of pupils are. Poverty in Japan being all but universal, and the fact that the military or samurai class have not yet been educated to work, accounts for this.

The Government Opposition to schools, which occasioned such depression among the workers, has come out for, rather than against, the ultimate good of the cause. The rigid inspection has brought them into prominence and better repute.

In the report on Y. M. C. A. work attention was called to the fact that 50,000 young men in higher institutions of learning need to be reached by any and all methods. Necessity for "settlement" work and "homes" for students was emphasized. There are 34 associations and 900 members.

Sunday-school work was urged and the fact brought into prominence that multitudes of children in Japan are being filled with Christian hymns and Scripture and being helped to a better life thereby. In one city, where Mr. and Mrs. Madden are stationed (Sendai), one-tenth of all the children are in Sunday-schools and at Christmas time one-fifth are brought under their influence.

Strong desire was expressed for a joint hymnal. One thousand hymns have been translated. It was thought unity, which is so desired, would be promoted if the Christians used largely the same hymns instead of denominational ones.

In the report on Bible and Tract Society work it was noted that the "first copies of the gospels were printed on blocks, cut secretly and kept hidden away; and the completed books were delivered at night in small quantities to avoid detection."

A beautiful Bible was sent the Emperor in 1860, but was not presented till 1872. In 1895, by the co-operation of Marquis Ito a magnificent copy was presented to His Majesty. Two million Bibles and Scripture portions have been sold and distributed in Japan.

In the line of medical missionary work the work for the poor was strongly emphasized. In the city of Osaka are 100,000 people too poor to bear the ordinary expenses of illness; this is more than the "submerged tenth."

As against $80,000,000, or $1 per capita, spent in the United States for charity (medical) and $50,000,00, or $1 35 per capita, in England, Japan shows but $75,000, or one-sixth of a cent per capita. "With but one exception there is not a free asylum for the insane in the country, and with but two exceptions there are no charity hospitals open for the benefit of the poor, there are no free asylums for the blind, deaf and dumb, nor homes for the leper."

Japan spends her millions on her army and navy that she may be classed as a military power and take rank among the nations of the earth.

Temperance work is increasing all the time. Thirty societies are associated in the league.

Under Works of Christian Benevolence we would quote one paragraph:

"We would call attention to the fact, not that Christianity has established a score of orphanages, three leper, three blind asylums and three rescue homes, and three prison gate missions, a score of hospitals, six charity kindergartens, three homes for the aged and one social settlement and at least 200 schools for the poor; but that within the lifetime of a single generation it has set the pace for all forms of practical benevolence and stirred a whole nation from emperor to ex-eta (Japanese pariahs formerly denied the rights of human beings, L. D. G.,) to take an interest in all that tends to purify society."

The matter of self-support; training schools for Bible women; evangelization of Japan in the present generation; kindergartens; Sabbath observance; spiritual life of the missionary; desirability of having an early revision of the Scriptures and many other themes were ably presented and earnestly discussed. Among resolutions we would note one of grateful acknowledgment to his majesty the emperor for the benefits enjoyed by the missionaries under his enlightened reign, and one in which the conference "proclaims its belief that all those who are one with Christ by faith are one body; and it calls upon all those who love the Lord Jesus and his church in sincerity and truth to pray and to labor for the full realization of such a corporate oneness as the Master himself prayed for on that night in which he was betrayed."

A promoting committee was formed to arrange plans for the formation of a representative standing committee of the missions, whose duty it would be to re-arrange territory and workers in Japan, so that by a wiser distribution of forces the ground could be more efficiently covered, such plans to be submitted to missions including not less than two-thirds of the entire number of Protestant missionaries working in Japan.

Such gatherings as this conference are necessarily rare in foreign lands and are most helpful.

Bits o' Broken China.

By W. Remfry Hunt.

This is the second century in which the earth-hungering powers have been scrambling, panting, tumbling, and almost fighting for the best pieces of this antique clay. "Hard to crack," is the remark heard on all sides of this confused so-called concert. Yes, valuable China is not easy to procure at any time. Just now there is a good deal of counterfeit pottery on the market. The pink barbarian has come to China to buy, steal, loot, or shoot, and that as time, place, and circumstances admit. It is even thought to be a matter of surprise if the yellow man who is in possession reserves to himself the right of putting a price on his wares. The following is about the dialogue indulged in between these diametrically opposite natures in the human species:

Pink Intruder.—"Well, John, what have you got for me this morning?"

Yellow Owner.—"Some fine tea in now; all ee same b'long Ching chong kind, and sposee me—"

Pink Intruder.—"No wanchee tea, John, me catchee little port, all more better, can do!"

Yellow Owner.—"Hail celestial fortunes! Why you no savee [know] the Christian Kaiser, the Mellican Sammee, the big brother-devil, Johnee Bull, and the ugly bear 'cross Siberia, they all come makee call on me, allee same wanchee little port."

Pink Intruder.—"No, Johnee, I think you no savee proper. China fall down, foreign devil come along, say, 'Johnee, me pick you up, if you give me a pretty "bay-window" to look out of your nice house?'"

(The yellow man sees the scheme and is awakened! The pink visitor suggests a game of the new diplomatic card trick.) Treason! Invasion!! War!!! The pink mask is lifted!

"Heads I win! Tails you lose!" cries the lion and eagle-bannered chief. China cracks and the scramble goes on.

What Most Interests Me Now

By J. S. LAMAR

VII.—The Parable of a Baby's Feet.

How sin entered into the world is a question of fact. Why it is permitted to remain here is a question of reason, and is related to that fact. These questions are difficult of solution even in themselves, but the difficulties are multiplied by the complications brought into them from traditional speculative doctrines and from prima facie views of certain passages of holy Scripture. Consequently it is not easy to approach the consideration of them with a mind perfectly free from bias, and to view them in their own uncolored light. In the very outset of our investigations we may take it for granted that no conclusion can be correct which does not fully recognize and embrace the truth of the following statements:

1. That, from His very nature, God could not have been the author of sin; could not have introduced it into the world; nor have willed its commission; nor have approved of it when committed.

2. That the Almighty Ruler of the world, having all wisdom and knowledge, knew that sin was coming; saw its approach, and all the awful consequences, immediate and remote, that would result from its entrance.

3. As his power and authority were absolute and universal, he could, if he deemed it best, have kept it out; he did not do it.

These statements being postulated as unquestionable, the problem is to account for the introduction and prevalence of sin consistently with them and with each of them. To many persons this problem seems complicated and difficult; and in the hope that it will at least light up the approach to it, I present for consideration a baby's feet. It may not be proper to class this as a parable, but whatever it may be called, I trust it may be useful as an illustration.

At its birth the baby has tiny little feet—fat, rosy and delicate. They are very beautiful, and they excite our admiration. But if we are at all acquainted with their internal structure—the number and arrangement of their bones and muscles and nerves and tendons, and how they are jointed to the legs—we are obliged to see something more than beauty of form and delicacy of tint; that those little feet, so skillfully designed and constructed, indicate clearly that their maker predetermined that in due time the baby should stand upon them, with head and body uplifted towards heaven, and walk on them, rather than creep and crawl on all-fours, like an ordinary animal. This is patent to everybody. The mother recognizes it; and just as soon as it may be done, she begins to co-operate with the design of the maker in carrying out his purpose. She stands the baby on his feet and supports him, until gradually he is taught to stand alone. Presently by leading and bracing him, and by lifting and placing his feet for him, she instructs and trains him in the art and mystery of taking steps one after another.

Before long, with the seductive enticement of out-held hands, and with stimulating words of encouragement and persuasion, she prevails upon him to make the journey from a near-by chair to her arms—all alone. It is a journey of a single step, but it is grand and heroic. It marks the birthplace of self-reliance. It is the first step towards real manliness. The boy is proud of it, and the mother is happy over it. Well she may be. For if that boy is ever to lead a manly life, to enter into a man's enjoyments, to engage in a man's pursuits, to perform a man's work, or to acquire a man's distinction and honor, he must walk; God made him to walk, and meant for him to walk.

So far all is well, and all is plain. But soon now trouble comes. The little boy is able to go about by himself and he grows venturesome and reckless. The mother cautions and warns and forbids, but it avails little—and a commotion is sure to come. The baby is down—he has fallen prone upon his stomach; he has bumped his head; there is a great puffed place upon his forehead; and, mercy on us, his nose is a-bleeding! The whole household is aroused; the mother is agonized; the servants rush for water, for towels, for camphor, for turpentine, and the excitement is great—not to say tremendous! Needless to say, this first serious mishap is but the beginning of sorrows. From this time on, the calamitous reports will come thick and fast—from the hall, the stairs, the kitchen, the back yard, the garden, the street—falls, bumps, wounds, bruises and piercing screams—and all because that child's feet were made by the Creator and trained by the mother to walk, and to walk in the upright human way.

Kittens and puppies are not given to much falling. They are braced up all around—two legs before and two behind, two on the right side and two on the left. But the baby falls, and suffers for it—suffers keenly. The mother's heart grieves over it; and I believe the loving Father up yonder, who not unmoved beholds a sparrow fall, grieves with her, and is sorry for the suffering baby.

But does she blame herself for having taught and trained him to walk? Does the Divine maker repent that he designed and created him to walk? I trow not. For well He knows, and she knows, and we all know, that, notwithstanding his stumped toes and bruised heels and repeated falls and wailings, it was better and nobler for him to walk erect like a man, rather than low down and prone like a beast.

Crude and imperfect as my little parable may be, it will not require much expounding. Every one will see that the gift to man of a composite nature, involving conscious individual selfhood and free will, is analogous to the baby's feet, and the parallel can be traced from the start onwards, through all the consequences and responsibilities. If the gift led to sin and suffering, such was not the designed result, and it was a good gift, bestowed for highest ends and objects notwithstanding the evil consequences following from its abuse.

But some one may think that the solution of the problem would not be so simple and easy as I have represented it if I had not left out an important element, the introduction of which might greatly complicate it, and perhaps essentially modify the answer. It is true that the influence attributed to the serpent in the garden is entitled to careful consideration and ample treatment. This I hope to bestow upon it in the following chapter.

The Bible and the Inner Light.

I was very much interested in reading the article on the "Theology of Experience" which appeared in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Feb. 28. Since reading that I have read an article in The Outlook on "The Age of Faith."

The writer says: "The notion that the church can authoritatively determine what is true, and that to refuse acceptance of its teaching is an offense ecclesiastically punishable, still lingers in some Protestant Churches, but the difficulty of enforcing even by ecclesiastical penalties the authority of the church grows every year greater, and heresy trials grow increasingly unpopular." The authority of the church is growing less.

Speaking of the Bible as an authority the writer says: "The authority of the Bible still continues to be maintained as final and conclusive in many circles, but it cannot be doubted that the new criticism, which is really a new method of interpretation, has gone far to undermine the old authority of the Bible as an infallible text-book and that when this new method of interpretation has become generally accepted, the authority of the Bible in the old sense of that term will also be gone." "Is man to look within himself or without himself for the final arbiter?"

The writer claims for first place as an authority the "Inner Light." In your article you said, "Some have gone to one extreme and some to the other." The question, which is the greatest authority, the Bible, or the Inner Light, has appealed to me as one of great importance. To save us from the danger of extremes could you not give us an article on the "Authority of the Bible" and the "Inner Light," showing their relation to each other?

Three years ago I left the Methodist Church. I had no knowledge of the Christian Church till about a year before I left the M. E's. It was your paper that saved me from going back to the Methodists again, its spirit was so unlike the people I met. They were narrow, formal and spoke as if they had all the truth. I was disappointed and almost out of heart, then a copy of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST came into my hands. It was firm and liberal, open to receive the truth from whatever direction it might come, and I thanked God that all of our people were not like those I had met.

Our Budget.

—This is seed-sowing time. Let us both broadcast the gospel and drill it in.

—Never was America so well prepared for the pure gospel as now, and never were we so well prepared to give it this gospel.

—"As goes America, so goes the world." In his Lexington address, Dr. Strong pointed to this motto on the home mission map, and added, "And, as go the cities, so goes America."

—We feel disposed to add to the above, "And, as go the churches in the cities, so will go the cities." That is, if the churches continue to pull apart instead of concentrating their strength against unrighteousness, then the cities will likely continue to go in the same direction, namely, to the devil.

—Bro. B. T. W. Campbell, who has recently moved to Prairie Grove, Ark., writes that our church of sixty members at that place was not meeting for service. He hopes that some preacher may give them a call and stir them up in the work of the Lord. The state evangelist of that state will no doubt take notice.

—The Bethany Christian Church of Evansville, Ind., has issued a neat directory with an interesting historical sketch, showing how from a mission school begun in a private house, this second church in Evansville has grown by leaps and bounds into its present condition of prosperity. Wm. A. Bellamy is the present pastor, and the church has made a healthy growth under his labors.

—The recent election in St. Louis increased the amount set apart for library purposes so as to make an annual income of $150,000 in order to meet one of the conditions of Mr. Carnegie's gift of $1,000,000. No doubt the proper sites will be secured, and St. Louis will have one of the best equipped library systems of any city in this country. It is believed that the central library building will be located on the present site of the Exposition building and will be surrounded by a beautiful little park making an agreeable change from the present building.

--We regret to learn through a letter from R. L. McHatton, now in Kansas City, that our venerable and esteemed brother, L. B. Wilkes, is very seriously ill at his home in Stockton, Cal. Bro. Wilkes is best known, perhaps, in Kentucky and Missouri, and in his adopted state, but his reputation is as wide as the brotherhood with which he has been so long identified. We are sure we but voice the sentiment of a mighty host of our readers in expressing our high appreciation of his character and ability, and our sincere sympathy with him in his affliction, and our prayer that, if it be God's will, he may be spared to us yet awhile. It would, no doubt, cheer his heart to hear from his old friends.

—Col. Judy and his wife, Mrs. Kate A. S. Judy, of Tallula, Ill., recently celebrated their golden wedding. Sister Judy writes: "I had often expressed the wish that all the flowers would not be kept back for my casket. When we opened the boxes our rooms were filled with their fragrance. Bright and beautiful as they were, each brought something far more precious for us. As the resting time comes we do so much enjoy the bouquets of love and friendship our friends have given us all along the way. It has been said that a sure sign of old age is to see one living in the past. According to that we are not old; we live in the present and the future. We enjoy the present and have bright hopes for the future, here and hereafter. We have lived to see a great deal of history made, but we are looking forward and upward for greater things. Some talk of the 'good old times'; give me the good new time." It is beautiful to grow old thus gracefully, so full of hope an dof cheer. Our hearty congratulat ons are extended to our dear friends with the sincere wish that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST may have the pleasure of recording the celebration of their diamond wedding.

—J. C. Coggins, pastor of the Tabernacle church, Decatur, Ill., has accepted an invitation to deliver the Decoration Day address, May 16, at Thorn Grove, Tenn.

—The dedication of the new church at Albia, Ia., by L. L. Carpenter, has been postponed, on account of the weather, to May 5, writes the pastor, R. H. Ingram.

—As the lovely month of May approaches, the thoughts of our churches lightly turn to home missions and the annual offering therefor. It is time, therefore, the churches were well under way with their preparation for the May offering. We shall have something special to say about this offering next week.

—In the "Bits o' Broken China," by W. Remfry Hunt, elsewhere, he very briefly sums up the situation in China in the dialogue which he introduces in Chinese dialect. No doubt the "Mellican Sammee" would repudiate the idea attributed to him of his wanting a "little port" in China, but "allee same" the average Chinaman no doubt thinks he does, as he puts all the "foreign devils" in the same class.

—A letter in the same paper, Central China Christian, from Robert E. Lewis, of Shanghai, compliments Dr. and Mrs. Osgood for the splendid help rendered during their enforced residence in Shanghai. "He has been teaching a class of college graduates in our evening school various books of English literature; he took charge of the Chinese bicycle club; he conducted the gymnastic class; he took charge of the singing at our gospel meetings; in short, he rendered invaluable service to the work among Chinese young men in Shanghai." Mr. Lewis is the general secretary of the association work and in their behalf expresses this appreciation of Dr. Osgood's work while in Shanghai. The association expressed its appreciation to Dr. Osgood in a more tangible way the night before his leaving —The Get-Together Club, one of the organizations of the League for Social Service, of which Josiah Strong is president and William H. Tolman, secretary, recently held a meeting in Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, at which 400 members sat down to dinner, and after the dinner in ten minute speeches told what they are doing as employers to improve the conditions of the men in their employment. There are about 1,000 earnest, thoughtful business men in this Club and it cannot be but that their meeting together to discuss ways and means of improving the condition of their employees will result in great good. We welcome this as one of the hopeful signs of the times. Who can doubt what conclusion these intelligent men, comparing notes, would reach on such a question as whether it pays, from a purely business point of view, even, to pay employees wages that will enable them to live decent, healthy lives, and to seek to promote their mental and moral welfare? The twentieth century will see much more of this sort of conference.

—Some very hard things have been said against Christian Science, but Mrs. Eddy's message to the new church dedication at Chicago last Lord's day was about the severest. Among other things she said to her followers, "Destroy fashionable lunacy." The description is accurate, but one hardly expected it from that source. Apropos of this appropriate name is the report from New York of a miracle wrought on the corner stone of a new "Church of Christ, Scientist." It had been engraved, "New York Church of Christ, Scientist," by direction of the trustees, but just before the laying of the stone, Mrs. Eddy wrote them that the name was wrong; that New York should not be on the stone. Here was a dilemma. But prayer and Christian Science were equal to the crisis. Lo, on uncovering the ponderous stone, which had been shipped from the state of Mrs. Eddy, New York was not on it, nor was it in the plans! After this, any one doubting the divine authenticity of Christian Science will deserve to be deprived of the new revelations it brings.

—One hundred and fifty members of the Disciples' Club of Greater New York met recently at the First Church of Christ, Sterling Place, Brooklyn, in their fourth annual dinner. Francis M. Applegate presided, and acted as toastmaster. The special address of the occasion was made by J. M. Philputt, of the Lenox Ave Church. Carey E. Morgan, of Richmond, was expected, but sickness in his family prevented his presence.

—The Commercial of Mattoon contains a red hot sermon by H. M. Brooks, of Tuscola, Ill., on "The Labor Question," delivered some time ago at a Ministerial Institute. He deals with our social conditions and the remedy. Unlimited increase of wealth, unlimited ownership of land, bringing about a new form of industrial slavery, selfishness, the enslavement of the ministry, are some of the evils denounced. The remedy he points out is the enactment of laws to restrain a few men from owning the earth, and giving the land to the people, and a free ministry to convert the world to Christ and to his view of wealth and of the rights of men.

—S. B. Moore, who recently closed a very successful work with the Compton Heights Church in this city, on his way down the Mississippi river in a steamer via Memphis, to his new field of labor in Atlanta, Ga., wrote a letter for our readers which we are compelled to condense in order to insert this week. He speaks of the changes incident to human life in general and a preacher's life in particular. After two pleasant pastorates —one in Galesburg, Ill., of three years, and one in St. Louis of two and a half years, his face was once more turned toward the land of Dixie. He says of the Compton Heights Church that "it enjoys a splendid location, being in one of the best residence sections of the city. Its membership is composed largely of young people, many of whom are as consecrated and faithful as I have ever known. It is only seven years old, but has already won its way to the front rank and bids fair to become a strong church. Its growth in numbers has been steady from the beginning." The church made both numerical and spiritual progress under Bro. Moore's labors, and he endeared himself to its members and to our preachers here, who follow him with prayers and best wishes for his success in the enterprising southern city to which he has gone.

—We call the attention once more of the friends of the Bible College at Columbia, that there are yet only a few weeks left to save the endowment of over $40,000 subscribed to that enterprise. The few who have manifested a special interest in this movement to teach the Bible to the students of our state university cannot fail to see that the growing attendance at the university, which will probably reach 1,500 this year, greatly emphasizes the value of the Bible College. We appeal to men of wealth in the state not to let slip from our grasp this most strategic position we have ever occupied, educationally, in Missouri. It is the one practicable solution of our educational problem in this state.

—The Christian ministers' meeting at the office of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on Monday morning, in the absence of the regular, was turned into a report of the Easter services of the previous day, and a general discussion of religious services and the midweek prayer-meeting. Very encouraging reports came from all the churches. About 25 additions were reported, and the combined offerings for the Orphans' Home in the city amounted to between $400 and $500, with some of the churches to hear from. Plans are being carried out to secure pastors for two of our mission churches. Bro. Fannon, of the First Church, is to begin a meeting for the West End Church, Bro. Bartholomew, pastor, on next Monday evening. Greater unity and greater zeal are very manifest among the St. Louis churches.

—Dr. D. K. Pearsons, the Chicago philanthrophist who has endowed many educational institutions, passed through our city a few days since on his way to visit Drury College at Springfield Mo., which is one of the objects of his beneficence. A record of his gifts to colleges contains the following: Beloit College, $595,000; Chicago Theological Institute, $280,000; Colorado College, $200,000; Lake Forest University, $125,000; Whitman College, in Oregon, $120,000; Knox College, $100,000; Drury College, Springfield, Mo., $125,000; Yankton (S. D.) College, $100,000; Pacific University, Ore., $60,000. Dr. Pearsons never attended school a day in his life, but he evidently believes in education. To a reporter of the Republic he said:

"After practicing rigid economy for seventy years I asked myself what I should do with my money. I couldn't carry it out of the world in my dead hands and coffins were not made to carry money in. For that reason I turned my attention to sixteen different colleges. I did not establish new ones. We have enough. I wanted to provide a place for the poor boys and girls in the colleges, and that is the reason I have been giving my money away."

He also said to the reporter:

"I am not a benevolent man. I am the most economical, close-fisted man you ever put your eyes on. You can tell it by my face. It's there. I never went to a horse race or a foot-ball game or a base-ball game in my life. What I am doing is done on business principles."

We only hope that a number of our wealthy men may decide to put into practice the same "business principles." There is probably no better way for a man to dispose of any surplus means for which the Lord will hold him responsible than devoting it to the cause of Christian education.

—The Central China Christian speaks of Shanghai as "the great commercial and political metropolis of the far east." Speaking of it as a center of evangelistic work it says: "Here are gathered the merchants, diplomats, artisans and literati of the land. To Shanghai the elite of the land must come, and from Shanghai goes out an influence all over the empire. It is a miniature western emporium." It is also said to be "the key to the rich and densely populated Yangtse Valley." This city has been selected as one of the centers of our mission work where Mr. and Mrs. Bentley, with some native workers, are sounding out the gospel.

IS IT AN EPIDEMIC?

Vital Statistics Show an Alarming Increase in an Already Prevailing Disease—Are any Exempt?

At no time in the history of disease has there been such an alarming increase in the number of cases of any particular malady as in that of kidney and bladder troubles now preying upon the people of this country.

To-day we see a relative, a friend, or an acquaintance apparently well, and in a few days we may be grieved to learn of their serious illness or sudden death, caused by that fatal type of kidney trouble—Bright's disease.

Kindey trouble often becomes advanced into acute stages before the afflicted is aware of its presence; that is why we read of so many sudden deaths of prominent business and professional men, physicians and others. They have neglected to stop the leak in time.

While scientists are puzzling their brains to find out the cause, each individual can, by a little precaution, avoid the chances of contracting dreaded and dangerous kidney trouble, or eradicate it completely from their system if already afflicted. Many precious lives might have been, and many more can yet be saved, by paying attention to the kidneys.

It is the mission of the Christian-Evangelist to benefit its readers at every opportunity and therefore we advise all who have any symptoms of kidney or bladder trouble to write to-day to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a free sample bottle of Swamp-Root, the celebrated specific which is having such a great demand and remarkable success in the cure of the most distressing kidney and bladder troubles. With the sample bottle of Swamp-Root will also be sent free a pamphlet and treatise of valuable information.

—The Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip will celebrate its thirteenth anniversary May 4. The first chapter of the Brotherhood was organized in Reading, Pa., May 4, 1888. It has spread into Canada and to Japan and India. About 600 chapters with 15,000 members found in 23 denominations have been enrolled, while many others have probably been organized and are in existence. Fellowship and loyalty are its two watch-words. Like Christian Endeavor it is organized for work in the local church. It is an effort by young men to reach young men with the gospel.

—Father Barnabe, an Alsatian missionary, who is represented as a leading authority upon Palestinean archæology, has been making some investigations of Mt. Tabor and claims to have identified that mountain as the scene of the transfiguration of Jesus. Quoting from an account of his discoveries by C. H. Levy in the Globe-Democrat, "Father Barnabe holds that the tradition which located the transfiguration on Mt. Tabor is one of the best founded of all traditions, going back to the very first century of the Christians. Origen, Eusebius, St. Cyril of Jerusalem and St. Jerome are unanimous in proclaiming Tabor as the mount of transfiguration. Attentive study of the accounts in the three gospels of the transfiguration points toward Tabor, although it is not named." It is claimed that Father Barnabe, by excavating, has discovered the walls of an ancient church building which, in style and character, dates back to the oratories of the fourth and fifth centuries. Father Barnabe's conclusion is not in harmony with the general trend of modern opinion and investigation, which point rather to Mt. Hermon than to Mt. Tabor. How far this conclusion may be modified by Father Barnabe's alleged discoveries remains to be seen.

Our Double Mission.

As a people we have a two-fold mission. In common with other evangelical bodies we have an urgent mission to the unsaved. We must seek their salvation and by every possible means, for the sake of their own souls, interest them in the message of the gospel. This is our first and final work—the end to which everything else must be tributary.

But in addition to this we have a mission to the saved as well. In this respect our work is unique. We have a mission to the religious world, a plea to make that must be made. Never has that plea been more needful than at the present time. It is this that gives potency to the call of home missions, for in home missions as nowhere else, we are working out our two-fold mission. There is no better preparation among us to be made for successful world-wide evangelism than aggressive home missions. The successful discharge of our mission to the divided religious world is antecedent to all other successful work. It has been readily demonstrated that just now more can be accomplished by the same amount of money for the evangelization of the world by our home missionary board than anywhere else. America is for us the greatest mission field in the world. Here it is at our very doors with its thronging cities, its rapidly-growing west, its thickly populated east, its new south, and withal its freedom from old-world ideas, welcoming the simple, rational gospel we have to give.

This field ought to appeal to us as no other field can. While our work here has been rapid compared with others, so rapid as to cause comments from religious statisticians, yet it is only a fragment compared with what it might do, if we should make a united, earnest effort all along the line. The great cities have until recently been almost untouched. Even those in which we have made greatest advances are far from being adequately evangelized by us. Chicago, with its teeming thousands, has more than ten times as many Methodist churches as our own. Cleveland is usually considered one of our strongholds, and yet it has only seven self-supporting churches. We have reached the time when we must undertake larger things. But to do this we must untie the hands of our home board.

I cannot resist the feeling that just now this work should have the priority. The time may come, indeed it is to be hoped that it will come, when home missions should be secondary to other lines of work, but that time is not now. Every consideration demands that this work should have our supreme attention at the present time. When our board has held up the motto, "Home missions to the front," and has emphasized the "priority of home missions," they have been striking the right note. Every church in the brotherhood should make an offering next May for home missions. It is our immediate imperative work. AUSTIN HUNTER.

The Spirit on Pentecost.

A question was recently asked regarding the gift of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. The answer was very unsatisfactory to me. To my reading nothing is plainer. The apostles were commanded to await the day appointed; they were all assembled; the Spirit came and they began to speak with tongues as the spirit gave them utterance. This was the gift. Without this gift they were dumb. The gift of tongues was what they needed. With this gift they could go to all nations and preach in the language of the people. They may have received other gifts; how much more was in the gift is not known. Having the gift of tongues they soon became a power for good. We see Peter sent by the direction of the Spirit to tell Cornelius what to do. Here we get a lesson as to what the gift of the Spirit did not do. It did not purify his heart for it took the vision (Acts 10:9-19). When he returned to Jerusalem he was met with comment, hot and heavy, for having gone into Cornelius' house, as he was a Gentile, and that is further proof that they all were full of prejudice. We must conclude that character is what we make it. When we hear people praying for the gift of the Spirit it is only proof of the empty soul. If our union with Christ is perfect we will not be calling for the Spirit. Ye are the temple of God. If God dwells with us we will not feel so needy or empty. If the temple is cleansed his Spirit will come in and dwell with us and remain until we defile the temple.

R. M. COSBY.

Indianapolis, Ind.

[A part, at least, of Bro. Cosby's position is well taken. But in regard to the gift of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost we demur. It was not merely a linguistic endowment. Not only was there less need for the knowledge of many tongues at that time than in any other age since the confusion of Babel, because of the spread of the Greek language, but we have no record that such a gift, the miraculous use of foreign languages, was ever again employed. When Paul speaks of the gift of tongues, he evidently means something quite different. Bro. Cosby is certainly right in arguing that the gift of the Spirit did not deprive Peter and the other disciples of their human and Jewish limitations. But it certainly gave them more than the power to speak languages which they had never learned. There were plenty of people in Jerusalem with whom they could speak in their native tongue. But before Pentecost they were dumb. On that day they received not only the gift of tongues (whatever that may have been) but the impulse to use every language at their command to speak the glad tidings. The use of some hitherto unknown languages was, in any case, the least part of the gift, in our opinion.—EDITOR.]

Who "Fell Headlong"?

Read Acts 1:18, 19 this way:

"Now, this man (the agent of the chief priest) obtained a field with the reward of his (Judas') iniquity; and falling headlong, he (the agent) burst asunder in the midst and his bowels gushed out.

"And it (the buying of the field with the price of Jesus) became known to all the dwellers at Jerusalem: insomuch that in their language that field was called Aceldama, that is the field of blood " (In the new version these two verses are in parenthesis.)

Why read it thus?

Matt. 27:5 says "Judas cast the pieces of siver into the sanctuary and went out and hanged himself." A plain statement.

Verse 6. "The chief priests took the pieces of silver." Plain statement number two.

Verse 7. "They took counsel and bought the potter's field." Plain statement number three.

Verse 8. "The field was called the field of blood." Plain statement number four.

Now, if Judas cast the pieces into the sanctuary he could not have obtained the potter's field. We have the simple statement that he hanged himself; the means he used is only conjecture, the place where he hanged himself is only conjecture.

If one tries to deny that the chief priests took the silver we can deny anything we like. They bought the field. It is not likely they all went to look after the selection of the field, but selected and bought it through a man authorized to do so, an agent of the priests. This agent is "this man" spoken of in Acts 1:18.

The field was bought with the 30 pieces of silver the priests had paid Judas for betraying Jesus. The priests called it "the price of blood," Matt. 27:6. "For this reason the field was called the field of blood or Aceldama."

I do not see that it is conjecture or a stretch of imagination to read it this way.

M. A. HURLBUT.

[This is an extremely interesting and ingenious interpretation. We do not agree with it for a moment, but it shows how much ingenuity can be employed in harmonizing passages. Taking the Acts account as it stands, by itself, no one could ever have thought that "this man" who fell headlong in the field, was other than Judas. Unless we are going to play utterly fast and loose with both the English and the Greek languages, we cannot make an expression so definite as "this man" refer to an individual who is not even hinted at in the context and whose existence is only a vague conjecture from another account of the events. We must not accuse the writer of Acts of such literary bungling as the employment of a pronoun whose nearest antecedent is a hypothetical "agent" conjecturally implied in another narrative written by someone else.—EDITOR.]

That Missionary Journal.

CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—Your "Note and Comment" on Dr. E. B. Hulbert's article as to the establishment of a missionary magazine, in place of so many little papers, ought to receive general attention. It is next to a nuisance to have one's table literally flooded with papers of all aims, sizes and ability in their make-up. Let us have one good missionary paper, well edited and worth reading. Then let our weekly religious papers be no longer burdened with schemes and pleas for missionary money.

This idea has been in my mind for some time, and I am glad to see it commended by others. I would enjoy taking one good journal, and reading of all our work at pleasure, and in having such information in such form as to keep for reference. I hope you will urge this matter until we see the consummation of it. J. M. MCKAY.

Comes From Brain.

Phosphates Found on the Skin and Thrown Out From Pores.

We know that active brain work throws out the phosphate of potash, for this product is found on the skin after excessive brain work, therefore, brain workers, in order to keep well, must have proper food containing phosphate of potash to quickly and surely rebuild the used-up tissue. That one can obtain such food has been proven in thousands of cases among users of Grape-Nuts Food.

This contains phosphate of potash in minute particles, just as it is furnished by nature in the grains.

This product makes from albumen the gray matter that builds the brain and fills the nerve centers.

In no way can this gray matter be made except by the action of phosphate potash upon albumen, and this mineral should be introduced to the body just as it comes from Nature's laboratory, and not from the drug-store. The system is more or less fastidious about taking up the needed elements, and, as might be suspected, it will favor the products of Mother Nature rather than the products of the drug shop, however valuable the last may be for certain uses.

Lawyers, journalists, doctors, ministers, business men and others who earn their living by the use of the brain are using Grape-Nuts Food. It is manufactured for a reason and was originated by an expert. The regenerative value of the Food has been demonstrated beyond question.

The Great Northwest.

The time is at hand for the May offering for home missions. We of the Pacific northwest feel like our destiny is hanging in the balance. For many reasons we believe this country to be the most important missionary field in the world to-day. The commerce of the Pacific is yet in its incipiency.

The cities of Puget Sound are rapidly growing centers of trade. Our great natural resources furnish inexhaustible power and material for manufacturing. The wealth of the gold fields of the north is poured into our coffers. The money kings of the east recognize our future and are making large investments. The possibilities of this country none can predict.

In the midst of such vast possibilities for power and world-wide influence we ask, what part will the Disciples of Christ have in molding its religious life? If it is to be measured by our past it will certainly be meager. We who are on the field are compelled to witness opportunities pass away from us almost every day. We are compelled to yield to others who have and have had for years the hearty financial support of their brethren in the east. Our brethren are playing at home missions. We are only spending $800 in the two principal cities of Puget Sound, where others are spending their thousands. They have accomplished much where we have accomplished little. Last year our brethren answered our appeal by giving $63,000 for the work in the whole country where they should have given a half million.

We ask with an anxious hope, what will you do for us in May?

Texas Letter.

The church at White has a "bran new house" made out of the old one. It is a stone building elegantly furnished with the latest and best pews, pulpit, furniture, etc., at a cost of $1,400. The fifth Sunday of March was dedication day and your correspondent was asked to do the preaching. The house was full at eleven o'clock and a sermon setting forth the objects and principles of our people was well received. Following this came the appeal for the $400 indebtedness, which was provided for and the beautiful building was solemnly set apart to the service of God. In the afternoon R. E. Grabe preached an excellent sermon and at night I spoke again.

Addison Clark has been elected to the presidency of Randolph College at Lancaster, a school over which his brother Randolph has presided since its organization, and it is thought he will accept. These brothers have lived and labored together so long that it is not strange that they refuse to be separated in their riper years.

J. W. Campbell, of Whitesboro, goes to El Paso as the successor of R. D. Shultz, who has gone to Galveston. No better man could have been selected for that important work.

J. B. Haston, late of Galveston, has been called to Corsicana and he will probably accept. This puts a strong man in one of the great oil centers of the state and a good church will be the result.

Homer T. Wilson, our lecture-preacher, for years pastor at Ft. Worth, may soon locate at Knoxville, Tenn., and Texas regrets to lose him. Our people everywhere are proud of our brilliant brother and they should never fail to preach him on Sunday. The fact that he is willing thus to be used is the only reason why we consent for him to go to the lecture platform.

J. L. Haddock has been assisting J. T. McKissick in a successful meeting at Weatherford. There were about fifty additions.

Pilot Point has a new congregation of thirty-seven members, organized by J. P. Adcock.

Add-Ran University is hopeful of having J. B. Sweeney take the field as financial agent for a few months. He is the man for this special work and we believe he will undertake it, and if so it will be a success. Let every friend of the school encourage him to do it.

J. H. O. Smith and Prof. John Brower are about closing a good meeting for us at the Central Church. Bro. Smith has won the hearts of our people. His preaching has the old-time ring to it. He thinks we have a distinctive mission in the world and he makes his hearer understand what it is. Being a successful pastor, his preaching is also naturally most practical. Bro. Brower is not only a sweet singer, but he is a musician in the highest and best sense and his part of the work is well done. We have had forty-one additions. M. M. DAVIS.

Dallas, Texas,

The City of Brotherly Love.

Not much has been said lately of work in Philadelphia, nevertheless, many things have been going on just the same. The mention of a few of these items might make "interestin' readin'" to folk back in the states where plain Christians are more abundant.

Communications have been received by the Philadelphia Christian Ministers' Meeting from a few congregations of people now identified with sectarian and independent organizations; recently upon invitation of the pastor and officers of the Free Baptist Church of West Coushohocken, Pa., a suburban town of Philadelphia, the Philadelphia Christian Ministers' Meeting visited them and held conference on the question of whether the organization should become known as a Christian Church and have fellowship with the Disciples of Christ.

This visit led to a closer relation and an invitation for the Philadelphia Christian Ministers' Meeting to furnish preachers for a series of meetings in the above named church. The following program was carried out:

March 12—O. R. Palmer, "The Early Church."
" 13—R. A. Smith, "The Meaning and Importance of Church Membership."
" 14—Arthur Holmes, "What Must I do to be Saved?"
" 15—G. P. Rutledge, "Christian Union."
" 21—R. G. Frank, "What Church Shall I Join?"

The probability at present is that the church will put on the Christian name and use only such tests of fellowship as were recognized in the apostolic church.

Another item of interest is the fact that two independent colored missions are seeking a recognition and home with the Disciples and after they have been instructed in the way of the Lord more perfectly will be organized if they still seek this alliance. They bid fair to attain unto a healthy numerical condition very shortly.

Development is going on all along the line. The city of brotherly love is ripe for the plea of primitive Christianity.

March 18th the Philadelphia C. E. Union was favored with an address on Christian Citizenship by F. D. Power. A large audience heard his powerful address, among them were many Disciples.

Some of the friends of R. G. Frank, pastor of the First Church, gave him a most delightful birthday surprise the evening of the 19th inst., and Dr. E. E. Montgomery on behalf of the First Church presented him with a handsome chair for his study.

The Philadelphia Christian Ministers' Meeting was received into the Ministerial Union of Philadelphia and vicinity on March 25, R. G. Frank being elected a member of its executive committee.

At the April meeting of the Philadelphia Christian Missionary Society, B. Q. Denham of New York City, has been engaged to deliver the address of the evening. We believe large things are in store for the Philadelphia Disciples. R. A. SMITH.

Church at Jacksonville, Fla.

During the latter part of March I spent nine days with the First Christian Church of Jacksonville, of which J. T. Boone, formerly of St. Louis and of Jefferson City, Mo., is the much loved minister. Though invited there specially to advise them in reference to the building of a new house of worship which they feel their continued prosperity and enlargement have made necessary, yet I preached of evenings and on Lord's day during my entire visit to good audiences that gave me as good attention as I ever received anywhere, thus impressing me with their deep earnestness, intelligence and religious zeal. I also attended their Bible-school, which is said to be the largest in the city, and is certainly one of the very best I ever visited, Bros. Zaring and Connelly, the superintendents, being master workmen. In addition to the impression made on my mind by the religious services, my daily conferences with the building committee and official board forced upon me the conviction that the First Church possesses unusual elements of strength and usefulness, much of which it seems to me may be properly ascribed to Bro. Boone's wise and able ministry of about two and a half years. He is held in universal esteem and draws the largest audiences of any preacher in Jacksonville. He and his congregation in that far away south land deserve the fullest encouragement from the hundreds of brethren and sisters who visit that beautiful southern city in search of health and rest. The church expects to build one of the best and most commodious houses of worship in the south—especially among the Disciples. This will require great sacrifices on the part of all the members, but I believe they will prove equal to the occasion, as they believe their duty to the cause of Christ demands this of them. They have bought one of the best located corner lots in the city and will sell their present property, which is on a very noisy street. They have engaged Bro. Scovill for a great meeting next November, and are anxious to have their new house, which will hold a thousand people, ready for occupancy by that time. They deserve the practical sympathy of the brethren. The kindness shown me by all cannot be forgotten. My home was with Bro. and Sister R. A. Russell and a better home I never enjoyed. Bro. R. is one of the elders and an able preacher though engaged in business, being half owner and business manager of a successful daily newspaper. O. A. Bartholomew.

Arkansas State Missions.

The little church at Gravette is working successfully; Bro. Barnes is an industrious worker. They are putting a new coat of paint on the outside of the church and are discussing the problem of pews.

S. M. Martin is in a meeting at Ft. Smith. Several additions last word. Bro. Martin is doing some strong preaching. Bro. Edmonds informs me that they have purchased a centrally located lot, for a new house of worship. I predict they will build one of the best houses in the state. The state Sunday-school convention was in session when the writer passed through last week. It was one of the best ever held in the state.

Bro. Frank Thompson is stimulating the work at Pine Bluff with his zeal and industry. The outlook is good.

C. Monroe is moving things at Mena. If he can be kept in that field, it will solve the question of success.

Bro. Ratliffe is getting to work in earnest in southwest district.

A very heroic little band has been meeting at Helena for a long time, at private houses, in the studio of Bro. Funkhouser, and for a little while last summer at the Jewish synagogue. They have their Sunday-school, and meet each Lord's day to commemorate the death of Christ. They are slowly accumulating a little money and will be compelled to build if they succeed. There is no public building that can be obtained. The real struggle is to get a lot. If they had a lot clear of debt, they could get considerable help to build. Such heroism is seldom manifested by a body of disciples. If possible they ought to be helped. If anyone would like to help very worthy struggling disciples, here is a peculiar opportunity. It will be entirely safe, for nothing will be used until enough has been obtained to secure permanency.

Let us at least double our contribution to home missions in May. We ought at least to reach $600 in the home collection. Remember the first Lord's day in May.

Please be getting ready for state meeting at Ft. Smith, June 4-6.

All pledges to state missions ought to be paid as soon as possible. If pledges have not been made, it ought to be attended to immediately. E. C. Browning.

Ohio Notes.

Another good meeting has been held in Ohio. This time it was at Mt. Vernon. Bro. Kent Pendleton is bishop there. The whole town was stirred and about 50 had turned to the Lord at last account. The word of God is mighty and will prevail.

E. S. Muckley is in a meeting at Bellefontaine with home forces with a good outlook. The Bellefontaine church after many years of trials, as by fire, has within the past year emerged into one of the good churches of the state. It is a good example of heroically holding on.

D. D. Burt, of Marion, is in a meeting at Millersburg, where Pearl Welsheimer is presbyter. The outlook there is most excellent.

What about that offering for world-wide missions? Has it been taken? There is time yet. We ought to change the reports of last week. The falling off of last week ought to stimulate every church that has not taken the offering.

The Franklin Avenue Church in Columbus closes its third year this week. In that time there have been 167 names on the roll. The present membership is 143. A neat home has been obtained at a cost of $4,000, on which there is an extension debt of $1,700. In a meeting just closed about 20 have been added. The church is one of the best giving churches in Ohio. The past month it has raised over $175. J. Walter Wilson assisted in the singing. He is well equipped for his work and gives the best of satisfaction. Any church will do well to get him for a meeting. His stereopticon illustrations of songs are the finest we have ever seen.

The daily press of this city said yesterday that the Disciples' Congress at Lexington, Ky., was "discussing the evolution theory, not that they accepted it, but that the young preachers might properly understand it." As a young man, we confess our ignorance of the details of the evolution theory, but one thing I know, that whereas I was lost I am now saved by the blood of Christ.

Secretary Bartlett is flooding the state with, "Akron means High. It is in Summit county. The church is on High street. It is a tip top place to hold a convention." Pack you grippe and your grip and get ready for Akron, May 21-23. C. A. Freer.

The Fort Sill Country.

Many inquiries have come to me touching the opening of the Kiowa, Comanche and Apache reservations. Now, for the benefit of such as feel an anxiety concerning these lands and the time of opening, permit me to say that no man knows the exact date of the opening, except possibly the department officials. Nor can it be said with anything like certainty just how they will be opened. But one thing is certain, there will be no run such as was had at the opening of Oklahoma and the strip.

Many people are locating along the borders of these lands to await developments. This is a good plan if you are able to live without work. Otherwise you had better remain where you are till later in the summer. The surveyors and allotting agents are pushing their work as rapidly as possible, and it is thought that their work will be done by the first of July.

No, the Indians are not getting all of the best lands, but they are getting their share of it, their lands being taken for the most part along the creeks. I would not advise persons who have good homes to leave them and come here; but if you have no home and want one, here is a better chance than you will get again soon on the public domain. Our brethren are coming here in goodly numbers, and are already planning for church work in the new country. Our people so far have been represented only by the radical wing of the anti-brethren, but things are beginning to change rapidly. Come on, brethren, and we will do you good.

Gain for Home Missions.

We enter upon the active campaign for the May offering with high hopes of the greatest offering in our history. Already the present year has been the most prosperous we have ever had. Our comparative offerings for 1900 and 1901 are, up to March 15, as follows:

Contributed by:	1900	1901	Gain
Churches	$ 1,586.37	$ 1,490.57	$ 95.80x
C. E. Societies	384.61	467.20	82.59
Sunday-schools	2,271.03	3,054.27	783.24
Ladies' Aid Society	392.25	303.50	88.75x
Individuals	3,390.57	1,488.75	1,901.82x
Am't of Annuity	3,450.00	11,533.34	8,083.34
" Bequests	1,595.74	8,762.52	7,166.78
" Perma'nt Fd.	1,900.00	1,072.90	827.10x
" Interest, etc.	1,436.45	7,197.31	5,760.86
Total,	$16,407.02	$35,370.36	$18,963.34
Loss x

In addition to the above there have been $666.66 on annuity and $1,500 on bequests turned over to the C. W. B. M. and Church Extension boards, making a total gain on our books of $21,130.

We call on all friends of home missions to rejoice with us that we can report a gain of $18,963.34 for this year at the above date. If all our friends take hold of the May offering with enthusiasm we shall report $100,000 for home missions at our next convention.

Let there be no diminution of personal offerings, annuity funds, Sunday-schools coming to help this great work, but we do plead that the May offering be made the greatest in our history.

The Tide is Turning.

Comparing the receipts for foreign missions for the first six days of April with the corresponding six days of 1900, shows the followlng increase:

	1900	1901	Gain
Contrib. churches	241	263	22
Amounts,	$4,751.54	$5,619.22	$867.68

If this gain continues through April, we will regain about all we lost in March.

There! We told you so, We said all the time that the churches were withholding their collections because they were spending the whole month of March in the campaign. Now let there be no delay in sending offerings to

Alexander Campbell's Theology

By W. E. GARRISON. This book is a scientific statement according to the historical method of the religious and philosophical influences which molded the theological teaching of Mr. Campbell. Here are some extracts from reviews:

J. J. HALEY: "This book marks the beginning of a new epoch in our literature. . . . . I heartily commend it to the perusal of thoughtful men and women."

F. D. POWER: "A distinct and noteworthy contribution to our literature. It is a clear and comprehensive statement of a very important theme."

ERI B. HULBERT: "Readers whose desire it is to understand the theology which Mr. Campbell elaborated will find in this treatise exactly the information they are seeking."

A handsome volume of 302 pages, bound in cloth. Sent postpaid on receipt of price, $1.00.

THE CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY, 1522 LOCUST STREET.

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE?

A large interrogation, truly! It would be difficult to frame a more fundamental question than this, which has been chosen as the title of the new book by W. J. Russell. No more valuable volume for young people has ever been issued. What is Your Life? is easily worth $10,000 to any young man or woman who will faithfully follow its teaching. The general scope of the book is shown by the titles of some of the chapters: "The Value of Time," "The Body and Good Health," "Character Building," "Good Books and Good Reading," etc. The volume is not only helpful and profitable, but is also interesting and entertaining. Mr. Russell has avoided that didactic, dogmatic, prosy style so usual in works of this class. He has written in a bright, lively vein. His book will be read by young people who would refuse to read the average volume of advice to the young.

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE? By W. J. Russell. Cloth, 316 pages. Price, $1.00.

Evangelistic.

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

Des Moines, Ia., April 7.—University Place Church, 38 added to-day, total 509. Continue a few days. 815 in Des Moines. Scoville, evangelist; Duloss Smith, singer.—I. N. McCASH.

COLORADO.

Colorado Springs, Apr. 1.—Yesterday was the last day of my first year with the First Church in Colorado Springs. It was snowy and gloomy without, but warm and cheerful within. We had 10 additions during the day. Five confessions; four letters, one from the Baptists united by commendation. We have had 32 additions during the month of March; 14 of these by confession and baptism. We are to hold our anniversary meeting to-night at which time we will give a reception to all of the members who have come in during the year. We expect Bros. Tyler, Hay, Thompson and others with us. We start into our new year with bright prospects.—F. N. CALVIN.

ILLINOIS.

Ashley, March 27.—Bro. Beckelhymer, the evangelist of the 7th district, closed his meeting here March 25, with four added by baptism and the church greatly strengthened. I want to commend also Bro. Roy Wilkins who so ably assisted in song and prayer. Bro. Beckelhymer has been invited by the G. A. R.'s to deliver the memorial address at this place May 30.—F. M. MORGAN.

Ashley, April 1.—The Christian Church organized a Sunday-school March 24th with 52 enrolled, and had in attendance March 31, 72, a gain of 20 in first week, which the church is proud of. The work is moving nicely here and I think the brotherhood will soon be proud of Ashley congregation. We preached for them Saturday night, Lord's day and Lord's day night, with a full house Sunday night.—F. M. MORGAN.

Carmi.—We have had three additions to the church since our March meeting. The church prospers.—J. T. DAVIS, pastor.

Fairbury, April 1.—Two added at the services here yesterday, one from the M. E.'s and one by statement. Began revival services last night.—E. N. TUCKER, pastor.

Fairfield, April 6.—Our meeting, which lasted four weeks and resulted in 20 additions, closed a few days since on account of the illness of the pastor. Since Jan. 1, there have been 32 additions to the church. Our March offering for foreign missions was $36.75. Monday night, April 1, our pastor, J. A. Battenfield, and wife were surprised at their home and a purse of $38.25 was left as a token of regard by the members of the congregation.—A. W. CRIPPIN.

Galesburg, April 1.—Closed my second year here yesterday. Had eight additions to the church, making 201 in the two years' work. Begin my third year with bright prospects.—C. H. WHITE.

Jeffersonville, April 8.—Preached three sermons here with five additions, four by confession and baptism and one from the Methodists.—LEW D. HILL.

Kankakee, April 4.—One more added last night at prayer-meeting.—W. D. DEWEESE.

Normal, April 8.—Three added recently.—E. B. BOWER.

Quincy, April 4.—We have 75 additions to date.—H. A. NORTHCUTT, evangelist; L. H. STINE, pastor.

Shelbyville, April 1.—There were three more additions here yesterday, two by letter and one by primary obedience. This makes four since last report.—WM. DRUMMET.

Short, March 8.—I began a meeting last night at Short. A large audience last night. Churches wanting me to hold a meeting for them address here.—M. L. SORNBORGER.

Sullivan, April 1.—Two confessions here yesterday.—EDWIN E. CURRY.

IOWA.

Eldora, April 1.—Please report a promising meeting in progress here. Although the roads and weather have been against us, yet our attendance has increased from the start and there are three added to date, one reclaimed and two by confession. There is strong talk of a new church house.—F. L. DAVIS.

Lehigh, April 2.—We are in a meeting a little over two weeks old; 15 have made the good confession; three have come from other denominations, one from another congregation of the Church of Christ, and 11 reclaimed. Interest is very great. B. F. Hall, our pastor, is conducting the meeting.—JOSIE COOPER.

Scranton, April 1.—Our meeting was greeted with storm after storm, but we had good results, besides 15 accessions. Other appointments called me away just when I should have remained.—R. L. MCHATTON, Kansas City, Mo.

Shenandoah, April 4.—Our revival effort, under the direction of R. A. Omer, of Camp Point, Ill., closed last night. "The worst weather I have ever experienced in a series of meetings," to quote Bro. Omer, interfered seriously with regularity of attendance and, as I believe, lessened our immediate results; 37 were added by letter and primary obedience. Bro Omer's work was well done and I commend to my brother pastors the preaching and methods employed by him here.—J. H. WRIGHT.

INDIANA.

Greenfield, Mar. 30.—I have just organized a church at Shirley, Ind., with 40 members. They will build a new house this season. Shirley is a manufacturing town at the junction of the Big Four, 30 miles east of Indianapolis.—T. H. KUHN, state evangelist.

Remington, April 7.—Special Easter services here April 7, at which offerings were taken for the Christian Orphans' Home of your city. We had one confession at the regular services. We will continue with a two or three weeks' rally. Work prospering.—THEO. J. FREED.

KANSAS.

Atchison, April 8.—Began fourth year of my second term of service with the First Church yesterday. In the past three years I have preached 404 sermons; baptized 71 people; received 62 others into fellowship; married 63 couples; conducted 92 funeral services; held two protracted meetings; dedicated one church, etc. We have paid off $1,500 of our mortgage debt, spent $653 in improving church building, and hope to wipe out entire debt, $1,450, this year. Have observed all missionary days. A more enthusiastic and spiritual church does not exist.—WALTER SCOTT PRIEST.

Columbus, April 4. Meeting here closed with 33 accessions.—E. T. MCFARLAND AND PROF. G. A. BUTLER.

Kansas City, Kan., April 8.—Three added yesterday at the South Side Church and three the Sunday before. Good audiences and frequent additions. I am too busy to report often. These people are meeting their obligations and moving along nicely. —T. L. NOBLITT.

Leavenworth, March 30.—We had three additions to-day, which makes 10 in the last two weeks.—S. W. NAY.

Manhattan, March 22.—One confession Sunday morning. Fifty-three added during the sixteen months we have been here. Our work is encouraging. Bro. F. W. Emerson, of the First Church, Topeka, addressed a mass-meeting at the opera house Sunday afternoon and preached to a packed house for us in the evening.—R. E. ROSENSTEIN.

MISSOURI.

Brashear, April 1.—Four confessions yesterday at Queen City, all from the Sunday-school.—R. A. MARTIN.

California, April 1.—We closed our work with the church at Centralia, Ill., Sunday night, March 31. The number of accessions was not large (33) but the meeting was one of great power and influence. With the church it was really a revival; the audiences were good all of the time and much of the time we were uncomfortably crowded and people turned away. We are seeking to make our work of a character calculated to lead the congregation into fields and depths of spirituality hitherto unknown to some of our congregations. We feel that the times in which we live and the condition of the average congregation make this imperative. We strive to lead men and women to Jesus for salvation. Our next work will be with the church at Salem, Mo.—BEN F. HILL AND GUY B. WILLIAMSON.

Carthage, Mar. 30.—Eight additions since last report, 6 at Golden City, 2 at Jasper. Five of these by confession and baptism.—M. S. JOHNSON.

Everton, April 2.—In a good meeting here with $320 subscribed for church house.—JOS. GAYLOR.

Fayette, Mar. 26.—Bro. Crayton Brooks remained over here from the lectureship two nights and preached for the brethren. There were four confessions. Bros. Marlow and Davis preached on Lord's day. I came Monday night to preach the rest of the week. We began with four more good confessions. The brethren here hope to reap a large harvest from the sowing of the lectureship.—ARTHUR N. LINDSEY.

Gunn City, April 8.—Just closed here last night; had 16 additions and raised money for preacher for one-fourth time. I go to Moundville to hold a meeting.—R. B. HAVENER.

Joplin, April 1.—Yesterday was observed as "decision day" in our Bible-school; 18 confessed Christ during the day. There were four by letter recently and two by confession at our Blendville mission under the labors of C. W. Shull, making in all 24 added for March. Our missionary offering was $55.—W. F. TURNER.

Kansas City, April 8.—We are starting a meeting with B. M. Easter and the West Side Christian Church. Full houses and three added yesterday.—R. L. MCHATTON.

King City, April 8.—We closed a week's meeting here last night with seven accessions, one by confession, five by letter and one from another church, with Bro. N. Rollo Davis doing the preaching. Much good will be done under the wholesome preaching of Bro. Davis, who has engaged with us for half time during the present year. Our Easter exercises by the Sunday-school yesterday morning were excellent and, best of all, the school raised $23.49 for the little orphans at St. Louis.—ED. L. PEERY.

Lebanon.—Two confessions last week. The Conway church house was burned a few days ago; total loss. This is a hard stroke on that little band. They are worthy of help. I hope they will get it.—A. A. BEERY.

Neosho, April 3.—Additions last week gathered from four papers: baptisms, 3,046; letters, etc., 289; from the sects, 184; total, 3,519.—L. C. WILSON.

Popular Bluffs, Mo.—We closed meeting March 28, with 7 additions; much good done other ways I am now at home resting a few days, and can engage with pastors or evangelists. C. M. HUGHES, singer, 192 Spring St., Lexington, Ky.

Spikard.—Closed a four weeks' meeting at Spikard the fourth Lord's day in March with 38 accessions to the church, 34 by confession, three reclaimed, one by relation and the church in harmony.—J. P. SCHOOLER.

St. Louis, April 3.—Closed a good meeting with the church at Seymour, Ind., last evening, resulting in 17 additions to the church.—W. H. KERN, 2627 Gamble St.

Warrensburg, April 8.—One addition at Lee's Summit yesterday; three two weeks ago. My work is starting well.—KING STARK.

West Plains, Mo., April 4.—The meeting conducted by our minister, E. W. Sewall, closed Sunday last. Our people here have rarely been blessed with such a great ingathering of souls and general revival along all lines. There were 85 additions to the church; 10 from the Baptist, 9 from the Methodist, 2 from Lutheran, 1 Presbyterian, 1 Sanctificationist and 1 Roman Catholic.—T. B. CARMICAL, Church Clerk.

West Plains, April 22.—My meeting closed here last night with 85 additions; 10 baptisms, 9 Methodists, 2 Lutheran, 1 Presbyterian, 1 Sanctified, 1 Roman Catholic. The brethren say it is the grandest meeting ever held for the church here. Our house is about as large as any in town and it would not hold the audiences. Many stood at the windows and doors during the services, and many were turned away for want of room. Praise God for the great victory.—E. W. SEWALL.

NEBRASKA.

Auburn, Apr. 3.—Meeting closed; 28 additions. Would make engagements for meetings.—GEO. W. MUTZ, singing evangelist.

Beatrice, April 6.—Our meeting with the church at Auburn, Neb., closed Monday night. Bro. Stein is the pastor and is well supported by his people. The work is well organized and in a good condition. The total number of additions was 28. Bro. Stein is to continue his work with that church.—D. A. WICKIZER.

Grand Island, Apr. 1.—Our meetings two weeks old. Have had very bad weather. Sixteen to date. Nine yesterday. We continue with good interest.—R. M. MARSHALL, evangelist, Z. O. DOWARD, pastor.

NEW BRUNSWICK.

St. John.—Meeting with home forces closed. Twelve baptisms, one letter, three from other churches.—J. CHAS. B. APPEL.

OHIO.

Akron, April 1.—The High Street Church had five added yesterday, four by confession. Had 647 at Bible-school; average for March 572.—J. G. SLAYTER.

Columbus, April 1.—Closed a three weeks' meeting last night with 14 accessions—12 by baptism. We got the largest hearing from strangers that we have ever had. Our church is now just three years old. We have a neat home that cost $4,000 and 142 members. We raised $168.33 the past month. Our outlook is fine. J. Walter Wilson, of Indianapolis, gave us fine service as singer for our meeting. We heartily commend him.—C. A. F.

Martin's Ferry, April 2.—Held a short meeting with my home church and home forces. Twelve added and two more a few days after, total 14. Grippe got the preacher and closed him and the meeting at once. Am now in a meeting at Martin's Ferry, with the pastor, Bro. Tylock. Twenty-five added. Interest fine.—G. H. SIMS, Tiffin, O.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Orangeburg, Apr. 1.—One confession at this place since last report.—M. B. INGLE.

TEXAS.

Amarillo, Apr. 1.—I preached five sermons in Memphis, Tex., on the Divinity of Christ; two confessions. Have just held a nine days' meeting with home church; 11 confessions and one restored.—VOLNEY JOHNSON.

VIRGINIA.

Charlottesville, March 31.—Bro. S. W. Glascock preached a week at Dyer's Store, Henry county, organized a Bible-school and raised half enough in pledges to build a house of worship. Bro. Glascock is one of the most successful workers in the state, and his coming to Virginia was a great help to the cause.—O. B. SEARS.

WASHINGTON.

Oakesdale, Wash.—We had 70 additions during the months of January and February.—W. B. ROSE.

Walla, Walla, Apr. 1.—I began a meeting in this central city of the great Columbia Valley on March 24. Fourteen have been added. The audiences are large and interest is growing. This is an "Inland Empire" sure enough and this is the day of opportunity for us.—J. M. MORRIS.

The Old Preacher.

By James N. Crutcher.

(With apologies to Mr. Edwin Markham.)

Bowed by increasing years and cares untold,
He leans upon the reading desk and gazes on
The emptiness before him. The pews no longer Claim their multitudes nor his sermons their Meed of praise. His voice is hollow, and in Tones sepulchral he whispers words of tenderness
And truth divine. On his aching back are the Burdens of the church, and in his face is the Mark of mortal pain. In his eye is the Keenness of vision that penetrates the vaulty
Vastness above him. Who made him thus?
A being that grieves, sad and careworn in the Solitude of his humble home. Yet toils he,
And the vineyard of the Lord doth show the Magic touch of his consecrated hand. Is he
A brother to the ox, a toiler that knows no
Reward save the stall and meager food?
Without recompense he calmly waits the passing
Of the weary years, and his final welcome to that Fair home where God doth dwell. Again I ask,
Whose breath blew out the joy within his heart?
Is he the thing the Lord hath said should preach
His Word in every land? Can this creature
Trace a goodness eternal in the days that Come and go? Is his alone the passion of Eternity, the weight of souls? How will the Church of the veiled future reckon with this man?
How meet his needs in those dark days when the Valley's shadow doth appear? Must we say,
O churchmen of all pleas and creeds, that
Silvery hairs and faltering steps are signs
Of dishonor? How excuse our pitiless
Neglect of this divinely chosen one? Mark well
His aching step, and while 'tis day, rise
With united might, and remedy the perfidious
Wrongs and immemorial infamies which leave
Him in this extremity.

Old Uncle Jim and his wife, Betsy Toogood, owned a comfortable cabin and lot of ground in one of our thriving country villages. The lot, a small half-acre, gave the old man about all the work he was able to do, on which he had a healthy slice devoted to strawberry plants. Another slice had been planted in that noble vegetable, German greens, and in the fall of 1900 both of these slices of land were green and joyous with their sustaining verdure. Both Betsy and Uncle Jim admired these two healthy slices of land, and they were prophesying all the time to each other of the great amount of cash they would be able to get from them. But Betsy's mind was uneasy within her. She wanted chickens. She wanted "aigs." And every one of her conversations with her husband ended with that subject—hens to lay "aigs" through the winter months, then to sell the hens in early spring. Water continually dropping on a rock weareth it away. Hen talk continually kept up finally wore away all Uncle Jim's objections to having hens on the lot, and they were bought and cooped up in a big dry goods box, one corner of which contained a couple of nests, the balance a couple of roosts, and five hens were placed therein. These hens belonged to the surprising breed. Uncle Jim agreed to attend to the hens' wants. He fed them grain three times a day, and three times a week he fed them bones. He broke up the bones—beef bones—which came with the beef which was daily consumed at his table. He saw that they were always supplied with water, and a few days after they were cooped up they were turned loose on the lot to gather for themselves the green stuff and the bugs and worms, as well as the last lingering grasshoppers which had not provided for themselves winter quarters. Being well fed, the hens soon began to lay, and it did Betsy's heart good as she piled up the "aigs," and every Saturday evening Uncle Jim trotted uptown with a basketful of nice fat "aigs" to his customers, who did not begrudge paying him fifty cents per dozen, because they were fresh and new and so plump.

It went on thus until the first week in March, when Uncle Jim's mind began to be filled with the visions of early peas, lettuce and radishes. So one Sunday after church he walked over his lot, and looking over that slice of land which looked so green and vigorous in the fall, which had been planted in greens, he was surprised to see the stalks nearly white, all the color bleached out, and nothing green about any of them. All were dead. He could hardly believe his eyesight. He could not find, although he searched carefully, a single plant which showed any green. He walked farther along to the strawberry bed. Many of the plants were on top of the land, pulled up, dead. Many more were in the land, but all brown and withered. Here he saw where the hens scratched, and here again he saw hen-wallows. He walked up and down the long rows. What had been rows of emerald in the fall, now were rows of darkness and disfigurement. Uncle Jim walked to the house, sorrowful. He called Betsy to the door. His voice trembled.

"All de greens am dade; de hens hab kill all of dem, an' dar ain't enny strawberry plants live, nuther. All scratched up, an' tored up, an' wallered up, an' et up!"

Betsy said nothing. She dished up dinner, and called Uncle Jim to eat. This was a sorrowful dinner.

Later in the afternoon Betsy came out of the house with her book and pencil. She had figured up what the hens brought in eggs through the past three months, which was twelve dozen for five hens each month, at 50 cents per dozen, gave $6 for the three months, a sum total of $18. The hens were old hens, none younger than two years. One of them was three years old. Each and every hen laid her egg without a miss every day during the three months. Well fed, well grained, well greened, well groomed, well watered, they laid without a break, without a let-up, through the three months of winter. Uncle Jim "lowed" "dat dey did well, dat dey was de mos' surprisin'est hens he ebber did see." They then figured on the three or four hundred quarts of berries that that slice of land was capable of producing. Their home market was extra good, and the berries were very large. So 300 quarts at 20 cents per quart was easily gotten for their big berries. This amounted to $60.

Uncle Jim looked at Betsy's black, smooth face, and Betsy looked at Uncle Jim's wrinkles. "Sixty dollahs' wuth of berries dun sold for eighteen dollahs! My soul, Betsy! An' de greens was wuth ebery cent of ten dollahs! Don't want enny mo' chickings to spen' de winter wid me." And the tears trickled down in several streams among the wrinkles of his old face.

Cheerful Outlook.

A man wise in his day and generation says that one of the things which everybody demands and nobody really wishes is a candid opinion.

"I wish you'd come out to my house and see a Correggio that I bought in Italy last summer," said a collector of pictures and bric-a-brac, more noted for his zeal than his discernment, to a friend who was a connoisseur in fine arts.

"It's a head, a perfect beauty—just a fragment of some great picture," he proceeded.

"I should like to see it," said the connoisseur, in a most cautious tone.

"I want your candid opinion of it, that's what I want," continued the collector; "I'd like to know exactly what you think of it. A man had the insolence to tell me the other day that he didn't believe it was an original! If another man says that, I'm afraid my temper will get the upper hand of me, and I shall knock him down where he stands. Now you come out just as soon as you can, and give me your perfectly unbiased opinion of it."—Youth's Companion.

"Just Like Papa."

Children Glad to Have Their Coffee Like The Parents.

More than any of the old folks realize, the little folks at the table like to have food and drink the same as Father and Mother.

Perhaps you can remember the time when a fork full of the meat or potato or a sip from the cup that your Father or Mother was using seemed to possess some remarkable merit and flavor.

If children can be given a strong, nourishing food drink such as Postum Food Coffee it more than satisfies their desire to have things like the older folks, and at the same time gives them a drink they love and fatten on.

A lady up in Oakes, N. D., says that since their family have been drinking Postum the children are stronger and better than ever before, and are so glad to think they can have coffee to drink "just like papa."

The husband and father was taken sick with a very severe attack of stomach trouble and had to give up work, being confined to the house for some weeks, suffering greatly. For some time he had been in the habit of drinking coffee for breakfast, and tea for dinner and supper. The wife writes, "After reading some of your advertisements we wondered if coffee and tea had not been the cause of his sickness.

We finally decided to have him quit tea and coffee and try Postum Food Coffee. He dates his recovery from the day he commenced to drink Postum, and has not had to stop work from sickness since then.

Some years ago I tried a package of Postum and did not like it, but I know now that it was because I did not make it right. It is easy to make good Postum if the simple directions are followed. The only failure is when people do not boil it long enough.

Please do not publish my name. I am always ready to tell, however, of the merits of Postum." Name given by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., at Battle Creek, Mich.

Too Many Farm Fences.

Has any farmer ever figured out how much ground the fences on his 160-acre farm occupy? Has he ever calculated how much he loses every year as a result of keeping in repair the fences on his farm—fences which he might well dispense with to advantage? It is evident that very few farmers ever figure along these lines, if they did we should certainly see fewer fences on the farms. Where farming is done according to the latest and most approved methods fences are eliminated wherever possible. A fence inclosing the farm is regarded as sufficient if, as of course is necessary, a few interior or cross lines be constructed for proper division of live stock. It should be understood that where much live stock is kept fencing will necessarily be more extensive. It is only on the grain or fruit farm that fences may be dispensed with entirely, yet it is true that there are more fences than are absolutely necessary on many of the live stock farms of the country. Too many fences on a farm present several propositions worthy the farmer's thoughtful consideration:

1. They occupy ground that if cultivated would produce crops worth more, in many cases, than the convenience enjoyed because of their presence. Rail fences are particularly monopolistic in the utilization of space, while hedges are quite as greedy. Wire fences make it possible to reduce the amount of space occupied to a minimum. But any kind of a fence if not needed where constructed is a loss to the farmer and eats away his profits.

2. Too many fences require too much time and labor in keeping them in repair; to keep down the weeds growing in the fence rows also is a very important item in this discussion. The presence of numerous fences on an ordinary farm shortens fields, thus rendering cultivation harder by causing more turning. Moreover, they make extra labor for the time when it is desired to change the system of fields, the seeding to grass of some and pasturing with live stock of others.

I have pointed out some of the disadvantages resultant from too much fencing on the farm; a great deal, as a matter of fact, could be said anent the advantages of numerous fences on farms where live stock is grown and diversified agriculture practiced. But in my judgment the disadvantages overshadow the advantages to an extent which warrants on the part of farmers everywhere, particularly in the prairie country, where posts are scarce, diligent study of the question in its relation to economic agriculture. Every reduction of farm expense is a step to larger profits. The elimination of unnecessary things on the farm, the procurement from every inch of friable soil some article or product having a market value, and the careful and intelligent administration of affairs, large and small, are factors in modern farming which all must soon come to take into account.

Let every farmer reader of this article look over his farm and note the number of miles of fence thereon, then let him ask the question, do I need all of them? Again, does it pay to keep them up? In many cases the farmer who thus interrogates himself will arrive at the conclusion that he may well dispense with some of the cross-fences on his farm. He will come to see that he can grow enough wheat on the land occupied by a mile of fence to "make his bread" for years. Finally, he will clearly see that although the removal of fences at first gives some trouble in managing the live stock, the change is a profitable one in every particular.

An enterprising and always alert German neighbor of mine told me several years ago that when he bought his present farm, of 120 acres, he found enough fencing on it to accommodate three farms of its size; that the first year of his administration he removed more than one-third of it, and prepared the fence rows for corn and wheat, the resulting crops yielding rich returns for the ground used. "I can grow my bread where Smith had his pig pen fence," he remarked. And it was a fact.

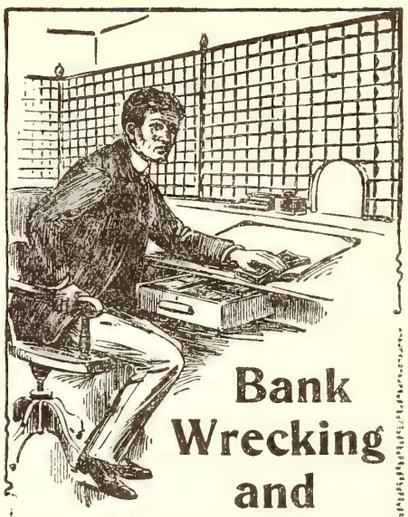
Viewed from the æsthetic, commercial or convenience view point it seems to me that too much fencing on a farm is a bad thing. What some may regard as "just enough," may if carefully studied be found too much. I should be glad to have expressions from Journal readers on this topic.—DeWitt C. Wing in Journal of Agriculture.

Bonaparte.

By Ernest Ingram Bagley.

There is, save one, no grander character in history than this. There have been great men who drew their strength from God—this was a great man to whom God was a moiety.

A man to whom God was a moiety, yet a man whom God used to scourge nations, to revise governments, to bring order from chaos, to inaugurate a reign of law. God to his own ends used heathen Nebuchadnezzar and heathen Alexander and heathen Julius Cæsar, and God to his own ends used scoffer Bonaparte.



He was the great law-giver of the age and the principles which he enunciated have come down to us in reconstructed constitutions and in reorganized bodies politic and in a broader type of religious freedom, and in a new meaning to liberty and in a higher and truer conception of the sovereignty of the people and of the inherent rights and privileges of man.

On the ruins of the Republic Napoleon reared his throne, from the ruins of Napoleon's dynasty the Republic, phœnix-like, rose; yet the radiance of that sun which rose on Austerlitz and sank on Waterloo still gilds to-day the brow of royalty and lingers in the senate chambers of the nations!

Long live the memory of Bonaparte, tyrant, usurper though he was, for a man who, like him, could marshal and lead nations to war, who could throw down thrones, as he did, with a touch, who could kindle with a word the dull eye to enthusiasm, who could startle the ages with the lightning of his genius, who could desecrate as he did the holiest associations of man, who could sacrifice his country on the altar of his ambition, and with all and through all and in spite of all, could hold the hearts of his countrymen as Bonaparte does to-day, could but have been the standard-bearer of a divine revolution, a regent under the dispensation and dynasty of God.

The ways of God are not the ways of men,
Behind his storms there is a mighty calm,
And when the smoke of war has rolled away
We see the shadow of his outstretched arm.

And who shall say that Bonaparte fulfilled no God-given destiny?

In the World.

A crystal is sometimes formed in the embrace of a boulder of granite. To clear it of its rough enclosure, and to bring its beautiful facets to the light, nature submerges it in deep waters, shatters it by tempest, and abrades it by contact with stones and mud and the rubbish of the sea. Thus a redeemed soul is, by the plan of God, immersed in the cares and toils and enticements and usefulness of a world of sin, so that by sheer resistance to evil, and abrasion with depravity, it may be polished to the transparent image of him who made it.—*Austin Phelps, D. A Story to Tell.

Little Ratiya was a child of India, saved by the care of the missionaries from death by famine. She was very gentle and loving, and soon repaid the kindness of those who had befriended her.

One day her teacher was telling her of Jesus, and of how he had no home when he was on the earth.

"Ah," said little Ratiya, "now I know why he sent the good missionaries to my people. For how could he have known our need, except he had known what it means to have no home?"

"Start Me."

"Start me!" cries little Alice from her perch in the swing. "I want to go high; start me!"

"Somebody can't be starting you all the time," answers Tommy, half impatient of her demands upon him, half desirous of giving her a bit of instruction. "Put your foot to the ground and start yourself."

It is the same story, the same cry, the world over. People are longing to mount high along many lines, but for the most part they are sitting still and waiting for somebody to start them. They want to reach success in literature, in business or professional life, but they want to swing high from the first—to be pushed by some one's money, strength or name. Those who are really willing to begin with their feet on the ground and start themselves are comparatively few.

One who has been brought much in contact with young people, young women especially, and has been endeavoring to help them, recently said that her greatest discouragement lay in the fact that they all wanted to begin at the top. They wanted at once the reputation, the pay and the patronage of those who had been long years in the work. They wanted to be pushed—a good, strong push, that would set them flying at once—instead of putting their own feet to the ground and slowly working up for themselves.—Exchange.

"Seen the Sunset?"

It was getting dark in my office, and dark in my mind at the same time. It had been a hard day. Very likely I had started it wrong, and things had obligingly responded to my initial impetus. Some ugly letters may have come in (sometimes they do, even to our favored spot in the universe). A life-insurance agent may have been unusually pertinacious—or a poet. There may have arisen some little friction over the telephone. I have forgotten the exact cause, but I was gloomy, and, as always happens in such a case, the whole earth was gloomy too. The room was full of shadows, and the approaching darkness oppressed me.

Just at that minute there came in, with some letters, one of the many sunshiny girls whose bright faces adorn our office. "Have you seen the sunset, Professor Cobweb?" she asked, as she laid the letters down and went out.

No, of course I had not seen the sunset. A tall office building blocks the entire sky across the way, and whatever view I get must be got on the bias. But I am particularly fond of sunsets, so I rushed to the window.

I could scarcely believe my dazzled eyes. The great west was aflame. From the slender silver tower of Park Street Church, over the glittering roofs of the Back Bay residences and the lofty buildings on Beacon Hill, over the shining curve of the Charles and the haze that lay on the distant ridges—Corey, Waban and Mount Ida—there was beating down such a glory that the staid and ancient city seemed a veritable New Jerusalem descended from heaven, adorned as a bride for her husband. The sky was an ocean of brilliant color, waves of crimson rising majestically, breaking on unseen barriers into a myriad of fiery flakes, softly melting to crimson foam, and swallowed up by the next tide of color from that furnace below the horizon. I watched the splendid pageant till it grew more tender, falling away into delicate tints of pearl and opal, extended in quiet bands along a background of brilliant green. And then, just as the fingers of sombre gray began to hold up their warning, premonitive of the dissolution of the spectacle, and while everything was still bright in the west and on the beautiful city of the Puritans, I turned back to my desk with a cheery smile, and a heart into which the peace of God had crept out of God's sunset sky.

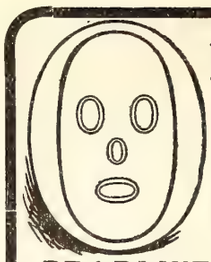
And now God bless the kind thoughtfulness which introduced me to that sunset, and God bless all the children of light who go around the world pointing out the places where the brightness lies!—Christian Endeavor World.

Only a Cup of Tea.

A group of bright-faced young women were chatting together in the parlor over their afternoon tea when a distant knocking caught the ear of the pretty girl hostess. "Excuse me a minute, please," she exclaimed, springing to her feet. "I mustn't leave that knock unanswered, for I suspect it is mother's washerwoman bringing home our clean clothes."

The surmise was quite right. Mrs. Knott, the washerwoman, stood at the back door with a heavy willow basket in her arms. She was a slight little woman, who always looked too frail for the hard work she was obliged to do. This afternoon her lips were almost colorless and there were dark rings under her eyes. She was almost breathless from her long walk with her heavy burden and her chest heaved spasmodically.

"Come in and sit down while I get the money," said the girl, sweetly.



She stepped into the adjoining room for her purse and as she came back the white face of the woman at the door stirred her sympathetic heart to a sudden quick pity.

"How tired you look!" she cried. "Wait and I'll get you a cup of tea."

She had flashed out of sight in an instant, and was back again before Mrs. Knott had recovered from her surprise. On a dainty tray she carried a cup of delicate china from which rose a tempting fragrance.

"Drink this," she said. "I'm sure you'll feel better."

The woman's hardened hand trembled as she took the cup and hastily drank its contents. The warmth seemed to spread through her chilled, exhausted body. Yes, her heart, too, felt the comfortable glow. A minute before she had been worn out, discouraged, hopeless. Now a new courage stirred within her. As she had climbed the steps she had thought how sadly insufficient for her needs the pay for her work would be. Now she thought of the necessities it would purchase for her children, and her face grew bright. She went out into the dusk and dampness of the late afternoon with a step that was no longer hopeless.—Forward.

The Best Loved Women.

The world loves a true and noble woman more than the greatest beauty that ever lived or the most brilliant intellect. Within the memory of any one there are noble, womanly lives which have been dearer and better to us than the most brilliant women of history. Not for the beauty of a Helen of Troy or a Cleopatra, nor for the brilliancy of a George Sand or a Joan of Arc would we sacrifice these lives. Indeed, if we had to choose between one or the other, we would wipe from the slate of history those historic characters rather than destroy the sacred influences of a noble mother, sister or wife, which have shaped and formed our careers.—A. S. Atkinson, in Woman's Home Companion.

The Hidden Powers.

I crossed the ocean in a powerful steamship, which weighed over twenty thousand tons, and pushed her way against wind and wave at the rate of over twenty knots an hour! I could not see the propelling force; that was hidden deep down in the glowing furnaces, heaped constantly with fresh coal. That illustrates the spiritual life of every strong, healthy, growing Christian; his strength is measured by the inward supply of divine grace. The spiritual force and progress of a growing Christian prove that his life is hid with Jesus Christ. The moving hands on the face of any watch are evidence of a mainspring. Happy are you if your neighbors who can see you can know by your outward conduct that your inner life is fed by an unseen Christ.—Rev. T. L. Cuyler, D. D.

It Reminded Him.

When "the two trains came together with an awful crash," the Chicago Times-Herald reporter was at hand, and he did not miss the most picturesque and characteristic incident.

After long, hard work the rescuers reached the bottom of the mass, where the legs and body of a man protruded from beneath a twisted platform. Beside him lay a cane, decorated with colored ribbons, and a long tin horn.

Fearfully and anxiously a score of strong men lifted the weight from the head and shoulders of the prostrate one and carried him up the embankment. As they reached the higher level, he opened his eyes, passed a hand in front of them, as if brushing away a film or screen of some kind, and shouted:

"'Rah, 'rah, 'rah! Sizz, boom, ah! Ki-yi, hip-hip, hoo-gah yah! Come on, fellows! Which side has the ball?"

Painting Her Portrait.

"If I could be such an old lady as that—so beautiful, serene, sweet and lovable—I shouldn't mind growing old," said a young girl the other day, speaking of a white-haired visitor who had just departed.

"Well, if you want to be that kind of an old lady, you'd better begin making her right away," laughed a keen-witted companion. "She doesn't strike me as a piece of work that was done in a hurry. It has taken a long time to make her what she is. If you are going to paint that sort of portrait of yourself to leave to the world, you'd better be mixing your colors now."

The merry words were true; and, whether she willed it or not, the girl was already "mixing the colors" for her portrait, and drawing day by day the outlines of the mature womanhood which shall yet brighten or darken the lives around her. Many a careless, selfish girl has in her inmost heart no higher ideal than "to be like mother" when she shall have reached mother's years; but in the meanwhile she is content to be as unlike her as possible. She has an idea that age brings its graces with it, and that a beautiful character comes, like silver hair, naturally and without effort.

Girls, you are outlining your future and choosing its coloring now. The woman you wish to be must begin in the girl.—Forward.

We read that the Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans. This was because the devil had dealings with both. He is the great accuser and divider of those who should be brothers. How he raises up envy, hatred and malice, and destroys that union which is strength, and which should characterize Christian work! Rather let us imitate Louis XII. Before coming to the throne, he had many enemies. When he became king, he caused a list to be made of his persecutors, and marked against each name a black cross. His enemies fled, but the king sent for them to come back, saying that he had put a cross against each name to remind him of the cross of Christ, in order that he might try to follow the example of Him who prayed for His murderers.—Exchange.

College Window-breaking.

The latent savagery and boyishness of the college student a century ago found expression in ways and acts unknown, even unthought of, in colleges of to-day. Mrs. E. Berkeley, in writing of her son's life at St. Andrews University, hints at one of the rough customs of that period.

On entering the university, Mr. Berkeley was called upon by a college officer, who asked him to deposit a pound to pay for the windows he might break.

"But I never broke any windows," objected the young man. "Why should I do so here?"

"You will do it at St. Andrews," was the reply and the pound was given perforce.

At the end of the term several students cried, "Now for the windows! Come, it is time to set off."

Mr. Berkeley then for the first time found out why his pound had been demanded. He was asked to join the boys, and very naturally asked what was to be done.

"Why, break every window in college!"

"For what reason?"

"For no reason that we know of, save that the boys always do it at the close of every term. It's merry sport!"

Mr. Berkeley declined to participate in such sport, and being of pleasing yet dignified mien, he was listened to. "I never did such a thing at Eton, even when I had more wine than was good for me, and I should be ashamed to be guilty of such a wretched piece of folly as a young man."

He spoke so sensibly on the subject that most of his fellow students were dissuaded from the window-breaking revel, and from that year, 1780, the practice was discontinued.—Youth's Companion.

A GOOD DEAL OF NONSENSE

About "Blood Purifiers" and "Tonics."

Every drop of blood, every bone, nerve and tissue in the body can be renewed in but one way, and this is, from wholesome food properly digested. There is no other way and the idea that a medicine in itself can purify the blood or supply new tissues and strong nerves is ridiculous and on a par with the folderol that dyspepsia or indigestion is a germ disease or that other fallacy, that a weak stomach which refuses to digest food can be made to do so by irritating and inflaming the bowels by pills and cathartics.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets cure indigestion, sour stomach, gas and bloating after meals because they furnish the digestive principles which weak stomachs lack, and unless the deficiency of pepsin and diastase is supplied it is useless to attempt to cure stomach trouble by the use of "tonics," "pills" and "cathartics" which have absolutely no digestive power, and their only effect is to give a temporary stimulation.

One grain of the active principle in Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will digest 3,000 grains of meat, eggs and similar foods and experiments have shown that they will do this in a glass bottle at proper temperature, but of course are more effective in the stomach.

There is probably no remedy so universally used as Stuart's Tablets because it is not only the sick and ailing, but well people who use them at every meal to insure perfect digestion and assimilation of the food.

People who enjoy fair health take Stuart's Tablets as regularly as they take their meals, because they want to keep well. Prevention is always better than cure, and Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets do both; they prevent indigestion and they remove it where it exists. The regular use of one or two of them after meals will demonstrate their merit and efficiency better than any other argument.

PETE.

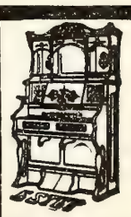
Here was a serious difficulty. Ten sacks of candy, and no way to divide it! "I tell you what," called Linda May, looking back over her shoulder, as she reluctantly marched homeward, "you might let me have one gumdrop, and if you ever do divide it, you kin keep one out for mine." Madge said that was fair, so Edgar went after Linda May and gave her a gumdrop. Then he came back to the Morris house, where Pete and Madge stood in perplexity. "Best way seems to me," said Pete, swinging on the gate, "is to take this candy to Linda May's to-morrow after school and divide it in her storm-cellar. Mr. Brown can manage somehow to come, I reckon; he generally is around, ain't you, Mr. Brown? Are you very much afraid of Miss Dollie?"

Edgar said he didn't believe Miss Dollie would let him get to the cellar. "Still, that's the best way," said Madge. "If we took it to school, we know you wouldn't be there. And you must have your part, since it was your money." "I think of a way," Pete announced. "Before time for school to let out, when Miss Dollie ain't a-looking for Linda May back home, you sneak into her back lot, Mr. Brown, and crawl through the back fence down at the corner, and crouch along up to the cellar, and scoot in and stay in there till we come." Edgar said with decision that this plan would not do. What would Miss Dollie think if she should come to the cellar and find him crouching there? Besides, he could not bring himself to sneak into anybody's premises. "Pete," said Madge, "I wonder why it is that your plans are always so wicked? And yet they always sound so nice! What fun that would be, to see Mr. Brown crawling through the fence! Wouldn't we have fun, anyway, if there wasn't any good or bad in the world!" "Still," said Edgar, "I don't see where the fun would come in in the course Pete has outlined. It might be fun to see me crawling through the fence, if you saw me. But if Miss Dollie saw me she wouldn't enjoy it; and it would be no pleasure to the crawler." "Wouldn't it?" said Pete in surprise, "why, it would do me good all over to crawl in that way! But I guess what's fun to children ain't to grown people, is it?" "Look at Linda May!" said Madge. "Isn't she just creeping along! Now, we must decide about this candy. Mr. Brown, you've got to manage it. I tell you. You come to Miss Dollie's about half-past four, and say you want to see me; I ain't afraid of Miss Dollie. Then she can't help letting you get to us. And until then you keep the candy yourself, so we'll know it's all there." "I'll tell Linda May," said Pete, so she climbed atop of the gatepost and called, "Linda May!" "Wha-a-at?" answered Linda May, who was half down the street. "We've decided it," shouted Pete; "Mr. Brown is to eat all the candy hisself." "No, that's not it," cried Madge, "Yes, it is," shouted Pete, dancing on the gatepost. "He'd better not!" called Linda May. "Pete," said Madge, "go and ask mamma if I can run down street and tell Linda May all about it." "No, you go," said Pete. "No, you," said Madge. "No, you," said Pete. "I'll go," said Edgar, so he went and told Linda May.

The next evening at half-past four, Edgar Brown knocked on Miss Dollie's door. Miss Dollie came at once. "Why didn't you ring the bell?" she said. "I didn't see it," said Edgar. "Why didn't you look?" she returned. Edgar carried a small valise. Miss Dollie looked at it sharply and said, "Now, sir, we don't want anything here." "You are mistaken, madam," said Edgar, "I have not brought anything to sell. I came to see if—" "No," said Miss Dollie, "I don't want to look at any samples of things either." "But I have no samples. Isn't this Miss Dudley? Brown is my name." "Yes, I am Miss Dudley," said Miss Dollie, "but that's neither here nor there. I can't look at prospectuses, for I never buy subscription books. If Mrs. Griggs sent you here, I will just let her know—"

"But," said Edgar, "I am not an agent of any kind. I came to see if Madge Morris and Pete are here." "Madge and Prudence are here," said Miss Dollie. "Well," said Edgar, "so I understood. And I want to see them." "They are in that storm-cellar," said Miss Dollie, pointing. "And mind how you craunch on my blue grass, for there's a gravel path all the way, if you will stay upon it, sir." So that's the way Edgar Brown got into Miss Dollie's storm-cellar. They were all waiting for him, sitting on soap-boxes. He opened the valise and took out the ten sacks of candy and a quantity of peanuts. The candy was all poured out upon a clean shingle, classified and divided. The peanuts were counted and apportioned out. The valise was to put the shells in. There were lemon-drops, wintergreen-drops, butterscotch, "ho'houn'," niggerheels, chocolate-drops, peanut candy, red-hots and "cheap candy." There were fifteen pieces for each one, counting the red-hots. Not counting the red-hots there were seven. There were twenty-four peanuts apiece. "The next time," said Linda May, "we must get candy beans. I have a nickel all of my own, and I'll put mine with you others', and that'll make twenty cents. Oh, my! Won't that get lots! Peppermint-drops are cheap, you can get ever so many for a nickel, and they go further than anything else, because they smell so, too. Madge, what are you going to do about coming to my party since Arthur won't bring you?" "I'll just bring myself," said Madge, independently. "Wasn't he hateful, though, telling everybody I'd consented to come with him, but he wasn't going to bring me! I'll never get over that!" "What made him tell on you, anyway?" said Pete. "Just because he was a BOY," said Madge.



"No," said Linda May, "I believe he had a reason for telling about your note, 'cause I asked him what made him do so mean and he got all red and said he wasn't going to tell. Oh, this is the funniest tasting piece of candy I ever tried. Do you want to taste it, anybody?" "Is it good?" asked Pete. "Oh, no, it's awful! It's as na-a-asty!" "I'll taste it," said Madge. She did so, and made a terrible face. "Oh, let me!" cried Pete. She tasted and expectorated with violence. "You want to, Mr. Brown?" asked Linda May obligingly. He thanked her, but declined. "Oh, please taste it!" said Pete. "You won't ever know how nasty it is if you don't. I know what it reminds me of. Lean over here, Madge, and I'll tell you." "I won't," said Madge; "mustn't whisper in company." "Then I'll speak right out." "No, don't you do it, Pete," cried Madge apprehensively. "I will, too. It reminds me of Vomit!" "Why, Pete Morris!" cried Linda May. "That ain't nice to talk about, is it, Mr. Brown?" "The candy wasn't nice either," said Pete laughing. Edgar thought the conversation was growing peculiar, but the girls all laughed now, so he supposed that was the thing and laughed also. "And I told Arthur," continued Linda May, "that since he'd acted so scan'lous, he mustn't come to my party, either!" "Whaddy say?" inquired Madge. "Said he'd show me if he didn't! Said he'd be the first one here!" And so they talked and laughed and ate candy and cracked peanuts. This was Wednesday. And just think! Friday is Linda May's party. Oh, goodness! I wonder what she'll have?

The Walk to Emmaus.*

Seven or eight miles northwest of Jerusalem lay the village of Emmaus, toward which, on that first Easter morning, two disciples of Jesus slowly wended their way. The joyous spring was bursting into bloom of flowers and song of birds, and all nature seemed to be holding holiday. But the chill of winter was in their hearts. Their Lord had been crucified but three days ago, and their hopes of finding in him the long-expected Messiah had been buried with him in the tomb of Joseph. True, just before they left the city, tidings had come to the little company of despondent Galileans that the tomb was empty, and some of the women had declared that angels told them Jesus was alive. But this was too good to be true, and was attributed to the hysterical illusions of Mary Magdalene and her female companions. So these two comrades could but give each other the comfort of a sad exchange of experiences. Doubtless they were somewhat consoled by sharing their disappointment with each other, for there is that in sympathy which lightens the burdens of the soul, even where they cannot be removed.

In the midst of their gloomy thoughts and sorrowful converse they are joined by a stranger, who halted as he reached their side, and made as though he would share their company. It was not strange that he should observe the troubled air and grieved expression that could but show itself in their bearing and countenances. "What communications are these that ye have with one another, as ye walk?" the stranger asked. To men whose souls were full of the one great sorrow of their lives, such a question seemed almost cruel. Especially since the events that gathered about the death of Jesus had filled all Jerusalem with their strange effects. The two men stop, and stand still in the road, while the consciousness of their desolation sweeps again over them with resistless power. The revised version says, "And they stood still, looking sad." For a few moments they could not answer. Then one of them, whose name was Cleopas, half in doubt whether the strange questioner could be sincere in his seeming ignorance, asked him, "Dost thou alone sojourn in Jerusalem and not know the things which are come to pass there in these days?" "What things?" was Jesus' reply. He purposed to draw from them a statement of their difficulties and doubts, that he might remove them by his marvelous self-revelation. Even so now, the Master will not fully reveal himself unto us, until we have first told in his ear all our doubts and fears, our longings and hopes. He will reward our confidence with fresh and more abundant revelations of his grace and glory.

Cleopas and his companion recount the story of the ministry of the Nazarene, how in mighty deed and word he brought men closer to their God, and taught them how to love one another. With shame and deep sorrow they told how he had been rejected by his own nation, whose chief priests and rulers were blind to his goodness and deaf to his teachings of truth and grace. They had carried their mad opposition to the point of judicial condemnation, and had secured from the Roman power the awful verdict of death by crucifixion for him whose only offence was that of speaking truth and incarnating goodness. They tell him how their own hopes of the promised deliverer were dashed to the ground with the death of Jesus, and not even the strange rumors of the empty tomb and the vision of angels could lighten the cloud of their despair. It was a fearful plunge for faith to take, from the height of hope on Palm Sunday, with the Master riding as a king into the Holy City, down to the cross of Calvary and the still body in the tomb of Joseph. No wonder the disciples found it difficult to revive their expectations, thus blighted by the cold frosts of the grave.

During all this time Jesus was not recognized. "Their eyes were holden," Luke tells us, "that they should not know him." Mark says that "He appeared to them in another form." For some good reason the Master caused that they should not recognize him until he had proven to them from the Scriptures that the Christ must suffer, and rise from the dead. Then would their faith rest not alone on the sight of their eyes, but on the testimony of the word of God. Rebuking, therefore, their dullness of apprehension, which had led them into unbelief, he opened up the Old Testament writings, and showed them how that all these things at which they marveled were foretold concerning the Christ. They listened with eager attention and glowing rapture to the wonderful discourse, which made their beloved Scriptures like a new revelation to them. They afterwards recalled how their hearts burned within them as he spoke, but now they are only conscious of the new and blessed light which he is throwing on their ancient prophets and law-giver. In the midst of this divine discourse they reach their home and they compel with the sweet restraint of hospitality their new found friend to abide with them, and eat at their table.

Jesus, their beloved Teacher and Lord, whose death had broken their hearts, and whose absence had made the world a prison, was with them, and they knew it not. But Jacob at Bethel, and these two disciples at Emmaus, are not the only ones of God's children who have been ignorant of his presence, and have thought they had to walk life's thorny path alone. We too often forget that no believing, loving soul can be companionless, for the Lord delighted to share his company with those of kindred spirit to his own. Not till they sat at the early evening meal, and their strange guest assumed the place of host, and with the familiar prayer of blessing, and the distribution of the bread, brought back the scene with which his followers had become familiar, as he joined in the daily meal of many an humble household, did it break upon them that this was in very truth their Lord himself. "He was known to them in the breaking of bread." How sweetly does the Master reveal himself unto us, in the sacred communion of his body and blood, the Lord's supper. And how rich the experiences we miss when we willingly absent ourselves from its regular observance.

The Master disappeared from their sight, but he left in their hearts the glorious consciousness of his resurrection, and his future eternal presence with his people. They hasten on the fleet wings of joy to rejoin the little company in Jerusalem, and tell of their glad and holy vision. Their words find confirmation from Mary Magdalene, and the company of women with her, and from Simon Peter, all of whom have seen the Lord.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and, therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address,

TOPIC FOR APRIL 21.

Walking With Jesus.

Col. 2:6,7; Gal. 5:16 26.

What an experience that must have been when the two disciples walked with Jesus, after his resurrection, to the little town of Emmaus, their hearts burning and their eyes opening over the broken bread! Suppose they had refused to walk with the stranger; suppose they had been cold and unfriendly; suppose they had failed of the opportunity of walking with him. Have any of us had a similar opportunity and refused to accept it?

Paul's greatest idea, perhaps, is his notion of close companionship with Christ, such close relations in fact, as to amount to identity. He wishes us to be in Christ, and to have Christ in us. This mystic union between the believer and the Savior is the crowning feature of Paul's thinking. Do we, Endeavorers, walk so closely with Christ as to be actually one with him? This is only to be attained after long practice of the Christian life.

Many people have been greatly stirred, upon going to Palestine, to find that they were walking in the very paths the Savior trod, by the Lake of Galilee, by the Via Dolorosa, by the way of Kedron and the Mount of Olives. We can all walk in the same paths the Savior walked, in a far truer fashion than by following certain earthly roads. We can walk in the spirit of Christ the paths of kindness, gentleness, uprightness, courage, sacrifice. It is much more possible to walk precisely where he trod by living a life like his than it is to follow his footsteps over gravel and soil.

The character of the paths one walks upon can often be told by the manner of one's gait. Whoever walks in rough ways, over stones and clods and frequent obstacles, lifts his feet high. Whoever is accustomed to level ways, smooth sidewalks and pavements moves with an easy, gliding manner. So those who walk in Christ may be known by the character of their walking; and those who do not, likewise. The former are seen to carry those graces of soul which are known as the fruits of the spirit: love, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, temperance. The latter are known by the awkward and ungainly works of the flesh.

One has to pass through the narrow gate with Christ, the gate which prevents the passage of puffed-up pride and self-righteousness, of greed and covetousness with arms full of gear, of hatred and malice-bearing bundles of darts and poisoned arrows. One has to walk on stony paths, sometimes, with Christ, where there are stone-bruises, and aching feet and aching hearts. Nevertheless, for all in all, the path with the Master is far the better way to walk, easier in the end; for of all hard paths the way of the transgressor is hardest.

BETZ.

The mother of our distinguished evangelist, J. V. Updike, was laid away in the grave Sunday, Mar. 24, 1901. Her maiden name was Mariah Lincoln, daughter of Alfred and Phœbe Lincoln, and was born in Richland county, Ohio, Jan. 26, 1832 and died in Celina, O., March 22, 1901. She was first married to J. V. Updike in the year 1847, but he died of cholera in October, 1849, leaving one child who is our well known evangelist of same name as his father. In 1853 she was re-married to Moses Betz by whom she became the mother of 10 children, five of whom have preceded her to the grave, but leaving six still living, all of whom were present at the funeral which was preached by the writer to a very large number of sympathizing relatives and friends. She became a Christian at the age of 19 and maintained her faith and hope steadfastly unto the end.

BOLIN.

William Bolin was born in Hamilton county, Ill., April 26, 1824, and died at his home in Moultrie county, Ill., Monday night, March 18, 1901. Bro. Bolin united with the Church of Christ in 1859, and until death was "a pillar" in the Jonathan Creek congregation, near his home. He was ever ready with his money and personal influence to help promote the interest of the church at home and abroad. He was the preacher's friend, and of the many who have served the Jonathan Creek Church, I am sure all will feel that in the death of Bro. Bolin they have lost a personal friend. And I know the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST had no truer friend than Bro. Bolin. He first served the church as deacon and for many years as elder. Like Moses, he was not a man of many words, but was a great leader—a man in whom the people had unbounded confidence. He leaves a wife, two sons and three daughters, besides 32 grandchildren and nine great grandchildren to mourn his loss. The funeral services were conducted by Elder W. E. Dudley, the pastor, Wednesday afternoon, March 20, 1901. Truly, a good man has gone to his reward. J. R. PARKER.

Niantic, Ill.

CROWLEY.

Mrs. Margaret Ann Crowley was the oldest child of Washington and Sarah Huffaker and was born in Clinton Co., Mo., Aug. 17, 1833. She was married to F. M. Crowley, March 19, 1857, and had four children, all of whom are now living. Almost the entire married life was spent on the farm east of Kearney where her remains now rest by the side of her husband. Death came Mar. 28, 1901, and the funeral services were conducted by H. S. Saxby in the Christian Church the following day. Early in life she obeyed the gospel, being one of those who were added to the saved during Moses E. Lard's historic first meeting. During her more than fifty years of membership in the church she constantly grew in grace and knowledge. She was a positive character and held strong convictions and though frail of body and unable in the latter part of her life to be a regular attendant at all the services was full of zeal for the cause and liberally contributed to every church enterprise. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST made its weekly visits to her home and found her an interested reader. Thus she acquainted herself with the progress and needs of the cause and intelligently directed her gifts. Her life was a busy one and her industry found work wherever she was. With the hope of escaping the care and exposure of the farm she came to town to spend her declining years with her youngest son but soon after the change was made the summons came that took her to the home of many mansions where loved ones gone before awaited her coming. The bereaved family find their consolation in God's word, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth; Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them." H. S. S.

CORBIN.

Mrs. Nellie McCarty Corbin was born in Liberty, Mo, June 27, 1858, she died on Mar. 17, 1901. She was the daughter of Wm. A. and Alla Riley McCarty. Her father was for many years clerk of the Liberty church At about the age of 20, Sister Corbin was baptized by A. B. Jones, then pastor of the church. She lived a beautiful, consistent Christian life to the very end. She was married Sept. 25, 1878, to Geo. W. Corbin, A. B. Jones being the officiating minister. She met all of the duties of wifehood and motherhood with remarkable wisdom, discretion and fidelity. Her life was an open book written full and large with lessons of congenial and domestic virtue. Sister Corbin was the mother of six daughters, five of whom survive her. These, with her husband and one sister, Mrs. Daniel Hughes, of Kansas City, are filled with the desolation of sorrow, but at the same time with the comfort of Christian hope. It is not often a church and community are called upon to give up one so universally popular as was this good wife, mother and neighbor.

HALL.

Entered into life. Elder J. C. T. Hall, one of the oldest of our pioneer preachers has been called to his reward. Bro. Hall was born in Ewell, Surrey, England, March 1818, came with his parents to this country in 1821 and settled in Edwards county, Ill. He was married to Elizabeth Emmerson in 1846, he has been a preacher and organizer of Christian Churches in this and adjoining counties for more than 50 years. He will long be remembered for his readiness to help in every good work, and his encouraging words so kindly spoken. May we be inspired by his example to work faithfully for the Master until we shall be called to meet him in our home above. At the Christian Church the services were conducted by Eld. Caleb Edwards assisted by Elders W. C. Couch, of Friendsville, J. H. Stotter and C. W. Freeman, of Mt. Carmel. All the other churches in the town were represented on the rostrum by their pastors. From the church the remains were taken to Graceland cemetery where after a brief prayer by Elder C. Edwards they were laid to rest.

HUGHES.

Mrs. Margaret Russell Hughes, wife of Prof. George Hughes, of Liberty, Mo., died Mar. 6, 1901. She was born in Clay county, Mo., Feb. 11, 1839. Was married Sept. 29, 1859. George Hughes and his wife confessed their faith in Christ and came into the Christian Church in Liberty in 1866, where they have both remained prominent members up to the time of her death. Her husband still lives, though now in his 74th year and quite feeble. Brother and Sister Hughes had four children born to them. Two died in infancy. Two sons, Frank and Ralph, the former a merchant, the latter a lawyer, both reside in Liberty and are both Christian men and useful citizens and dutiful sons. Mrs. Hughes' death was induced by cancer. She died in Kansas City where she was being treated by a physician. In her death the home, the church and the society of Liberty have all sustained a great loss. She was a woman of rare force of character and unusual executive ability and was always active in her ministry to those about her and always prominent and ready in every good work. Her home was made radiant with intelligence, hospitality and social life. Her interest in the church, in every department of its activities, was untiring and ever increasing. Her funeral was conducted in the church in Liberty by her pastor, J. H. Hardin, and the writer. The wide sphere of her useful life was made apparent in the very large gathering from the different churches and various circles of society, and in the profusion of their floral offerings. Nearly forty-two years ago it was the writer's privilege to solemnize the rites of marriage between Mr. and Mrs. Hughes and from that time to the death of Sister Hughes our fellowship was unbroken.

A. B. JONES.

JUSTICE.

Died, at the home of parents in Toluca, Ill., March 29, little Ross Carroll Justice; aged one year and six months. Funeral services by the writer. A. R. ADAMS.

CONSUMPTION

is almost as deadly as ever, although physicians know they can cure it generally, beginning when most of the lungs are still sound, and even sometimes when a great deal of damage is done.

The people don't know it yet. They have been told; but they don't believe it; they don't act on it.

Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil is one of the principal means of cure.

There are other helps: dry air, sunshine, country, sleep, regular habits, right clothing.

TAYLOR.

Elmira Martin was born Feb. 14, 1843, and died at her home near Wilsonville, Ia., on the 21st day of February, 1901, aged 58 years and seven days. She was sick only four or five days; her husband and friends thinking up to a few hours of her death that she would get well, but alas! their hopes were in vain. About the first of September, 1857, at the age of 14 years and under the preaching of Elder Thompson, she united with the Christian Church and was one of the charter (about 40) members of his "Big Cedar Christian Church" of which only three are living. On the 30th day of October, 1861, she was united in marriage with Mr. T. E. Taylor. God blessed this happy union with five children, two sons and three daughters, all living and all present at the funeral except one son, Henry, who is absent in Europe seeking an education. Through the kind influence of a loving mother and her consecrated Christ-like life and the environments of a pure and Christian home, all the children in early life confessed Christ and have lived pure Christian lives and some of them very active church workers. I would to God all homes were as pure and honorable. Her life was always kind, generous and benevolent, the poor and needy were not forgotten nor neglected. The writer owes a great deal to her and her family for words of sympathy and encouragement in the Christian life and work. Her greatest anxiety was that her Savior might be everybody's Savior and her most happy and joyful moments were when she could see or know of persons confessing Christ. She was very enthusiastic and anxious for the success of mission work, both home and foreign, for which she gave liberally for their support. Her death has darkened a home and saddened a community. To her husband, children and friends we would say: Look up to a home where there is no death, no separation, no graves. She was a member of the church at Stockport, Ia. ISAIAH HARLAN.

Wilsonville, Ia.

WATSON.

On the 18th day of February in Nebraska City, Neb., at his own home in the presence of his wife, son, Dr. Claude Watson, and a number of sympathizing friends, Dr. Lemuel Watson went through the "valley of the shadow of death" trusting in Jesus Christ his Savior. Bro. Watson was born in North Carolina 76 years ago, and was ready to join the innumerable company who had preceded him to the better land. Thirty years ago the subject of this notice was buried in baptism in Columbia, Missouri, by Elder J. K. Rogers. During all the intervening years his faith never wavered. In his profession he took front rank as a practitioner and was actively engaged in relieving the suffering until the day he was smitten with la grippe, from which he never rallied. Dr. Watson was a kind neighbor and in his home he was devoted to his family. He leaves two children to mourn his loss, Dr. Claude Watson of this city and a daughter in Missouri. By request of Bro. Watson the writer preached the funeral sermon, in the presence of a large company of his true friends and neighbors. "We are gathering homeward one by one." Until the Lord calls us home we bid our friend and brother a tender farewell. J. T. SMITH.

Book Notes.

If you want to be a physician, it will cost you many hundreds of dollars to secure the necessary training and knowledge. If you want to be a lawyer, the same is true. Moreover, the same can be said of almost any profession. But suppose, young man or young woman, you conclude to become a stenographer. If you become a good stenographer you will earn as much as the average physician or lawyer, and the cost of obtaining the knowledge of stenography is just FIVE DOLLARS—provided you obtain from us the Moran Series of Instruction Books.

This series of books consists of seven volumes. Purchased singly they would cost you considerably more than five dollars, but we are making a special offer, just now, for the complete set. Very soon the schools and colleges will be closing for the long summer vacation, and many thousands of young people will be turned loose with nothing in particular to do until September. Why waste the summer? Why not improve the time gaining a practical knowledge of stenography, which will be of immense help to you all through life, no matter what your profession may be? The investment of five dollars now may be worth thousands of dollars to you.

Do you doubt that you can learn shorthand without a teacher? We can only assure you that this has been done by many young people of only average natural ability. If you are, by nature, extraordinarily dull and stupid, perhaps it is true that you would fail, either with or without a teacher. But if you have average mental ability and are in earnest, you certainly can, with no other assistance than what is given by the Moran Series of Instruction Books, become a first-class stenographer, able to command a salary of from $75 to $150 per month.

Do you say that there are already too many stenographers? This is not true. There are too many incompetents, who constantly blunder and who are worth no more than $5 to $8 per week. But there is a lively demand for thoroughly competent writers of shorthand at good salaries, and no really first-class stenographer need ever be without a position. Send us $5, and we will send you the complete set of instruction books.

Are there little children in your family? You should secure for their entertainment and benefit, the "Saturday Talk Series of Childhood," by Laura Gerould Craig. There are six volumes in the set—"Little Presidents," "Little Kings," "Little Queens," "Little Orators," "Little Generals" and "Little Statesmen." The books are illustrated, finely printed and bound. The price per set is $2, or any volume may be had, singly, for 40 cents.

The thousands of friends and admirers of the late Alexander Procter will be glad to know that he left some twenty sermons in MS., which, with a sketch of his life, will shortly be published in book form, by the Christian Publishing Company. Due announcement will be made of the time of publication, price, etc., of this volume.

Special Catalogue No. 31 is rapidly approaching completion and will soon be ready to send out. If you wish a copy, drop us a postal card, and one will be mailed you as soon as ready. Our Special Catalogue No. 22, issued a year ago, made a great hit. No. 31 will contain more "good things" than No. 22 did, and you will want to have it, of course.

If you wanted to buy fifty cents' worth of sugar you would go or send to a grocery store close at hand rather than to a store in the next county, provided prices and quality of sugar were the same, wouldn't you? Then why should people in the Mississippi Valley and the west send to Boston, New York or Philadelphia for a book when they can get it for the same price in St. Louis? If you want to buy a set of Shakespeare, or a text-book on Grecian history, or one of Richard Harding Davis' novels, or any other book published, send your order to the Christian Publishing Company.

How to Understand and Use the Bible, by J. H. Bryan, is a little work that no preacher, Sunday-school worker or earnest Bible student should be without. The book is just what the title implies. The Bible is made up of many parts, written at different times, by different people for different purposes. You cannot afford to fail to read this book if you desire to have a clear, intelligent conception of the word of God. The price is but fifty cents.

HOME MISSIONS NUMBER

AMERICA AS A MISSION FIELD

AMERICA! Greatest name on the world's map. A name that awakens higher aspirations wherever spoken. Land of Providence. God kept his hand over it until he could plant it with the seeds of political and religious freedom. Here stands the mightiest republic the world has ever seen. Its starry flag has been the banner of hope to the oppressed of earth. Under its ample folds Religion builds its altar, with none to molest. No State Church hampers its growth or suppresses its enthusiasm. Ours is an elect nation. God has called it to a world-wide mission. This is the day of its greatest opportunity. Here, if anywhere, is to be solved the mighty problem of Christian unity and co-operation. It is the day of opportunity for the Disciples of Christ, who have dedicated themselves to a pure gospel and a united church. The American Christian Missionary Society is their accredited agent for preaching an unsectarian gospel and pleading for the unification of Christian forces throughout America. To save the world we must save America. To save America we must save the churches from the sin and folly of divided energies and wasted resources. Patriotism, philanthropy, religion, all unite in a mighty appeal for American Missions.

Can You Write Shorthand?

DO YOU KNOW that there is a great demand for first-class stenographers? There are hundreds of "business colleges" and "stenographic schools" throughout the country that are annually turning out thousands of young men and women stenographers, and yet there is a constant call for really capable writers of shorthand. There is an over-supply of incompetents, but not nearly enough well-qualified stenographers to meet the demands of the business world, and consequently the young man or woman who thoroughly masters stenography can command a salary of from $75 to $150 per month.

PERHAPS you have thought that in order to become a first-class stenographer, it was necessary for you to leave home and attend a school, at a cost, all told, of several hundred dollars. If you have thought this, you have thought wrong. Many of the most expert stenographers in the country never saw the inside of a shorthand college, and had no other teacher than instruction books. If you have ordinary intelligence and a good knowledge of the English language, you can do as they did.

THE MORAN SERIES of Instruction Books in the Reporting Style of Shorthand is undoubtedly the best system ever offered. It is used in the best stenographic schools in the land. It is Thorough, Complete, Practical and especially adapted for self-instruction. If you secure this series of instruction books, all that is necessary to obtain a complete mastery of stenography is a reasonable amount of study and practice. There are seven books in the series, as follows:

The Reporting Style of Shorthand, Cloth, 312 pages	$1.50
Key to the Reporting Style of Shorthand, Cloth, 104 pages	2.00
The Shorthand Primer, Paper, 32 pages	.25
The Sign Book, Limp Cloth, 47 pages	.25
The Shorthand Dictionary, Cloth, 160 pages	1.00
One Hundred Valuable Suggestions, Cloth, 120 pages	1.00
The Students' Shorthand Manual, Cloth, 144 pages	1.00

Are you a student in some high school, academy, college or university? A moment's thought will convince you that a knowledge of shorthand will be of immense assistance to you, even if you do not intend to follow stenography as a profession. Why not secure these books, and put in the summer months learning shorthand? Are you engaged in business of any kind? Shorthand will save you a great deal of time and labor in the making of memoranda. Are you a preacher? Remember that the best authorities on sermonizing declare that all sermons should be written, whether the manuscript be taken into the pulpit or not. How easy to write your sermons if you can avoid the tedious, finger-cramping longhand!

A SPECIAL OFFER! While we will send any one of the volumes above mentioned on receipt of the price, we will, until further notice, make a special offer of the entire series of seven volumes, complete, for $5.00.

$5.00—The Complete Series—$5.00

This is a generous offer. These books cost far more to publish than the ordinary text-book, because of the special plates required, yet we make a very substantial reduction for the series, which, purchased volume by volume, would cost Seven Dollars. Send for the series, diligently apply yourself, and in three months you can equal the work of the average stenographer, and in six months will be expert. You will find that $5.00 thus spent will be the best investment you ever made.

Opening of Indian Lands. Seekers of new homes in the west are looking forward eagerly to the opening of new Indian lands during the coming summer. In accordance with an act of Congress, the Kiowa and Wichita reservations must be opened for settlement not later than August 6. The exact date will be fixed by the President by proclamation. Whenever it comes, there will be no rush for claims as at the opening of Oklahoma, and it is hoped that the number of disputes over claims and boundaries will be correspondingly diminished. Qualified persons who desire land will register during the month preceding the opening, and the assignment of claims will be made by lot. The Wichita lands contain 3,122 allotments of 160 acres each, and the Kiowa lands have 10,351 allotments of the same size. It is expected that the number of applicants will be far in excess of the number of tracts to be assigned, but the order of the applications will not be considered. All who apply within the specified time will have an equal chance; 13,473 of them will draw claims, and the rest, perhaps twice as many, will draw blanks. The government will receive $1.25 per acre, and the usual conditions, improvement, and five years of residence, are required, except in the case of soldiers, whose period of active service is deducted from the five years.

Bradley's Testimony. In the new trial of Captain Ripley on the charge of complicity in the murder of Gov. Goebel, of Kentucky, something of a sensation was created when Ex-Gov. Bradley testified that Gov. Taylor had said shortly before Goebel was killed that he would not live twenty-four hours. This remark was said to have been made to Capt. Ripley while ordering him to hurry his company of mountaineers to Frankfort, and was repeated by Ripley to Bradley. The testimony was confirmed by Judge Yost. Ripley has since endeavored to explain that he was not correctly understood; that what Gov. Taylor really said was that "some irresponsible fool is likely to kill me or kill Goebel and cause a riot around here," and that the troops were to be hurried to Frankfort simply to quell any disturbance of this sort which might arise. No steps have yet been taken toward issuing new extradition papers for Taylor, who is now residing in Indianapolis. Indiana has had a change of governors since the former refusal to deliver the accused for trial and there have been unconfirmed rumors that Gov. Durbin is ready to honor a requisition and send Taylor back to Kentucky for trial.

The Beaumont Oil Boom. The report of the opening of marvelous oil wells a few weeks ago at Beaumont was only preliminary to other reports of still more wonderful discoveries of the same sort. From day to day new streams have been tapped and new "gushers" have successively broken the records of their predecessors. There seems to be no doubt that Texas is to be henceforth one of the world's great oil-producing regions, but investigations have yet proceeded only to such a slight degree that it is impossible to estimate the extent of the new oil fields. Many new companies are being incorporated every day. Nine of them, with a total capital of more than a million dollars, filed charters on Monday of this week. An important question, for which a solution must soon be worked out, is the attitude which is to be maintained toward the Standard Oil Company. Texas has an anti-trust law which was enacted very largely to limit the operations of this company, but many of the legislators are becoming interested in the oil fields and there is, among a certain element, a demand for co-operation with the Standard Oil Company. It is claimed that in no other way can the product be put on the market profitably. The story of the small independent operators in Pennsylvania who attempted to resist the trust is not an encouraging one and it may be that no very strict enforcement of the anti-trust law will be attempted in this case.

Against Compulsory Education. Governor Dockery, of Missouri, has vetoed the Simmons Compulsory Education bill, which was originally drawn up by a committee of the State Teachers' Association. The bill as passed provided for not only the enactment but the enforcement of a law for compulsory education, by providing truant officers to see that all children between the specified ages attend school. Without some provision of this sort the enforcement of the law in each individual case is entirely in the hands of the parent, who can send his children to school, as the law requires, or keep them at home, just as he pleases. This is just the same as having no law at all, for it leaves the whole case just where it found it. The principle of compulsory education has been uniformly approved in the most enlightened communities and its adoption is a mark of advancing civilization. But the governor of Missouri thinks that it involves an undue degree of paternalism. To our mind it is an important part of the state's business to see that its future citizens receive a common-school education. As intelligence increases crime decreases, and the more children there are in our schools the fewer criminals there will be in our penitentiaries. Has the state no function of prevention as well as cure?

The Church of Italy. A secret consistory was held in Rome on Monday of this week, on which occasion Archbishop Martinelli, papal delegate in the United States, and eleven other high ecclesiastics were made cardinals of the Roman Catholic Church. The church assumes to be a universal spiritual empire, but it is apparently becoming more and more an Italian affair as far as its hierarchy is concerned. Martinelli himself is, of course, an Italian. The nationality of the others who were made cardinals at the same time can be easily guessed from their names and titles. They are Monsignori] Firpete, Cabagnis, Miniatelli, Ceunari and Della Volce, the Archbishops of Benevento, Ferrara, Prague and Cracow and the Bishops of Verona and Pavia. The Catholic Church made a bad break when it called itself officially the "Roman" Catholic Church at the Vatican council, but the word Roman is fairly descriptive. It might, without doing violence to the facts, call itself the Church of Italy, but that is as near as it comes to being universal. The appointment of new cardinals, and especially new Italian cardinals, becomes more and more significant as the Pope becomes older and more feeble, for his successor will be chosen by the cardinals, and not by all of them, but by those who happen to be in Rome at the hour of his death. Modern railroad facilities now enable the cardinals to gather from all parts of Italy while a pope is on his death-bed, but those in other countries have small chance of being permitted to participate in the election of his successor.

A Floating Exposition. The ordinary exposition is a reversal of the method of the traveling salesman in that it expects the people to come to the goods instead of taking the goods to the people. It has recently been suggested by the chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department that a floating exposition which would display the products of the United States and would carry them to the very doors of the people with whom we wish to have commercial relations, would be a paying enterprise. One or more ships could be employed and two years might be occupied in making the tour of the world. The idea is not quite as new as it sounds, for it has already been tried by an exhibition organized in Hamburg, Germany, about two years ago. It was purely a commercial enterprise and aimed to effect immediate sales. It might be described as an immense syndicate for the purpose of reducing the traveling expenses of its salesmen, for each company represented had its samples displayed and its agent to take orders, and the special aim in every case was to get the buyers on board the ship at the various ports at which it stopped. These ports were also used as stations from which agents and samples were sent to convenient points in the interior. On the whole it was a great financial success. A similar enterprise is being organized in connection with the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo and the floating exposition will begin a tour of the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea in the early autumn.

The Chinese Indemnity. The flurry over Manchuria having temporarily subsided and Japan's desire for a fight being apparently under control again, attention is once more focused on the indemnity question. The estimates given are still somewhat vague. It is stated in one quarter that the general sentiment of the Powers favors a total demand of $500,000,000, but that the United States will use all its influence to keep the amount down to $200,000,000, and will, if necessary, reduce its own moderate demands pro rata with the others to bring the total down to this figure. To prevent the demand of an impossible sum is the best possible means of preventing the seizure of Chinese territory by the Powers, which will almost surely occur if China cannot pay what is required. The chief difficulty is to determine how much China can pay. She has an immense population and a wonderfully fertile soil. Her present system of collecting taxes is full of leaks so that, according to reliable accounts, only a small proportion of what the people pay actually reaches the public treasury. The rest goes into the pockets of the officials. A reform in the method of tax-collecting might make the payment of the indemnity a real blessing to China though a hard blow to the thieving officials. Minister Wu thinks this is a great chance for the western nations to give the deathblow to Chinese prejudice against foreigners by generous treatment, and he reminds us that the disorders have already cost China probably twice as much as all of the Powers together. That is a phase of the matter which ought to be considered to counteract the tendency to demand large indemnities as a punishment to China. China has already had part of her punishment.

Cuba Decides. After much wabbling and uncertainty, much hot debate and many changes of opinion, the Cuban Constitutional Convention has reached a decision in regard to its relations to the United States. It has decided not to decide upon them definitely until a commission has been sent to Washington to consult with the administration. The former resolution of the Convention against sending such a commission having been revoked, and Secretary Root having officially stated that the administration would welcome the commission if it should come, it has been voted to send five Cubans to Washington to represent the attitude of the Convention toward the Platt resolution. If the commissioners can find out what that attitude is before they get to Washington, they will be doing more than any one else has been able to do up to date. But perhaps it will answer quite as well if they will decide among themselves on a position and bring their colleagues around to it when they return. The Platt resolution is an act of Congress and it is of little use for the commissioners to come to the President in the hope of getting better terms. He may, however, be able to present the Platt resolution to them in a less odious light than it has hitherto appeared or he may exercise some liberty in giving it a more favorable interpretation from the Cuban point of view than has yet been suggested. On the whole it was a very sensible thing for the Cubans to send up their representatives to talk over the situation. It may at least prevent them from doing anything hotheaded and rash, if it does nothing more. The radicals in Cuba are said to be making a personal fight on Gen. Wood, whose governorship has been one of the best things that ever happened for the island since the waters subsided and left it dry land. Some of the Cuban papers are circulating the statement that his administration has been considered a failure in Washington. A popular petition has come from Porto Rico complaining that there is great destitution and lack of work and begging the government to make appropriations for public works. The originator of the petition is said to be a labor contractor. The governor says that he has not been able to find any great destitution in the island and that the labor conditions are reasonably good. Meanwhile, however, a good many laborers are emigrating from Porto Rico.

Brevities. King Christian, of Denmark, the oldest reigning sovereign in Europe, has just celebrated his eighty-third birthday.

The threatened strike on the Central Railroad of New Jersey seems to have blown over. Both sides exhibited a spirit of fairness and mutual concessions were made.

The Isthmian canal commission has finished its work and its complete report will be published in about two months. It is said to confirm the preliminary report in preferring the Nicaragua to the Panama route.

Aguinaldo is said to be much in fear of vengeance from the friends of Gen. Luna, who was killed by his order. The manifesto which the ex-dictator is preparing to advise the Filipinos to surrender has not yet been published.

The suit brought by a Boer representative in the federal court at New Orleans to prevent the purchase of American mules for the British army, has been thrown out of court. England can now buy all the mules she wants and can pay for.

The widow of the late Philip D. Armour and his son, J. Ogden Armour, have just given an additional million dollars to Armour Institute in Chicago. This will probably postpone indefinitely the rumored union of the Institute with the University of Chicago.

Gainsborough's famous portrait of the Duchess of Devonshire, which was stolen from London twenty-five years ago has been voluntarily returned by persons who were connected with the original theft. The picture is valued at $50,000 and has never been sold.

A decision has been handed down by the United States Supreme Court that when a divorce is granted in any state where the husband and wife have legal residence, it is valid in any other state, but that a divorce is invalid if granted in a state where they have no legal residence.

An American woman who had to make nine visits to a famous Paris dressmaker before her gown would fit, brought suit for damages on the ground of waste of her time and the French court sustained her plea. In that land of modistes a failure to fit even after nine trials would probably be considered a felony.

A man recently sent $25 to the government's "conscience fund" for duty on articles which he had smuggled through the Customs House. In an accompanying note he explained that he was willing to pay the duty at the time, but did not want his trunks "pawed over" at the dock. Smuggling is a reprehensible practice, but any one who has ever landed at New York can understand his motive.

The Arkansas Senate has passed the much discussed Carlock bill which is a reversal of the usual type of liquor license. It requires every patron of a saloon to take out a license costing $5 a year. This might have the good effect of preventing any one from patronizing the saloon at all unless he began, as probably few do, with a definite intention of becoming an habitual patron. It is doubtful whether the bill will ever become a law.

Trumpet or Chain—Which?

This is the question raised by our annual offering for home missions. An allegorical picture used by the American Christian Missionary Society presents it under the form of a female figure, in two very different attitudes. In one she is blowing the gospel trumpet in fulfilment of her divine mission to preach the gospel to every creature, and her glad notes echo and re-echo over hill and vale as they carry the joyful tidings to cottage and mansion, in crowded city, and out upon the thinly-settled frontier. In the other she is chained and cannot raise the trumpet to her lips. The message is in her heart, but she has no power to communicate it to the perishing millions all about her. This fact fills her soul with inexpressible sadness, which the artist has sought to express in her face. What cruel chain is that about her wrists? It is the indifference of those churches who feel little or no obligation to help their brethren to send the gospel into all parts of our beloved America.

Look upon this picture, and then upon that, and decide which one most fitly represents your attitude to this mother of missionary societies. Have you, by your prayers and contributions, been helping to place this trumpet in her hands? Or have you, by your indifference, which you have sought to cover up by many petty excuses, been helping to fasten the chain about her wrists and thus preventing her, to that extent, from fulfilling her appointed mission? A more practical question, however, for each reader of the Christian-Evangelist to raise, both as to himself and to his congregation, is, What shall be my attitude in the future, beginning with the present year, toward the work of home missions? Will my attitude and action in the matter look toward a trumpet or a chain—which? The time past will suffice for any indifference or inaction toward the vital question of the evangelization of America. The new century upon which we have entered is going to decide much for our country and for the Church of God. Great enterprises of various kinds are already under way looking to material conquests. It is no time for inactivity or slothfulness on the part of the church. Will you help or hinder this great work? Do you believe in the trumpet or the chain—which?

The responsibility incurred by those who fail to do their whole duty to home missions, in this May offering, can only be measured by the value of the message to be delivered by the trumpet in the hands of our own appointed agent, the American Christian Missionary Society. What is that message? Its keynote is that which is sounded by every true gospel trumpet: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have everlasting life." It is a message of hope and good cheer to all who are burdened with sin and with the spirit of unrest, proclaiming Christ as Savior and Lord. This is its message to the world; but it has a message to the church as well. It sounds the plea for a return to the Christianity of Christ, and for the union of all his followers on the original basis of faith in and loyalty to Jesus Christ. No other trumpet in the hands of any other missionary organization is giving such emphasis to the necessity of a united church in order to the evangelization of the world and the overthrow of organized iniquity in our own land. No other trumpet peals forth the simple gospel of Jesus Christ with such effectiveness in winning men from the ways of sin to become his disciples. This fact is substantiated by the statistics of all the great missionary organizations of the country.

Is it not a shame, then, and a crime in the sight of heaven, to chain the hands of a missionary organization which has such a mission and such a message? We believe our readers will agree with us that this chain of negect or indifference must be broken, and this society set free to deliver her message to the waiting millions of our beloved country. If so, let us manifest this sentiment by our contribution to, and our interest in, the May offering.

The Attitude of the Disciples Toward the Other Religious Bodies.

We publish elsewhere an article from Bro. Moore concerning the criticism of his paper at the Lexington Congress on the subject of Christian Union. As to the special point of his paper to which he refers and which received most criticism, we think it but fair to say that had he stated in his paper that some of our brethren at different periods of our movement had written and spoken in a way well calculated to convey the impression that outside of our churches there was little hope of salvation, except on the basis of "uncovenanted mercies," but little fault would have been found with the statement. No one can justly deny that there have been utterances by some of our preachers and writers on this point that none of us would care to stand by, because of the narrow range of vision which they manifested. But this is only to say that our movement has shared the common lot. Every good cause since the world began has been misrepresented by its professed friends who were unable to understand its real spirit and aim.

This is very different, however, from saying that the religious movement of the Disciples as represented by its truly representative men ever committed itself to such a view of its own position and attitude to other religious bodies. It has from the beginning been a Christian union movement and this necessarily implies the existence of Christian people in the various religious bodies about us. We do not think there has ever been any period in our history when the men who had the right to be regarded as speaking for the brotherhood would have endorsed the view that "we were the whole thing"; and that the way to be saved was to join us. This distinction between what certain extreme men have said or thought, and what has been the real sentiment and representative view of our religious reformation is very important, as we have no authoritative creed or official statement of our position. The only fault we had to find with this part of Bro. Moore's paper was his failure to make this distinction, the neglect of which on the part of our religious neighbors has often subjected us to unjust criticism.

Mr. Campbell's "Lunennburgh Letter" was written and printed, if we mistake not, many years after he and the other reformers associated with him had been forced to occupy an independent position because the old bottles were found inadequate to contain the new wine of the reformatory movement. Nor did Mr. Campbell or any of the fathers, so far as we know, ever regard this enforced separation from our religious neighbors as the surrender, in any degree, of our plea for Christian union, but they rather regarded it as a condition of its successful propagation. This was not an attitude chosen by the earlier reformers for themselves, but was one that was forced upon them by existing conditions, as Bro. Moore quite well understands. If there had been sufficient catholicity of spirit and Christian forbearance in the different religious bodies, no doubt the principles of our reformation could have been pleaded, and accepted when found to be true, without the formation of a separate religious movement; but in that case there would have been very much less need of such a plea as ours. The very necessity which existed for such a movement as our fathers inaugurated made it necessary to carry it on outside of existing religious organizations.

It has been true of most reformatory movements that their leaders have been readier to stay in the religious bodies in which they began than those bodies have been to keep them. It was so with Luther, who did not leave the Catholic Church until he was forced out by excommunication. It was so with English Puritanism, which remained in the Church of England, its Presbyterian ministers holding Anglican benefices until forced out by the Act of Uniformity. It was so with Wesleyanism whose leader, John Wesley, claimed to the end of his long life to be a faithful member of the Church of England. The participants in these movements could not logically claim that salvation was impossible in the bodies out of which they had come, for they themselves had been reluctant separatists from those bodies. It was so with the separation of the Campbells, first from the Presbyterians and then from the Baptists.

We are in perfect sympathy, as our readers know, with Bro. Moore's insistence on a broad spirit of Christian fellowship which enables us to recognize and to appreciate at their true value the Christian character and worthy achievements of our religious neighbors who are not identified with us formally in our religious reformation, but many of whose members are at heart in full sympathy with our plea for Christian unity. No one has been more willing than we have been to admit that many of us have not lived up to the high standard which we have set for ourselves. This has been very difficult for us to do, for it is a very high standard which our fathers erected and we are men of like passions and like frailties with others. About the most that we can claim for ourselves is that, according to the best of our ability, and with such wisdom and such clearness of vision as God may have given us, we have tried to hold up this standard of religious reform, and to maintain this plea for Christian unity on the high unsectarian ground on which it was inaugurated. We can only be true to its principles as we keep in close touch with Christ and follow his leadership, as our fathers sought to follow it, both through evil and through good report. So long as we do this we need not be anxious about the results of our work.

Notes and Comments.

A brother called our attention some time ago to the fact that at one of our conventions guests were entertained at a hotel where there was not only a saloon attachment but where the bar was in such prominence that one who signed his name in the register must needs feel almost as if he were patronizing the saloon. This is a grievous evil which has doubtless offended the nostrils of every saloon-hating person who has occasion to travel and patronize hotels. It is bad enough to have saloons at all, but it does seem that every consideration of decency and taste would prevent a hotel proprietor from locating his saloon (if he must have it) where it will be offensive to that large and respectable portion of the community who regard the saloon as the most dangerous institution both to individuals and to society.

Pessimistic critics of contemporary literature are wont to be despondent at the frivolous character of most of our modern literary work, especially in the field of poetry, and to check the too ready admiration of the less critical enthusiast by noting the fact that no genuine epic has been written in the last two and a half centuries. True enough, but our lack of a modern epic springs from no lack of poetic genius. The fact is that a modern epic is impossible. The epic is not only a long narrative poem, but it is a poem which portrays with approximate completeness the totality of the civilization from which it arises. It can exist in its highest form, therefore, only where society is homogeneous. The civilization of the Homeric Age was not diversified. All free men were warriors, and the Iliad, in embodying the warrior ideal, expressed the whole spirit of the age. It is the world's greatest epic because it did express the whole spirit of the time. But our age has too many ideals, conflicting and inharmonious, to find expression in one work. Our lack of an epic springs not from the decadence of literary talent (whatever may be the fact in regard to that alleged decadence) but from the increased complexity of life. Our highest literature must be content with representing a phase of life here and there with no hope of epic completeness in a single work.

A recent writer has remarked very happily that the theological warriors of our time, keeping pace with the improvements in military science, are using smokeless powder. The result is that they see each other more clearly. There are plenty of differences still and it is a mark of weakness or cowardice to attempt to end every discussion with "after all we all think about alike." No, we do not all think alike and there is no reason why we should, but the smokeless powder enables us to see the face of our opponent and even perhaps to see into his heart. Consequently "the more we see the less we slay." The preservation of a brotherly attitude toward those with whom we differ does not depend upon our pooh-phooing away our differences of opinion but upon seeing in their proper perspective these points of difference. Let the smoke of battle pass away and we shall see the faces of our opponents and recognize them as brethren.

The Patent Office Record is a curious and interesting publication for the insight which it gives into the workings of the human mind. We have now-a-days the psychological study of religious experience, of the motives of mobs, of infant consciousness and of all sorts of morbid and exceptional mentality. Isn't there room for a study of inventors, such as the perpetual motion and liquid air variety, by the methods of scientific psychology? A recent number of the Record contained a description of a new device for preventing runaways. It consists of a wagon built in the form of an arch over the horse's back, with two wheels on each side and resembling an enormous pair of old-fashioned panniers arched over the beast but not resting upon him. The horse is thus conveniently out of the way and the outfit takes up no more room in the city than an automobile. Two strong bands pass under the horse's body, each attached to a windlass, one on either side of the wagon. In case the steed attempts to run away, a few turns of the windlasses will hoist him to a position where he can only beat the air with his hoofs while the wagon stops of its own accord. This is certainly ingenious even if it does bear the marks of a disordered brain.

The Universalist Leader, in laying down a series of rules for the use of the Bible in the support of Universalism, has this as its second point: "Never twist, even if a New Testament writer should have to be admitted not a Universalist." That is certainly a piece of good advice which deserves much wider application. Never twist, even if some biblical writer has to be admitted not a Calvinist. Never twist, even if the writer of Genesis has to be admitted not a scientific evolutionist. Never twist, even if it has to be admitted that some of the Messianic prophecies refer primarily to the immediate situation out of which they arose. Never twist, under any circumstances. It was not given to every biblical writer to express the whole of God's truth. If it had been, all of them after the first would have been superfluous.

A literary journal recently discussed at length the question, "Ought literary men to marry?" The answers varied, but all agreed in depicting the typical literary man as an individual very hard to get along with. It occurred to us that, if the question has any pertinence at all, it should be put the other way: "Ought any woman to marry a literary man?" What with the eccentricities of real genius and the worse eccentricities of what tries to be genius, and the irregular habits and hours which are almost inseparable from the literary craft, it would seem that the man ought to be able to stand it if the woman can.

The man of genuine wit (and that, of course, means you, dear reader,) and still more the man with an acrid temper which he mistakes for wit (which, of course, gentle reader, means someone else) may listen with profit to the words which Senator Hoar recently spoke in characterization of the late Senator Cushman K. Davis: "No spark from him was ever a cinder in the eye of his friend." Let your wit strike sparks if it will, but beware of the kind of brilliance which cools to an irritating cinder. With this cinder in the eye the friend may fail to see the point of your joke.

Hour of Prayer.

The Promises of God.*

Text: Whereby he hath granted unto us his precious and exceeding great promises: that through these ye may become partakers of the divine nature, having escaped from the corruption that is in the world by lust.—2 Pet. 1:4.

A widow whose only son was at work in the mines of Australia came to want. She was visited by her minister and asked if she did not receive any aid from her son. "Oh, he writes to me," she replied, "and sends me pictures, but no money." And taking down her Bible, she opened it and showed the minister some of the "pictures" she had laid away carefully between its leaves. They were bank of England notes! She had never seen money of that denomination and was altogether ignorant of its value. God's promises are notes on the bank of heaven and the Bible is full of them, but multitudes of His children never claim them. Test God; present them for payment and see how promptly He will honor them!

A Necessary Condition.

Before we can plead the promises of God, we must observe the conditions. First, then, "having escaped from the corruption that is in the world," literally, having fled away from the corruption and so escaped. We can never receive the favor of God, forgiveness, peace and victory over enemies, so long as we cling to the carnal pleasures of the sensual world. "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me," exclaims the psalmist. It is the effectual, fervent prayer of a righteous man that "availeth much." If the consolations of God are small with you, if His promises seem unreal and impossible of fulfillment, be assured that the fault is with you, not with God. You may have been playing Achan. Look for the wedge of gold and the goodly Babylonish garment. Cast out of your heart everything that can possibly offend. "Abhor that which is evil." For only he that hath clean hands and a pure heart can ascend into the hill of the Lord.

Promises Exceeding Great.

Is it not passing strange that God should make any promises to sinful men? Strange indeed, if we consider human merit; but it is not at all strange when we remember that God is gracious and loving and infinite in mercy. The promise of forgiveness is great and precious (Acts 5:31), because it deals with man's deepest need, and because it conditions every other blessing. The greatness of this promise cannot be expressed; it can be realized only by those who have obeyed the gospel and have passed from death unto life. It includes not only the forgiveness of sin in the removal of its guilt, but the destruction of its power. Over the pardoned soul, sin has no more dominion.

Protection in all times of trial is likewise a precious promise. (Isa. 43:1,2.) There are tears and tragedies, there are lonely hours and desert paths and black waters. But in the darkest depths of woe we are promised the companionship of our Heavenly Father. He will not leave us orphans. "Sweet are the uses of adversity," truly, but only when our Father's face smiles through the cloud. He will guide us; often bewildered, but never confounded, are those who trust Him. The faithful child of God need have no fear of hunger or cold or nakedness. He does not promise silks, to be sure, but He does promise raiment; not table delicacies, but food; not brownstone fronts, but shelter. All necessaries are promised and provided, even though He must commission the ravens to carry them. And finally, ageless life is ours. The shroud becomes a white robe of immortality, and the funeral procession a conqueror's march.

The Purpose.

"That through these ye may become partakers of the divine nature"—is not that the greatest promise of them all? Is it possible that a human soul, with its infirmities and frailties, its wrinkles and spots and blemishes, its corruption and decay, can be made to partake of the divine nature? God-like! What a word! To have the repose of God, and be forever rid of fret and fever; the holiness of God and be free from defilement; the strength of God, the love of God, the life of God—it is inconceivable. Yet we know that this is the grand purpose of God for all His children. His church must be made holy, without spot or wrinkle or any such thing; we are to be perfect, as our Father which is in heaven is perfect. Nothing less will fulfill the design of our Creator. How this knowledge should humble us and inspire us and encourage us! So God's promises satisfy us and arouse us. "Contentment and aspiration," says David Swing, "are in every true man's life. No bird can race in the sky against a noble soul. The eagle's wing is slow, compared with the flight of hope and love."

Prayer.

Thy promises, O God, are overwhelming. And yet my life is barren. Why are they unfulfilled? Canst Thou not trust Thy servant, Lord? Oh cleanse my heart anew. Deliver me from the thralldom of sense. Lead me, Father, to the open heavens, to the abundant blessing which Thou hast for all them that love Thee. Teach me to trust Thy promises, and go forward gladly and gratefully, in Christ Jesus my Lord, Amen.

Editor's Easy Chair.

"The best years of my life," is a phrase we often hear from those who have passed middle life. A recent writer discusses the question as to which are the "best years" of one's life. Childhood with its innocence and freedom from care, and with the joy which belongs to all young life, might be thought by some to constitute the best years of one's life. And yet, there are a thousand sources of joy which do not come within the limited range of knowledge and experience in childhood. Youth-time would probably be voted by a majority of people as embracing the best years of life. And yet youth is the period of "storm and stress" when the soul is tossed about on a sea of temptations and undefined longings and aspirations, much as a vessel rolls and pitches in a stormy sea. However, hope, radiant and all-conquering, spans the future with its bow of promise, and fills the youthful mind with bright visions of triumph and of happiness. It is this that makes youth-time so beautiful as we look back upon it through the haze of the intervening years. The latent potentialities of youth invest it with a charm which does not attach to a later period of life. Nevertheless it can hardly be said, we think, that the best years of life, in a normal development, belong to youthhood.

Middle life, filled with business triumphs or professional success, when life's burdens and responsibilities are borne with the consciousness of strength and the joy which is ever associated with mastering obstacles and overcoming opposition, can present strong reasons for being regarded as embracing the best years of one's life. It is no doubt the period chiefly referred to when this phrase is used. It is the period of greatest achievement in most lives, for it is the time when one's powers, both physical and mental, are at high tide. Not that the mind ceases to expand, for thought often reaches its sublimest heights after middle life, but there is usually lacking sufficient vitality for sustained effort in carrying out great and difficult undertakings. But middle life has its own temptations and perils. Many who pass through the period of youth unscathed, fall a victim to ambition, avarice, materialism, luxury, love of ease, and a feeling of false security, which are among the dangers that lie in wait for us at this period of life. These facts at least raise the question as to whether our best years belong to middle life.

Is it old age, then, that contains the best years of which we speak? Not necessarily. It depends upon the kind of old age, and also upon what we mean by the "best years." No doubt there would be differences of opinion as to what constitutes the best years of life. From our point of view, those years of human life are the best in which we see most of God as He manifests His glory and His beauty in the heavens above us and in the world about us; years in which we have the clearest insight into the meaning of life, and devote ourselves most unselfishly to promoting human good; years in which we are permitted to see of the travail of our soul in the growth of harvests we have sown, and in the triumph of principles for which we have toiled. If old age bring us such a realization of life's meaning and value, if it raise us to the summit of some delectable mountain from which we catch visions of the life to come and which enable us to judge the life that now is in the light that shines from the eternal world—such an old age, it may be admitted, contains the best years of human life.

This is only saying, however, that a life normally lived under the blessing of God should be one of increasing joy from infancy to old age when the soul is ripe for heaven. But as in the seasons of the year, so in these periods of human life, each has its own peculiar charm and each has its own limitation. There is joy and beauty in every stage of human life if we only have eyes to see, ears to hear and hearts to understand. Blessed is the man to whom the world becomes increasingly beautiful and to whom human life becomes increasingly meaningful. We are sure we speak to many hearts of those who are in the "sear and yellow leaf" when we say that more and more the earth on which we live becomes interfused with the wisdom and goodness of God. The green earth, the budding trees, the opening flowers, the blue arch bending over us, the flowing streams, the rolling seas, the majestic mountains—all these speak to our hearts as they did not in former years. But there is a diviner philosophy than this. It is that which enables us to see the goodness of God in the sadder experiences and misfortunes which are too often allowed to darken our lives. When we reach the height of faith where we can say with Paul, "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God and are the called according to His purpose," then these "light afflictions which are but for a moment," do not eclipse the sun of our life, for they are understood to be working out for us "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Are not the best years of life then those in which we walk in closest fellowship with God, and in the light and inspiration which come from an unquestioning faith in Him and in His gracious providence?

How is the date of Easter determined?

Martin Sloan.

After considerable confusion during the first three centuries, rules for the determination of Easter were laid down by the Nicene Council in the year 325. The first full moon on or after the twenty-first of March, which is the vernal equinox, shall be considered as the full moon of the Hebrew month Nisan, in which occurs the Passover; Easter Sunday is the first Lord's day following this full moon. If this full moon falls on Sunday the next Sunday shall be Easter. In other words Easter is the Sunday following the first full moon after the twenty-first of March.

What is the proper interpretation of Hebrews 10:26, and how do you deal with professed Christians who have lost all hope, believing that they have committed the sin against the Holy Ghost?

R. S. Smedley.

Whatever else may be the meaning of the statement that "if we sin willfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin," it cannot be so interpreted as to conflict with the whole course of Christ's teaching and the most obvious facts of human nature. Jesus declared that He came to call sinners to repentance, and it is the experience of every one who has attempted to advance toward the sinless life that the building of character is a gradual process which will inevitably be accompanied by faltering and stumbling. To declare that there is no hope for one who commits a single sinful act after he has received the forgiveness of his sins, is to make Christ's whole mission an absurdity. Moreover, the passage does not require this interpretation. It means rather that if we continue habitually and persistently in sin, in spite of Christ's revelation and sacrifice, there is no hope because there is no other and greater revelation and sacrifice which can win us from our sins if this fails. The person who is troubled about the "sin against the Holy Ghost," needs to have his attention drawn away from the two or three passages which he warps by morbid and exclusive study to the general spirit and tenor of the teachings of Jesus and the inspired writers, which everywhere warrant the belief that God's patience is not less enduring than the spark of good within man's nature and that a penitent sinner has never yet confronted an angry and unforgiving God.

A Little Provoking.

By George Darsie, Jr.

The original word for provoke means to prick, as with the sharp point of a spear or goad. It is capable of both a good and a bad application. The world has seen more than enough of the wrong kind of provoking—that which leads to wrath, envy, hatred, strife, and division. But of provoking "to love and good works," it can stand a great deal more.

An admirable epitome of true Christianity is this—"love and good works." Love is the inner, and good works are the outer life; love is the root, and good works are the branches and fruit; love is the coiled spring in the watch, and good works are the hands. And the love referred to has no narrow bounds or application. It denotes the ruling spirit of the life. It includes not only love for Christ, but also for all his people; for his word, his house, his holy service; for his truth, his righteousness, his purity, his goodness; for humanity at large, the ignorant, weak, sinful, straying, lost and ruined; love as the supreme, guiding, ruling principle and power of our lives. Good works are its outward expression and proof, and no other is adequate. In vain do we say we love Christ, if we will not do his commands. In vain do we profess to love his people if we will not abound in kindly acts toward them. In vain do we claim to love his house if we never enter it, his word if we never read it, his service if we do not earnestly engage in it. In vain do we make it appear that we love lost and fallen humanity if we do nothing for its elevation and salvation.

"A little provoking" to love and good works is always timely. It is especially so as we approach the day for the offering for American missions, and there is no surer and more infallible way to render such service than by example.

Nothing provokes like example. Here is an enterprising merchant in a town or city. Everything he does to push and advance his mercantile interests provokes all the other merchants in town to do likewise. Here is a diligent student at school—always knows his lessons, always recites perfectly, always is well behaved and respectful to his teacher. His example is felt throughout the school and it provokes every other scholar to imitate his diligence. Here is a progressive, wide-awake newspaper. Until it came all the other papers were lifeless and tame and spiritless. It sets them an example. It shows them what a paper can be and do, and at once they are provoked to do likewise. One earnest church can wake up every other church in a city—or in a whole great brotherhood. If any congregation wants to do "a little provoking" for home missions, let it be that church. One active Christian in a church, by an example of willingness, earnestness and usefulness, can arouse its whole membership from sloth, indifference and self-indulgence. Such Christians are now needed in pushing home missions to the front. As nothing spurs, goads, provokes to good works like seeing good works, to liberality like seeing liberality, to zeal like seeing zeal, to activity like seeing activity, so nothing will do better service to the cause of general home missions than "a little provoking" to zeal, activity and liberality towards it, by an example of the same, on the part of every church in our great land and every member of that church. For every attempt that is made to equal or outdo the achievements of others, it is sufficient to say that a holy jealousy is justifiable.

Eshcol: A Cluster of Grapes.

When the spies returned from viewing the promised land they brought back a cluster of grapes to show the rich fruitfulness of the land.

While our home missionaries are still at work we have their reports, and many a cluster of grapes do their reports contain, showing the richest, ripest land under the sun for New Testament Christianity to be our beloved land—America.

The heroism of our home missionaries is a cluster of grapes, beautiful to view, to show the spirit of these splendid men.

A few years ago when our home board was in debt, one of our home missionaries, to whom the board was deeply indebted, B. F. Clay, put a mortgage upon his household goods to stand by the work in Salt Lake City and prevent its suffering loss.

Another missionary in a western state stood by the work although himself and family were compelled to wear their summer clothes in the month of December.

Another missionary writes: "You can reduce the amount sent us here and use it elsewhere; my wife is teaching kindergarten and I will do outside work for our support."

Another home missionary receiving only about $100 a year missionary money, wrote when we sent him $60: "I will use this money to buy a tent in which to hold a protracted meeting, believing this is the best way to build up the church here, where we are so weak."

Another missionary writes: "Our landlord had insisted on the payment of the rent and I was about to go out and borrow the money, although I did not know where to go. In the midst of our anxiety the postman brought the letter from the home board. My wife and I opened it together and found your check. Tears filled her eyes and the faithful little woman looked up and said, 'The Lord will provide.'"

What a beautiful cluster of grapes!

The rich grapes of Eshcol can be seen in the wonderful results of home missions. Every five dollars put into the evangelistic work of home missions will win a soul to Christ. Last year our home missionaries had 6,766 additions, more than one-fifth the growth of the entire church.

Our home missionaries organized 53 churches last year, a new church a week; they win four and five times as many converts as the home missionaries of any other religious body. The land is fruitful beyond compare for the plea of the New Testament Church.

A wonderful Valley of Eshcol not yet gathered is seen in the foreign populations all about us. There are 16,000,000 of foreign born people in the United States; 6,000,000 of these cannot hear the word of God with profit in the English tongue. Our home board has employed R. H. Timme as our German evangelist. He stood patiently waiting two years, working without support. He brings back his grapes. Two churches organized in two years; now three Sunday-schools, and two German ministers, one a Methodist, the other a Congregationalist, taught the way of the Lord more perfectly and now waiting to be sent to teach others. A rich bunch of grapes and a whole valley of them waiting for our gathering.

These are only a few clusters of the rich grapes of our land. Truly it is a goodly land and we are able to take it for our Lord and the New Testament gospel.

The Ripest Field in the World.

By W. J. Wright.

The United States of America constitutes the ripest mission field in the world. The children drink in the blessings of Christianity with their mother's milk; they are in large part taught the fundamental truths of Christianity in the Sunday-schools; they become familiar with the Bible and consider it the Word of God almost from their earliest recollections; they are accustomed to churches, laws and institutions of a distinctively Christian character; they have either respect or reverence for Christianity, and possibly a majority of them expect to become followers of the Lord Jesus Christ at some time in life, however late in life it may be. Moreover, such a large part of our population speak or understand the one language that we generally reckon English as the only language necessary for the successful preaching of the gospel among them; they are near at hand, not at a great distance across oceans, and a box on a street-corner, a stone on a vacant lot,or a tent upon a commons is about all the necessary equipment for the winning of souls in our American towns and cities. The returns from our work in home missions are wonderful. Even when we have sown with niggardly sparing, we have reaped bountifully. The natural increase has been beyond all reasonable expectation. The Disciples in every portion of our country consider theirs the most important and ripest of all the fields. They point to such opportunities and such results as to astonish us. Where else in the world are such results possible with such efforts? The success of the American Christian Missionary Society in converting men and in establishing churches gives the ground of utmost confidence in their wise administration of mission money. They could wisely expend a half million dollars annually in the work which they are asked to do. The one hundred thousand asked for is less than their actual needs. Let every church pay its apportionment in full, and every individual make an offering this year to evangelize the ripest field in the world.

Where We All Agree.

By J. W. McGarvey.

Fortunately there is no difference of opinion among us as to the wisdom of sending the gospel into those portions of our own country where congregations devoted to the restoration of primitive Christianity are few and feeble. Nearly all of us have friends, and many of us have kindred, in the great West, or in the South, from whom we learn of the religious destitution of their places of residence, and of the marvelous growth of population which is in progress. We know very well that a great empire is growing up with astonishing rapidity in vast regions of our country which but lately were almost uninhabited. We look forward to the day not far distant when these portions of our great country, now immensely more extensive than the older states, will also hold the preponderance of the population and wealth of our whole country, and will exercise a controlling influence over a great part of the world. We know that if we take time by the forelock and plant churches in all these regions they will leaven with the truth the vast masses of human beings soon to be collected there, and that thus we shall be laying a solid foundation for the subsequent evangelization of the whole world. All these considerations unite in calling upon us to be prompt and liberal in answering the call made upon us in behalf of those regions. There is a great battle to be fought, and an empire—compared with which that of ancient Rome was small and weak—is to be the prize. It can be won by the friends of the pure gospel if they shall appear on the ground in time, for we have never yet failed of victory when we have contended with the foe on equal terms; but if we are too late in our movements we shall find the forces of error fortified and in possession of the land. Let us, then, be up and doing with a strong will and a liberal hand.

"Willing Witnesses."

By William Bayard Craig.

The Disciples at Antioch in the joyous strength of vigorous growth combined to send forth Barnabus and Saul. That was the first Gentile Christian Missionary Society. They did well to send forth two men, it sometimes requiring a whole state to do that now. If the world heard the new gospel missionaries must go forth. The American civil war called forth and developed U. S. Grant. The missionary cause called forth Saul and made him a world leader forever. Who can measure the results of the decision of the Antioch Church to send forth two evangelists?

The American Christian Missionary Society has sent forth scores of missionaries and abundant success has attended their labors. We must combine to do this if the world is to be evangelized. Our missionary society must grow with the growth of our people and our country. We have every reason to thank God and take courage.

As Business is Conducted To-day.

By Carlos C. Rowlison.

I thoroughly believe in foreign missions. I never permit anything to side-track our efforts to evangelize heathen peoples on their native soil. We are doing only a fraction of what the spirit of the Master should inspire us to do for the unevangelized portions of the earth. Yet there can be no doubt that we are most culpably neglecting our own home land. If the world is ever Christianized, America must be a chief factor in its accomplishment; and this she can never be until she is herself Christianized.

The city of Chicago is in intimate commercial touch, not only with every city on the American continent, but with every important commercial center of the globe. Her citizens, with their moral and religious influence, are touching every quarter of the earth. This touch, if not positively immoral and irreligious, is universally unmoral and unreligious—is almost wholly and grossly commercial. These men are not filled with the spirit of God, are not his ministers for righteousness and truth, have not become co-workers together with God for the moral redemption of the race. Until the most intense life of our own nation becomes Christianized, our influence over other nations must ever remain meagre and unsatisfactory.

With all her mighty influence on the thought and activity of the country and of the world, Chicago has not a single congregation of Disciples which is recognized as having even local importance. Only $43,000 was given the American Christian Missionary Society for evangelistic purposes in all the American fields. Every cent of that amount ought to be put into the city of Chicago alone. The most efficient organizer among us, with a score of only less efficient helpers, ought to be put into that city and liberally supported until we have a hundred thriving and established congregations. Could this work be thus strongly and wisely supported and directed for ten years, more money would come from the millions of Chicago alone for world-wide evangelization than now comes from all the wealth of the entire brotherhood.

Unless in her evangelization enterprises the Church is bold enough to adopt methods having something of the largeness and comprehensiveness of military plans and commercial operations, she will receive little consideration from men with modern ways of doing things.

Has the time not come for such a movement upon Chicago as is indicated above? Are there not among us twenty men who will each give one thousand dollars a year for ten years in support of such an enterprise, provided the churches will give another twenty thousand more than they are now giving?

How to Take the Collection.

By Frank M. Dowling.

1. Take it.
2. Take it.
3. Take it.

I mean just what I say; the main thing is to take it. I have seen churches "before taking" and "after taking." The transformation is marvelous. The church that has "that tired feeling," and has no disposition to do anything and is in a rundown condition generally, ought to take the May collection. The churches that are in a good, healthy condition should remember that in the spring the system needs toning up. I feel that I owe it to suffering humanity to recommend the May collection. Beware of counterfeits. None genuine without the label, "Home Missions to the Front."

As to the simple matter of "How to take it," full directions on each package, sent on application to Benj. L. Smith, General Secretary, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, O.

Our American Missions and Christian Union

By PROF. CHARLES LOUIS LOOS

Our distinctive plea, that embodies and expresses, and evermore looks to the very "reason of our existense," is, in its completeness, a reformation of the church by a restoration of the primitive order of things in all that is essential in it. This magnificent motive of our reformatory effort, which to this hour has been its justification, its power and glory, must not for a moment be lost out of sight or suffer the least diminution. The necessity that called it forth is to-day as real and as urgent as three generations ago. The Christian world is still filled with sect divisions and ambitions. The great errors in doctrine and institutions, against which we have battled so valiantly for almost a century, yet hold wide and strong dominion, in spite of much evident progress, and many notable victories won for the apostolic faith and life.

The cause of this is not difficult to determine. The apostasy from New Testament Christianity had grown and endured for ages, and so had become inveterate, fixed, accepted and strong in the minds, the hearts and habits of men. We may, therefore, rest well assured that no one age will undo the centuries' and even millenniums' old wrongs. And while nothing in human efforts is more obligatory, more just and hopeful, than the battle for truth and right against error and wrong, and while we must not for a moment lose faith or in the least remit our efforts, yet we must know that the battle will be long and the victory strenuously contested.

No plea is more invulnerable than that for the repristination of the church; none appeals with greater power to the minds and hearts of Christians, none can fill their souls with nobler inspirations. This was the holy enthusiasm of our fathers, this their strength. By it we have won glorious victories. This alone justifies our distinct existence as a people.

There is a most efficient way of advocating this our great cause, and that is through our American missionary enterprise.

The argument for our reformatory plea is admirable and secure in its mighty strength. But the world needs to be convinced of the practical truth and reality of this magnificent argument. There are great multitudes of men, and these often of the most intelligent and thoughtful, who question the reasonableness of the claim to restore apostolic Christianity. I once heard this distrust expressed by a president of the United States. It will be a mighty agency in bringing the American people to a correct understanding and a true appreciation of our motive and effort in behalf of religious reform, if we plant all over our land churches strong in their ministry, and in their organization efficient in demonstrating to their communities both the truth of our apostolic plea and its reasonableness and actual successfulness.

A most important part of our argument for reform is that which demands the abandonment of sectarian division and the restoration of the union of God's people. I am certain that nothing has come with greater force and more appreciative acceptance to the minds and hearts of men than this lofty aim. For the advocacy of this we still stand in the unbroken strength of our convictions, our purpose and our confidence. It is a most just endeavor, a campaign against a great apostasy. But there are vast regions where our magnanimous effort in this direction is either absolutely unknown or greatly misunderstood.

As Jesus has in the most solemn manner declared in his intercessory prayer, a united church alone can bring the world to the faith in Christ. In spite of all discouragements—and these are numberless and great almost beyond computation—we must believe in the possibility, the certainty, indeed, of the realization of the prayer of Jesus for the unity of believers. Never distrust God! Ever believe and mountains will be removed.

Let us lay hold, therefore, of this puissant home missionary enterprise to strive to bring about the unity of Christians on the basis of New Testament Christianity, the only ground on which this most desirable end can be reached, as must be universally conceded.

Plant strategic strongholds in every available spot in all our land. Station in these places men well qualified for the high task of preaching the original gospel with clearness and power to the people; men who will come to them, as Christ has directed, in the spirit of wisdom and harmlessness; apostles of the divine love, who will make known to men that our glorious message is not one of hostility, but of good will to all; that it recognizes joyfully the much that is truly Christian everywhere. For is it not a great happiness to us to know that this great Christian world is full of faith in the Lord Jesus and piety towards God, and of good works that glorify his name and bless the world?

To preach, as the New Testament religion, the Lord Jesus as the only object of faith; no creed but the Bible; no names but such as the first Christians bore; as doctrine only what Jesus and his apostles taught; no institutions but those God has certainly ordained; no ecclesiastical organization that did not exist in the primitive church; no titles and no pretensions of the ministry that savor of clerical distinction and are unknown to the admirable simplicity of primitive Christian life:—can there be any doubt that such a presentation will win the hearts of men? And, finally, will not such strongholds—churches—free in their life from all narrow prejudices and bigotry towards their fellow-believers, but "strong in the Lord," rich in Christian faith and works, zealously active in the great work of preaching the gospel of salvation to all the world,—be "like cities set on a hill," sending forth the light of heaven far and wide, and so teach men in the most effective manner the truth and reality of apostolic Christianity, and the only true and possible foundation of Christian union?

Our Home Missionary Society can be a powerful agent in giving prosperity to the holy cause of unity among God's people. Arm it with the power of strong and wide action; let its ministry, in the conduct of its affairs and in all the work of its missions, be chosen men of God, full of wisdom and understanding, of energy and the Holy Spirit, and the blessing of the Almighty will crown it with great success.

Our Message to the Churches.

By H. L. Willett.

The special task of the Disciples of Christ, as a religious force, is to emphasize the idea and feasibility of Christian unity upon the basis presented by Apostolic Christianity. This declaration needs to be made especially to American Christianity. While it is true that we owe to all the nations of the earth the gospel in the same proportion as our religious neighbors, and while it is true that every good work must receive attention at our hands, still the particular service which we are called to render is to impress upon American Christianity the necessity for a union of the people of God. This can only be accomplished by securing a platform in America upon which to stand. That platform can be secured only by strong and enthusiastic efforts in the direction of home missionary work. We cannot speak where we have no messengers. Our messengers cannot be sent except they be called. They cannot be called unless the board has resources with which the work can be carried forward.

We have recognized in late years the fact that this is the nick of time for the molding of American Christian thought. The forces of opposition were never stronger than to-day, and yet the hopefulness of the outcome was never so great; but it is a business that requires haste. To this must be added the consideration that our own work is also passing through a crisis. Whether or not we shall be enthusiastic advocates of Christian union in a true and practicable fashion, or shall settle into the comfortable attitude of a denomination, giving up the great watchwords of the past, is to be decided within the next few years. Only as we throw ourselves with unrestrained enthusiasm into the task of occupying the field with forces which shall become our heralds, and emphasize the New Testament faith and the practicability of united work among all Christians, can we accomplish our task.

Our growth has been phenomenal during the past few years. No other evangelical people has come so rapidly to the front as we. This is both our glory and our peril. From those who have received much, much will be required. Such growth brings an almost measureless responsibility. Our gifts are growing larger both for home and foreign missions, but the amount we spend for home missions is yet inconsiderable as contrasted with the needs of the situation and the obligations under which we rest. We are not yet even giving for it in proportion to our gifts to foreign missions, and these are far too small. Apostolic Christianity means apostolic generosity and missionary enthusiasm as well as orthodoxy of doctrine. We can justify our work only by such activity and zeal as exemplify the truths which we profess.

Every part of our country is calling for assistance. Our brethren on the Pacific coast are in need of our help. Equally needy is the situation on the Atlantic. Our New England friends feel that they are neglected because we do not place adequate resources at their disposal for the evangelization of that earliest and most influential part of our continent. New York, the empire state, ought to have a large increase in its evangelistic forces. The south and west are needy and are crying. Indian Territory ought to be occupied at once. The northwest is a most inviting and promising field. The city of Chicago has enormous stretches of almost absolutely virgin soil, so far as the gospel ministry is concerned, and this is true of other great cities. It is the nick of time for the great enterprise committed to our hands.

Did I Misrepresent the Disciples?

By W. T. Moore.

In the excellent report of the Congress of Disciples which appeared in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, it is stated that "the general sentiment was that Dr. Moore had not correctly represented the position of the Disciples in the past, in saying that they had 'posed as the whole thing.'"

Now it is well to have clearly stated just what I did say. I certainly did not say that the Disciples had posed as the whole thing while pleading for Christian Union. But I did say in effect that they made this impression upon other religious bodies, and that there was no need to do this, as it certainly hindered rather than helped Christian Union.

I frankly own that I was much surprised to learn the sensitiveness of some of the brethren with respect to that matter; and I wish to say, furthermore, that I was delighted to be made acquainted with their liberality. However, I am compelled to believe that I did not misrepresent the facts of the case. If a little learning is a dangerous thing, certainly a little history is even more dangerous. I would heartily commend to those valiant brethren who reviewed my address to study the history of the movement of the Disciples before they speak again with so much assurance as to my misrepresentation. Meantime I will try to help them in this study.

There have been at least three phases of our movement with respect to Christian Union. These phases represent three distinct periods. When the movement began it was mainly in the interest of Christian Union. There was no thought of assuming a distinct and separate organization, such as was finally brought about. Mr. Campbell fought against any narrow position with all the powers of his great soul. It was during this period that he wrote his celebrated Lunennburgh Letter, in which he distinctly affirmed his preference for Pedobaptists, rather than Baptists, if the former had the better character of the two.

A second period began to develop in the year of 1838, when Mr. Campbell's brother-in-law published a series of articles in the Harbinger entitled, "Are there Christians among the Sects?" These articles ran through the Harbinger of the next year, and produced something of a sensation among many of the "keepers of the faith." Among those who replied sharply to "Christianos" were the veterans Thomas M. Henley and M. Winans. No one can read the letters of these two brethren without reaching the conclusion that they, at least, regarded the movement of the Disciples as practically "the whole thing." It may be well also to state what I happen to know, as a somewhat private matter, that the protest against "Christianos" was so widespread and strong that Mr. Campbell was compelled to close the discussion with a brief statement of his own, wherein he straddled the fence so completely that no one can tell which side he was on.

This period lasted until the Civil War; and it may be denominated the dogmatic period of the movement. Since the war, liberalizing tendencies have been growing; and it was to help these tendencies that I said what I did in my Lexington address.

Of course if I had read the whole of my address there would have been no occasion for misunderstanding me. When the entire address is published I feel sure my positions will be heartily approved by nineteen-twentieths of intelligent Disciples. Already I have received numerous emphatic declarations that what I did say was heartily approved by very many who said nothing during the Congress.

I am not in the least concerned about my own orthodoxy. I have never tried to defend that at any time during my public ministry. I am quite content to let my public writings, and words, and conduct, speak for me in this respect. But I do not care to lie under the imputation that I have misrepresented a great religious body. If the brethren who replied to me at Lexington think I stated the case differently from what they have known of the movement, all I have to say is that I heartily congratulate them upon their having occupied a more liberal environment than that which has fallen to my lot. Especially in my earlier ministry I was taught to believe that the Disciples represented the Church of Christ and that all the denominations were simply sects. If we have grown out of that narrowness I am heartily glad to know it.

Some Axiomatic Sayings of Our Pioneers.

By George Darsie.

Many an aphorism or proverb was on the lips of our pioneers, and found great currency among our people in the early days of our movement. Not all of them are entitled to rank as axioms perhaps, and yet with proper limitations and applications they fall very little short of that. To name some of these and to comment briefly on them is the object of this article.

"Axiomatic sayings" are not so basic or fundamental as "presuppositions," and further differ from them in that they are constantly on the tongue while the latter are not. The former, in a word, are affirmed, the latter implied.

1. A good many of the axiomatic sayings of our pioneers had to do with THE BIBLE. The vindication of God's word as a sufficient rule of life was one of the primary objects they had in view. They had to make a fierce battle against the bondage of human creeds. They felt that this galling yoke must be removed from the neck of God's people. To do so the Bible must be exalted and honored, restored to its rightful place, and made the supreme and only guide in Christian faith and duty. Hence the ready acceptance, the wide prevalence and the permanent place among us, even till now, of those memorable words, "Where the Bible speaks we speak, where the Bible is silent we are silent." As an assertion of the all-sufficiency and the alone-sufficiency of God's book, a happier statement was never made. It far surpasses in precision and definiteness the famous utterance of Chillingworth: "The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible is the religion of Protestants." If one of the Wise Men of Greece was handed down to immortality because of a single saying, "Know thyself," so should this axiom of Thomas Campbell do for him. "It was from the moment these significant words were uttered and accepted that the more intelligent ever afterward dated the formal and actual commencement of the Reformation."

Another form of expression practically equivalent in meaning has come down to us from the same source and almost rivals the preceding in popular prevalence back in the day of our pioneers. Its origin is Mr. Campbell's now historic "Declaration and Address," and as usually quoted ran thus: "Nothing is to be enjoined as a matter of Christian faith or duty for which there cannot be expressly produced a 'thus saith the Lord' either in express terms or by approved precedent." The writer in his early boyhood days used to hear these words on scores of tongues long before he ever knew who their author was, or where to find them in print. In the battle against human creeds, their usefulness was set forth in this oft-repeated style: "If a creed contains more than the Bible it contains too much; if it contains less than the Bible it contains too little; if it contains just the same as the Bible it is superfluous; if it differs from the Bible it is erroneous." And this way of putting the case has won many a man to stand with us on the "Bible alone."

"Bible things in Bible words" is still another proverbial expression that our fathers kept in constant use. With great power they employed it in behalf of a pure speech among our people. It forbade the calling of the Lord's day by the name of "Sabbath," the speaking of the Godhead as the "Trinity," of the Lord's Supper as the "Sacrament," of Conversion as "Getting Religion," or of a religious people who sought in all things to conform to the New Testament teachings as anything else than simply "Disciples of Christ" or "Christians." They held that party names and party phraseology had much to do in perpetuating party-ism, with all its evils, and that a long step towards the unity of God's people is taken when they cease from the use of the "language of Ashdod," as unbiblical speech was called, and speak only of "Bible things in Bible terms."

2. Our fathers encountered a fearful state of mysticism on the subject of FAITH. The especial issue between them and the theology of their day was "How does faith come?" The popular view made faith the direct gift of God, by a perversion of Ephesians 2:8, and to get it for oneself was like trying to get a bowl full of moonbeams. It was supposed to be borne from heaven into the hearts of men like "a golden dewdrop on the siver tip of an angel's wing." The recipient was utterly passive in obtaining it, and hence was instructed to use no effort whatever. To combat a view so subversive of human responsibility and so at war with Scripture and reason, our fathers emphasized the absolute necessity of testimony in order to the production of Faith and at last compressed their view into the concise axiom of "No testimony, no faith," which became one of their most widely used and effective weapons against the error they sought to overthrow. Based on such plain utterances of God's word as "Faith cometh by hearing and hearing by the word of God," "These things are written that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ," and "Many of the Corinthians hearing, believed and were baptized," it deserves to rank as one of the best of all the axiomatic sayings of our pioneers, as well as one of the most potent.

3. The BAPTISMAL BATTLE of our fathers also yielded an axiom that had extensive use. The practice of infant baptism was in their day justified by the plea, with which of course many others were connected, that the faith required to make the ordinance valid was supplied by the infants' parents. Against this view it was pointed out with strong persistence that in the Scriptures baptism is commanded directly to the individual, and that if the individual cannot obey the command for himself, it is not and cannot be intended for him. "Repent and be baptized," "Arise and be baptized," "He that believeth and is baptized," "What doth hinder me to be baptized?" and so on through the entire sacred record wherever the ordinance is spoken of from the standpoint of the subject or recipient of baptism, the obedience is required of the subject and of no one else. For any one else to come in and have the obedience rendered, as in the case of a parent with a child, is both a perversion of the ordinance and a total nullification of the central idea of the command. It is given to us for our own obedience and not for another's. Hence it was that our fathers originated the aphorism, "No proxies in religion." Whether the cry would not require some limitations I need not discuss here. But in its application to the controversy over the baptism of infants it served as a useful weapon and made for the triumph of the correct view of this much-abused ordinance of the gospel.

4. There is still another of which I would speak. The day of our pioneers was a day of battle, as we all know. Now the sorrow of a religious battle is that it engenders hatred and ill will and uncharitableness. But though our fathers attacked the errors of their time with might and main, though they denounced the departures from the faith and practice of the "ancient order of things" with fiery tongue and with trenchant pen, though they rebuked the sad perversions of the primitive gospel in a way that shook the whole religious world, they still with kindly charity declared again and again that "God has a people among all the churches." Their iconoclastic spirit did not blind them to the fact that among all communions were found men and women of sincere faith and piety, who feared God and wrought righteousness and of whom he would say, "They shall be mine in that day when I make up my jewels." It is a sweet memory to recall, in this later day of growing kindliness among all religious bodies, that though our fathers dealt hard blows they nevertheless had tender hearts, and in spite of the temptations to harsh and censorious judgments, were not strangers to the love that suffers long and is kind, and recognized as true children of God those of every name and faith in the Christian world who called upon God out of a pure heart, and who served the Lord Jesus in sincerity and truth.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

The money to pay the mortgage indebtedness of the First Christian Church in Colorado Springs was collected more than a year ago, but the party holding the note of the church, and the mortgage, would not accept the money and release the church, because the note would not become due until in the spring of 1901. At last the money was accepted and the note and mortgage were surrendered. Monday, April first, was a happy day in the history of this congregation. The mortgage was burned in the presence of a large and enthusiastic company. This is the first time in the history of the church since the erection of the present house of worship, probably a dozen years ago, that it has been entirely free from debt. On the evening above mentioned the congregation was entirely free from debt and there was a snug sum in the treasury.

F. N. Calvin is doing an excellent work in Colorado Springs. Evidences of prosperity are visible on every hand. The church is better organized than ever before. A larger number of members are at work than for many years. The number of regular contributors toward current expenses is from one hundred and fifty to one hundred and sixty. The largest number contributing during my sojourn in Colorado Springs was one hundred and ten. This was the report for a single month. The church is a liberal contributor, as contributions go, to the cause of missions. This year its pledge to state missions is above $370. Nor is it indifferent to the work of making disciples of all the nations. It contributes liberally to the cause of foreign missions. Since the beginning of Bro. Calvin's pastorate, a year ago, certain improvements have been made on the building, and others are in contemplation. F. N. Calvin is a superior teacher and pastor. It is a pleasure to bear this testimony to the thoroughness, efficiency and success of his work in Colorado Springs.

"Holy week" in Denver was observed, in part, by a remarkable series of sermons delivered by Bishops Warren and Hendrix. H. W. Warren is a bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and Eugene R. Hendrix is a bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. The preachers dealt with the fundamentals of the Christian faith. The following are some of the subjects: "The Humanness of the Christ"; "The Abundant Life"; "The Christ's View of Sin"; "The Christ's Method With Mild Sceptics"; "The Kingdom the Christ Came to Establish"; "Why Did the Christ so Long Delay His Coming"; "The Beginning and Progress of the Christ Life in Man"; "The Overflow of Christianity"; "Jesus the Same in all Ages and Worlds"; "The Savior, the Sinner, and the Saint"; and "The Satisfied Christ."

Three services were held each day. The noon meeting was held in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association; the afternoon and evening services were held in the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church. The purpose of the preachers was the strengthening of faith in the fundamental verities of our religion. The discourses were exceedingly helpful. Bishop Hendrix is a good preacher. Bishop Warren is one the greatest preachers that I have ever heard.

John C. Hay delivered a lecture in the South Broadway Christian Church, with stereopticon views, on Hawaii, Friday evening, April 5th. The address was instructive. The pictures were good. The lecture was an effective missionary address. He showed the change wrought among the people of the islands by the missionaries. If you can secure the services of John C. Hay to give this lecture do not fail to do so. It will do the people good to hear it. His address is Los Angeles, Cal., in care of the Coulter Dry Goods Company.

The following from The Interior, Chicago, is so good that I pass it on to you. I believe you will enjoy it:

"Preach the Word."

"Sir, we would see Jesus," is a request every congregation has a right to make of the pastor. And the true pastor, being a messenger of Jehovah of Hosts, and not a messenger of Byron, Milton, or Shakespeare, is bound by the most solemn of all his obligations to preach "Jesus Christ and him crucified." The gospel preacher is a minister of the New Testament which became of force on the death of the testator, our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. In this testament is recorded the following statement of our Savior: "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." This can not be truthfully said of science, or popular literature, or of the writings of the wisest men not inspired of God. In his command to his disciples to teach all nations, Christ's language is specific: "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." No mention is made of human doctrines, and no authority given for teaching them. "The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream; and he that hath my word let him speak my word faithfully. What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord. Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord; and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?" The Word of God is "the sword of the Spirit." One armed with this sword for destroying evil is required to use it. A sword needs no stronger proof of what it is than the effects of its use. No learned argument is necessary to prove that a hammer is a hammer. Use it, and it proves itself. Fire proves its own character when applied. God's Word is "like as fire." It cleanses away evil. "Preach the Word." A pastor who substitutes anything else for the faithful preaching of God's Word (and this is all he is authorized by Christ to preach) is trifling with the eternal destinies of men, and bringing guilt upon himself. The writer has in recent months heard much chaff in sermons and noticed a conspicuous absence of the "one thing needful."

Now that my scissors are in good working order and my pen is a little lazy I send the following also. This clipping is from The Advance. Knowing you as I do I am sure you will enjoy it:

"The origin and rapid growth within this century of the people known as 'Christians' or 'Disciples' is significant. It is not too much to say that the chief reason for the remarkable popularity of the 'Disciples' was their cry against sectarianism. 'Let us have done with divisive, human names applied to the church of Christ,' they said, 'such as Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational; let us go back to Christ, and be known simply as Christians or Disciples; let us revive primitive Christianity, and the Church will be unified and denominations will cease.' We appreciate the value of their testimony, and rest assured that the vital principle for which they contended is destined to have an increasing influence on the Christianity of the twentieth century."

English Topics.

By William Durban.

The English people are at this juncture threatened with financial difficulties. For our resources are not boundless as those of America are, practically. This is a small country, though the wealth of the empire is of course enormous. But Britain is not the empire, and the imperial burdens are too costly to be comfortably endured.

The Burden of the Weary Titan.

All the faculties of the people are being overstrained. We are being called on by the government to prepare for tremendous additions to the taxation, chiefly with the view of increasing our already vast armaments. We are to raise the army of regular forces on the peace footing to a quarter of a million men at least, and the whole number of fighting men of all descriptions in the empire, including the great volunteer contingent, the militia, and the many new local regiments in the great colonies, will amount to considerably over a million. Thus at last England is about to take a formidable place among the great military Powers. Further, a great naval program has just been submitted to Parliament and is sure to be passed. Indeed, although it projects the building of thirty-three new war-ships, there are at once outcries from the jingo press that it is not at all adequate. For the idea is fixed in some minds that Britian, in order to be able to sing and shout, "Britannia rules the waves," must always be building so many battle-ships as to outnumber the fleets of any half-dozen other Powers. Thus we are about to be subjected to the crushing increment of taxes which will be necessary for the outlay on these bloated armaments. All this is, of course, one of the immediate results of the war. Many people glory in war, but nobody relishes the sequel. We shall be long years paying for the cost of this dreadful conflict in South Africa. All our missionaries have declared, without any exception that I have been able to discover, that the hideous strife was rendered inevitable by the determination of the Boers to drive the British out of South Africa. I have never sat in judgment on the Boers. Like the great majority of Englishmen I always supposed that they would be satisfied to live in the condition of practical independence with a mere shadowy British suzerainty, the reason of which was that it was essential that Britain should be supreme in relation to foreign affairs only. But it is useless now to discuss the complex question of the causes of the war. This has been ably and exhaustively done during his recent stay in the United States, by Bishop Hartzell, the famous American Methodist bishop of South Africa. He has before great audiences at Chicago and elsewhere justified Britain and emphatically condemned the Boers, amongst whom he has long lived. It seems to me that such a man ought to know. In my long talk with him in London he entered into the whole question in the most earnest and convincing manner.

The New Bishop of London.

A fortnight ago the Bishop of Stepney sent for me to visit him and to take luncheon with him at his residence in Amen Court, that quaint and curious old ecclesiastical precinct close to St. Paul's Cathedral. The bishop had been struck with a certain religious article I had written and particularly wished for some talk with me. Dr. Arthur Foley Winnington Ingram, for the last five years Bishop of Stepney, talked with me for two hours on matters pertaining to religious work in London, ecclesiastical life, etc., etc. I found that he knew little of America or of any country besides England. But few men know this country so well, and few are so well acquainted with the poor in London. He has, since my recent visit to him, been appointed Bishop of London. He is the right man, for he certainly is the most popular man in all London. I do not wonder at that. His life is an extraordinary one. He is a bachelor, 43 years of age, and has given his whole existence, since entering the ministry, to the welfare of the common people. He has formed many clubs for poor boys and girls in the teeming and wretched purlieus of the East End around Whitechapel, Mile End, Bethnal Green and Shoreditch. Every evening of his life, excepting when he has been on preaching expeditions out of the city, he goes off to the East End to some meeting amongst the vast horde of poor Londoners who almost idolize him. On Monday mornings at seven o'clock the bishop goes on his bicycle to meet a cycle club of working lads before breakfast. Every Saturday afternoon he takes a large party of factory girls round St. Paul's and then entertains them at tea in the great vestry of the Cathedral. Often when he is in the slums he will knock at a door which will be opened by some ragged little girl. The mother from within shouting, "Who's there?" the child replies, "Mother, it's religion trying to get in!" But though the door might in some cases be shut against him, he puts his foot inside and keeps it open while he begs for admission. Such things the "People's Bishop," as he is popularly called, told me in his talk. He is an ardent total abstainer, a noted temperance lecturer, but above all, a born preacher. On Sunday afternoons, during his monthly residence in the precints in his capacity as canon of St. Paul's, he preaches to crowds of four or five thousand people. Now, it is passing strange that such a man as this, consecrated, apostolic, devout, should be a thorough Ritualist. What would happen if some such representative of contemporary religion were convinced of the failure of modern theology and ecclesiasticism to represent genuine Christianity? There would be a wonderful revolution in the spiritual world. We may hope that some day such a thing may happen as the conversion of a great popular preacher in any one of the dominant sects to the simple faith of Christ. Such an event would startle the nation and the world, but would, above all, awaken the careless formalists who form the stolid, immovable body of the religious public.

Why English Disciples are Slow.

I have been much impressed by reading a striking letter in the Christian Standard from the pen of B. B. Tyler, whose literary contributions in any of our papers always bring me to an interested pause. He has explained in a way that appealed to my innermost sympathies the reasons why our American churches in the New England states do not make the same rapid progress as the churches of Christ in the center and the west. Bro. T. tells his readers that there is a great outcry for more help from the home missionary board; that there has been an exodus of ministers from thirteen New England churches last year; that these churches were too poor to pay the salaries which these preachers thought they ought to expect; that the people are as generous according to their limited means as any to be found in any other parts of America; but that in those rich and populous states only poor folks for the most part can be induced to give our preachers a hearing. The wealthier religious people flock to the sectarian sanctuaries. Now, I was pleased and sorry as I read this letter. If we can get Bro. T. over here for a season, he will soon find out that he has hit on a secret which applies to old England also. This is our one and only difficulty. We have no other. Our people also are generous. They also are enthusiastic. They also are true and faithful. But in this country only by slow degrees as the years roll along shall we conquer large areas. The well-to-do, the cultured, the proud, the imitators of the aristocrats, the parvenus, the folk who are nobody but want to be thought somebody, the thoughtless human sheep who follow the bellwethers of the fashion in religion as in other things, all flock to the old established sects. Therefore we need time for progress. We sympathize with our brothers and sisters in New England. They are our companions in the kingdom and patience of Christ. Some of us who are preachers knew the pleasure of enjoying success wherever we ministered years ago when we were denominationalists. Our sectarian brethren flattered us, honored us, loved us, took care of us, and things were pleasant enough to give daily delight to any sybarite. Those were days of a kind of spiritual epicureanism. Oh yes, it was very nice indeed to be sometimes by the week together in dear C. H. Spurgeon's house; to chat often with such men as Drs. Clifford, Landels, Brock, and to associate with the giants at play after hearing them occasionally on the platform or in the pulpit. Who would not enjoy it all? Who would not find such a life very enjoyable? Well, my brethren of the Disciple pulpits in the states of Kansas, Missouri, Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky and Nebraska, you can also revel in all these amenities, and I am thankful for it. Some of us had our share of such fellowship in days gone by; but now we are sentinels on outpost duty, or we form the vanguard in the forefront of the battle, and we are shot at and often sorely wounded, while you are in the intervals of your hard work enjoying the sweet interludes of popular favor and fraternal association on a great scale. Enjoy it all, dear and honored brother preachers! You well deserve it, and if I can ever cross again for a few weeks I will take one more plunge into the pleasant stream of your prosperity. But will you sometimes think of us who are trying to be faithful under the exacting and arduous conditions which belong to the position of heralds, crying in the wilderness and seeking to prepare as pioneers the way of the Lord? I pity the soul of any man or womon who, happening to live in a region where the work has sprung into power and affluence, can feel unsympathetic or impatient with missionaries either in English and continental fields or in the realms of dark paganism. Our comfort is that we know many of our flourishing American brethren endeavor to understand the position and are not lacking in sympathetic appreciation.

43 Park Road, South Tottenham, London, March 15, 1901.

Zerelda Wallace.

By Mrs. Frances D. Elliott.

A remarkable woman has just died near Indianapolis, Ind., one who by her strong personality and bold strokes for the right has impressed her generation as few women have done.

In Kentucky, in the year 1817, a girl was born into the family of Dr. Sanders, who was named Zerelda. Other daughters came, but no son; so the disappointed father turned to his eldest-born for companionship. Together they roamed the fields of science and plucked the flowers of knowledge. With her he discussed political questions, little dreaming of the use to which she would put her knowledge, and she stored her mind with Bible history and other facts that have furnished her many an apt illustration.

Her father, as he watched the unfolding of her unusual mind, often wondered what her future would be; for in those days superior brains must needs be housed in masculine heads, or woe be to the possessors thereof! Above the doors leading to the learned professions, the business world and most of the literary and artistic avenues of work, was inscribed the legend, "No woman need apply," and across the entrance to the lecture platform and editorial sanctum was placed a network of bars, bearing the words, "strong-minded, unwomanly, masculine, blue-stocking."

Her father probably concluded that her best place in life would be by the side of some young and growing man in the infant state of Indiana, where they now resided; one who could be spurred up the ladder of fame by her aspiring genius, and through whom she might impress the world at second hand. But she early took her career into her own hands by wedding one who had already ascended his ladder to the topmost round. The next year after she became Mrs. David Wallace, her husband was elevated to the governor's chair, and she, a girl in her teens, was called to preside at the executive mansion, with what grace and efficiency her friends still delight to relate.

Three boys waited for her on the threshold of her new home—William, Lewis and Edward—and she patiently washed their faces and mended their clothes, little thinking that by her daily life she was molding so rare a spirit as the author of Ben Hur. Gen. Lew Wallace relates that when he and his brothers were called in to greet their young mother, she being only eight years older than the future novelist, they went in a very rebellious state of mind, because they had not been apprised beforehand of the marriage. But her winning smile and kind heart won them to her, and he says, "I soon ceased to think or speak of her as my step-mother, she was a real mother to me." The sincerity of this tribute becomes apparent when it is known that the character of Ben Hur's mother was directly inspired by Mrs. Wallace. In common, homely duties her days passed on; six children came to her, two of whom wrung her heart and broadened her sympathies by being laid in early graves. Another, a gentle, sweet-voiced daughter, went later, leaving to her care four grandchildren. She lovingly took them to her heart, gave them careful training, and now impressed the world through two generations.

But while her hands were burdened, her mind was not neglected. Amid the interstices of housekeeping, she found space for culture. She enjoyed the companionship of a literary husband, and in the ordering of her life she made the less yield to the greater good. She was a member of the Central Christian Church and it was her habit to rise very early that she might have an hour with her Bible. She kept her hair short, so that after a vigorous brushing, she could devote to reading the time usually spent in arranging the coiffure. And while she read and "mused the fire burned." In that new country where grogshops flourished on every corner, and society condoned what it seemed powerless to remove, she saw her friends and neighbors dragged by the demon of drink from the pedestal of manhood down to death and ruin. And as she suffered in silence, her heart swelled within her.

Other women all over this land suffered and pondered until at last indignation and love, like acid and alkali, were stirred together and effervesced in the great Woman's Crusade. That was the opportunity for which Mrs. Wallace had been waiting for fifty-seven years, and at an age when, a little earlier in the century, grandmothers would have been donning their caps and kerchiefs and sinking down into their easy chairs for a well-earned rest, she began her career—at first by saying a few words in the meeting, choking and sitting down overcome. But as she became accustomed to the sound of her own voice the pent-up thoughts of forty years burst forth in a torrent. She forgot that she was on the platform, forgot that she was a target for the shafts of criticism, forgot everything but that the drink demon was abroad in the land and must somehow be crushed. She would say, "You men cannot do it alone. Let the women help; let them talk, let them pray, let them vote! If a mad dog were loose on the streets, you would not care whose blow killed it." Temperance and suffrage, these were her themes. In her mind they were inseparable. And she was terribly in earnest. This earnestnesss made her eloquent. She was a pioneer in the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, having been the first president of that organization in Indiana. Her work, however, transcended the boundaries of her own state, as told in a recent letter from her: "I have spoken many times in all the New England states except New Hampshire, also many times in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, and in Washington, D. C.; in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, North and South Carolina, Georgia and Florida. I have spoken a few times in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Deleware. I think it was in 1874 that I addressed the legislature." Think of that for the work of a grandmother!—braving hardships before which the strongest men shrink, and which they face only for large compensation. She gave her time and strength.

A beautiful friendship existed between Mrs. Wallace and Frances E. Willard. They often roomed together during temperance conventions, and Miss Willard often alluded to the elder woman as Mother Wallace. "I wish you were my daughter," the latter said to her one day. "Oh!" exclaimed Miss Willard, "I am going home to tell my mother and make her proud."

In the evening of her life, as she reviewed her work, Mrs. Wallace realized that she had not done all that she attempted. What reformer has? But she could perceive an elevated public opinion that would have been lower, a quickened public conscience that would have been less sensitive, if she had not lived and worked. Equal suffrage, in most states, is still in the future, but she compelled many thinkers to conclude that it is the next great step in the march of progress. She helped to lift the question from the "low ground of sorrow," where it was pelted with epithets and humiliated by sarcasm, to a plane of respectful consideration.

The agitation has shaken down the bars that for centuries have kept woman from the industrial and literary fields, and the daughters of the very women who deprecated Mrs. Wallace's work are now filling positions and enjoying salaries that her labors and those of her coadjutors have made possible. Her name belongs in the list of those of whom it may be said, "She hath done what she could."

An Important Year.

This should be the greatest year of our American mission work. The first year of the decade, it is also the first year of a new century. Great successes this year will lend enthusiasm to the decade and give a helpful impetus to the work of the century.

Now is the time to push things. We must enter more fields. We must stimulate, strengthen and fortify in the fields already entered.

Success is expensive. It is cheaper than failure though, in the end, and pleasanter.

To make our home missionary work what it ought to be this year, to enlarge it as our Lord has a right to expect, requires that every church and every Disciple should give this matter more attention than formerly; there must be more warm, active, generous co-operation, more self-denial, more devotion to our holy cause, more effort to make history, more patient plodding and more of the "sinews of war."

Preachers, there never were such urgent reasons for the redoubled diligence of our churches in home missions. Every one of you should announce the offering favorably and preach about it every Sunday until May 5th. See that the offering is taken. If weather is unfavorable May 5th, repeat the offering the next Lord's day. There can be no excuse for failure to make at least one offering a year to this great work.

For America's sake, for the world's sake, for our Savior's sake and for the sake of the home congregation no church can afford to miss the offering on May 5.

Get posted on the subject and you will want to preach about it. Then your people, being posted, will want to give. Send to Benjamin L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, O., for all the information needed. He will send it to you, in bundles, all you want, free. Read it; distribute it; preach it. Send the money to him when the offering is made. And remember May 5. Make it a red-letter day this year.

The North American Review opens with two articles by Tolstoy, the first of which is a general summary of the comprehensive denunciation of all modern institutions which is familiar to those who have read his books, and the secondary, a "Message to the American People." This is followed by an article on Tolstoy's "Resurrection." Mark Twain gets deeper into the mire in an attempt to defend his criticism against the missionaries in China. The collecting of one-third of the value of a murdered man's estate to be used in supporting his widow and orphans, seems to the sensitive conscience of Mr. Clemens as heinous a crime as collecting thirteen times its value to be used in propagating the gospel. We shall have more to say later on these melancholy mouthings of Mark. Senator Beveridge, writing on "Cuba and Congress," defends the Platt resolution as not only consistent with Cuban liberty but necessary for the maintenance of such a degree of law and order as is essential to liberty. Rear Admiral Melville writes from the professional point of view on "The Submarine Boat," and expresses doubt of its efficiency. Even in France, he says, where the public is most enthusiastic over it, the naval authorities are not convinced. By strange coincidence the French government contracted for twenty submarine boats after this statement left the writer and before it reached the reader. Mr. Howells' monthly contributions to the North American are comparable to General Harrison's. Both men have been a large part of the history of our day, the one in the political and the other in the literary world, and both in their last years have stood in a measure apart from and above the fray. Mr. Howells writes this month on Barrett Wendell's "Literary History of America," which he criticizes severely on several counts, and most of all for its air of unconscious superiority. It is, says Mr. Howells, not the work of a broad mind, but of a narrow mind trying to be broad. While we do not agree with this as a criticism on Prof. Wendell's work, we can heartily thank Mr. Howells for teaching us that phrase, "a narrow mind trying to be broad." It describes a great many writers, whether it describes Prof. Wendell or not.

The Living Age has just finished publishing "An Englishwoman's Love Letters"—and what wretched stuff they are! The question whether the thing is well done or not, is one which need not even be raised. It was something which did not need to be done at all. Carlyle called Keats' poetry mere "maudlin sentimentality." What would he have said of this? Of course he would have said nothing. If he had deigned to notice it at all, he would have criticised it with a snort. And that is really what it deserves, rather than articulate criticism. It is morbid and maudlin from start to finish. It is the sort of sickly gush which brings honest and sincere sentiment into undeserved disrepute. The author made a double blunder in allowing his name to become known. In the first place he ought to have been ashamed of his work. In the second place, the revelation of the masculine authorship of the "Englishwoman's" letters gave the public the uncomfortable feeling of having had their deeper emotions trifled with, and a corresponding feeling of resentment is engendered toward the trifler. But the reader who allowed these letters to get hold of his sympathies very firmly deserves little sympathy. He ought to have seen from the morbid and pathological sentiment which they exhibited that they were the merest trifling, whether written by man, woman, or feeble-minded child.

The World's Work for this month devotes special attention to the multi-millionaires, presenting illustrated articles on J. Pierpont Morgan, Andrew Carnegie and Charles M. Schwab, president of the billion-dollar steel trust. Young writers are given encouragement in an article on "The Unknown Author and the Publisher," which shows how anxious all publishers are to get hold of good manuscripts even by unknown writers and how a large part of the publisher's best paying business comes from discovering new writers. This axiom is laid down: "If you submit a manuscript it will be read; if it is good enough it will be published whether your name be Rudyard Kipling or Sarah Brown." That is not saying, of course, that it will be published by the first publisher to whom it is offered, for every one knows how David Harum and a great many other popular books were refused by several publishers before finding one willing to take the risk.

A writer in The Literary Era argues that "the passing of the historical romance" is a phenomenon which we are about to witness, which we are indeed now beginning to witness. He grants that the clash of arms, the glitter of a society once brilliant but now gone, and the thrilling episodes of war and intrigue which mark the romantic novel were a relief from the stupid realism which embodied the idea that only tedious people and commonplace events represent "real life." But the romantic idea has been much overworked. We do not believe that the historical novel is merely a passing literary fad, but the special type that is in vogue to-day, the romance of the Richard Carvel-Janice Meredith type, is a passing phase of the historical novel, and we can wish it haste in its passage and a speedy advent for its successor.

The Atlantic Monthly reflects the season in two April poems by Henry Van Dyke and John Burroughs which, though brief and inconspicuous, are among the best things in the number. "The Weaker Sex" is the title of a strong story by F. J. Stimson—the story of a woman who, after enduring many hardships at the hands of a husband who was the tool of worse men than himself, was mortally wounded by that husband in a fit of insane rage. The prosecuting attorney, who tells the story, told her that her husband would be held for murder unless she lived a year, but that it would not be murder unless she died from the effects of his wound. The doctor tells her that she could not live two days and she committed suicide to save her husband. An interesting article on "The Household of a Russian Prince," tells of the experiences of an English woman who served as governess in the family of a cousin to the Czar thirty years ago.

Scribner's opens with a study of "The Southern Mountaineer," by John Fox, Jr., which sets forth the dialect and customs of the mountain peoples of Kentucky and Tennessee. The writer notes the interesting fact that the peculiarities of the mountaineer's speech are for the most part not corruptions but the survival of words and forms which have elsewhere become obsolete. There are, he says, about two hundred peculiar words in the mountaineer's dialect which came down unchanged from the time of Chaucer. Walter Wyckoff produces another chapter from the book of his experience in "A Day With a Tramp." Mrs. Gilbert's stage reminiscences are concluded in this number and there are several stories, some of them good.

One of the best things that can be said of the Cosmopolitan for this month is that it contains the concluding chapter of that tedious, unaimed serial, "The First Men in the Moon." Barring this which, bad as it is, is welcomed because it is the last, the number is excellent. It has a good illustrated article on Sarah Bernhardt, a very practical and sensible article on "The Average Young Man and his Library," and an interesting and instructive article on "Venice," by Edgar Fawcett, besides the usual number of stories.

The American Review of Reviews has character sketches of the new Queen of England, General Harrison and the late William M. Evarts. The department which gives a condensed statement of the gist of the leading articles of the month is one of the most valuable features of the magazine.

It Slugs Hard.

Coffee a Sure and Powerful Bruiser.

"Let your coffee slave be denied his grog at its appointed time! Headache—sick stomach—fatigue like unto death, I know it all in myself, and have seen it in others. Strange that thinking, reasoning beings will persist in its use," says Chas. Worrall, of Topeka, Kansas.

He says further that he did not begin drinking coffee until after he was twenty years old, and that slowly it began to poison him and affect his hearing through his nervous system. He would quit coffee and the conditions would slowly disappear but "one cold morning the smell of my wife's coffee was too much for me and I took a cup. Soon I was drinking my regular allowance, tearing down brain and nerves by the daily dose of the nefarious concoction.

Later I found my breath coming hard and frequent fits of nausea, and then I was taken down with bilious fever.

Common sense came to me and I quit coffee and went back to Postum. I at once began to gain and have had no returns of my bilious symptoms, headache, dizziness, or vertigo.

I now have health, bright thoughts and added weight, where before there was invalidism, the blues, and a skeleton like condition of the body.

It would be hard to tell how highly I value Postum.

My brother, Prof. Harvey Worrall, quit coffee because of its effect on his health and uses Postum Food Coffee. He could not stand the nervous strain while using coffee, but keeps well on Postum.

Miss Fantz I know personally has been incapable of doing a day's work while she was using coffee. She quit it and took up Postum and is now well and has perfectly steady nerves."

Our Budget.

—This is home mission number.

—Read carefully the articles herein printed which bear on that subject. They will help you to form an estimate of the value and need of the work.

—There is every reason why the May offering for home missions should be the largest in our history. There are greater demands upon us than ever before and we are better able to meet these demands than at any previous time.

Let it be remembered by preachers and church officials that no offering for so great a cause as that of home missions can be worthy unless it is carefully planned and duly prepared for. See that every one in the church has an opportunity to give something.

—There is no better remedy for unsatisfactory religious conditions in your church than to give liberally to help send the gospel to others. It is in seeking to save others that we save ourselves.

—It will be in order on the first Lord's day in May to sing "America" and then to give liberally to help save America. There is no use to sing,

"Long may our land be bright
With freedom's holy light," unless we do something to send the light of the gospel, whose saving power alone can protect our nation.

—Bro. C. P. Evans criticizes the reply which N. Del McReynolds recently made to Mr. Small's letter in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Bro. McReynolds stated that with his church Christian character is the full test of fellowship and they believe "in essentials unity; in non-essentials liberty." Bro. Evans says: "If he will make a careful study of the Bible he will find that there are no non-essentials in Christianity."

—Two new books of great value have passed through the press of the Christian Pub. Co., and are now in the hands of the binders: "The Spiritual Side of our Plea," and "The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century." Each of these books has a special adaptation to our times. The one is a re-examination of some of the points of doctrine which have come up recently for fresh investigation, especially in the light of Mr. Campbell's teaching; the other is a historical work designed to meet the demand of a newly-awakened interest in the beginnings and progress of this wonderful movement. Look out for further announcement.

—A Methodist paper states that there are 206 Methodist churches in Chicago and immediate vicinity, of which 150 are within the city limits. In this number are included 16 Swedish, 14 German, 8 Dano-Norwegian, 4 Bohemian and 1 colored church. Is this home or foreign missions? It is hard to tell. At least it illustrates the truth that there is no fundamental difference between home and foreign missions now-a-days.

How do the Methodists come to have so many churches in Chicago? By being niggardly with their expenditures?

No.

By assuming that city churches must, of course, be rich and so sending all their money elsewhere?

No.

Have the Methodists supported their cause in Chicago better than we have supported ours because they think more of it?

We hope not.

Then why have we not equaled them?

If you please we would rather not answer, but if you will give us one more chance to show that we really do mean business, we will atone for past stinginess.

Very well. The first Sunday in May is your opportunity. See that you seize it.

—J. W. Lowber is delivering a course of lectures in the chapel of the University of Texas on "The Influence of Christ upon Modern Culture."

—Drake University, which is now making a special effort to raise a much needed fund for the increase of its endowment, was illustrated and written up in a recent special number of the Christian Index.

—One of the Jacksonville (Fla.) dailies reports that while J. T. Boone's church made "no special spread" on Easter it had a Sunday-school that morning which packed the house. That is an appropriate sort of Easter celebration.

—Dr. H. L. Willett delivered two series of lectures recently in Richmond, Ky., under the auspices of the united Christian forces of the city, not only arousing great interest and drawing large audiences, but stimulating Bible study so that many have taken up the work of the American Institute of Sacred Literature. Plans have been matured to have the lecturer at Richmond again next year.

—The twentieth annual Y. P. S. C. E. Convention will be held in Cincinnati, July 6-9. After having gone to many points on the sides and corners of the continent, the Convention comes back to a point nearer the center of population and the attendance will doubtless be enormous, especially in view of the fact that sessions are to be biennial hereafter. The Disciples of Christ have never before been so well represented on the program of an Endeavor Convention. Among those who will speak are George Darsie, A. B. Philputt, John E. Pounds, F. D. Power, J. Z. Tyler, J. H. Garrison, G L. Wharton and Herbert L. Willett.

—T. A. Abbott, State Corresponding Secretary of Missouri, recently visited Joplin in the southwest part of the state. He says, "It is beyond question the greatest missionary field in Missouri to-day. The constant discovery of vast deposits of lead and zinc, almost fabulous in their value, has attracted to this territory an increase in population that is scarce short of wonderful." The population has doubled during the last five years, being now 30,000. This increase in population has demanded a corresponding expansion in church work. The various denominations are strengthening their forces there. Three years ago W. F. Turner went there as pastor of the Christian Church and has proved to be the right man in the right place. Assisted by J. W. Baker, a business man, he has put the church on a new basis. The old debt was provided for, a new lot has been purchased in a fine location and the foundation is in and the basement completed and nearly all the material for the building has been purchased and paid for. The house will cost $15,000 when completed and the property will be worth $20,000. Brother Abbott addressed the Sunday-school at the request of the superintendent and gave the invitation, to which twelve responded, to make the good confession. During the day six others were added to these, making eighteen in all. We are glad to report this flourishing condition of the cause at this important center of the southwest. It is a good illustration of the importance of manning this important place with the right kind of preachers.

Spring Medicine

Is of the greatest importance. This is the most critical season of the year, from a health standpoint.

It is the time when you imperatively need Hood's Sarsaparilla.

It will give you a good appetite, purify and enrich your blood, build up and steady your nerves, overcome that tired feeling, give mental and digestive strength — in short, will vitalize your whole being, and put you in perfect health.

Don't delay taking it.

Don't experiment with others. Get that which trial and test have proved the best —

HOOD'S Sarsaparilla

Best for Spring – "I have taken Hood's Sarsaparilla when needed for several years and would not be without it in the house. It is an excellent medicine and I heartily recommend its use in the spring and at any time when a blood purifier and tonic is needed." MRS. F. M. FOOTE, 21 Irving Place, Passaic, N. J.

Spring Fever—"I have taken Hood's Sarsaparilla for my spring medicine for years and have always found it reliable and giving perfect satisfaction. In the spring it takes away that tired feeling or spring fever, gives energy and puts the blood in good condition." MISS EFFIE COLONNE, 1535 10th Street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

—Send all money for home missions to B. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, O., by cheque, draft, postal order, express order, registered letter or (for small sums) two cent postage stamps. Don't send coin loose in envelope, or bills, without registering the letter.

—The following is a statement of the receipts for Church Extension during March, 1901:

From churches	$ 154.46
" individuals	1,189.80
" Ann Sharpe estate, Hanford, Cal.	168.41
" annuity gifts	3,333.33
Total	$4,845.00

At the board meeting held on April 2, the following loans were granted: Paso Robles, Cal., $300; Mitchell Park Church, St. Joseph, Mo., $2,000; Santa Monica, Cal., $1,000; Marshall, O. T., $400; San Diego, Cal., $1,500; Lincoln, Neb., $4,000, with which to buy a lot; Muscogee, I. T., $400; Duncan, I. T., $350. All remittances should be sent to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 600 Waterworks Building, Kansas City, Mo.

—A sermon by James N. Crutcher, of Paris, Tex., on the "Sacredness of Labor," recently appeared in full in the Daily Advocate in that city.

—L. C. Swan, of Mt. Ayr, Ia., writes that his congregation takes but one collection in the year and apportions it among the different societies. This year $107.65 was raised and they expect to make it $150.

—James Small, of Bedford, Ind., calls for the names of all Disciples that have moved to Bedford within the last year. He will begin a meeting with S. M. Martin in the new church May 6th, 1901.

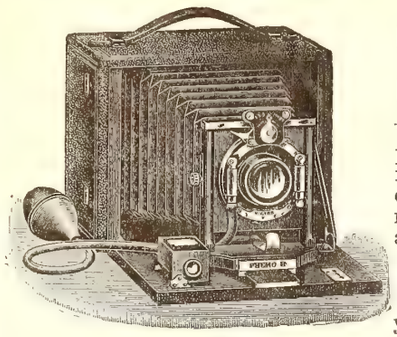
—Joseph E. Taylor, Greensburg, Ind., has become general agent for Popular Hymns No. 2, in the region north of the Ohio River. Orders for this new song book may be sent to him or to the Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis, Mo.

—Closely allied to the work of home missions is the work of caring for widows and orphans. The Home at Louisville, Ky., is still working on its $50,000 endowment, contributions to which can be sent to Robert H. Otter, Box 300, Louisville, Ky.

—The new church at Irondale, O., was dedicated on April 7, by L. L. Carpenter. He says: "It is the best house of worship in the place. Well located, well built with slate and brick, well heated, lighted and furnished and is a great credit to the church and community. There was a $4,000 debt to provide for. The giving was generous, one man, not a member of the church, giving $1,000."

—W. H. Waggoner, our expert mappist and lecturer on missions, has just completed 25 home mission maps for the A. C. M. S. He is making a tour in Nebraska, holding missionary institutes at the following places: Bethany, April 5-14; Fremont, April 15-21; Beatrice, April 22-28; David City, April 29-May 5; Hebron, May 6-12; Fairfield. An institute recently held at Grand Island, Neb., closed with a lecture on "Heroes of Modern Missions," delivered to about 900 people.

—The church at Southport, England, is at present without a pastor, as Brother A. Johnson, who has served them for seven years, has resigned to come to this country. The church would like to correspond with an American preacher of education and ability who could be secured to serve the congregation as pastor. It would be necessary for such an one to send proper recommendations from well-known brethren in this country. Address F. Coop, Mornington Road, Southport, England.



—The Home Missionary Society has recently received two gifts of $5,000 each, one from the estate of the late Dr. Henry Gerould, of Cleveland, and the other from Mrs. D. A. Bates and John Bates, of Irvington, Neb. They will be known respectively as the "Dr. Henry Gerould Memorial Fund" and the "George Bates Memorial Fund." The society agrees to sustain a missionary perpetually in the name of each of these funds. The first work under the latter will be done in Omaha.

—An organization has been effected for carrying on religious work at the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo. A national committee composed of more than 100 ministers and laymen of national reputation has been formed, including such men as Gov. Odell, Justice Brewer, Dr. Cuyler, F. E. Clark, Josiah Strong, Booker T. Washington, President Angell, Dr. Henry Van Dyke, President Harper, Dr. George A. Gordon, Charles Scribner and many more of equal prominence. An immense tent is to be erected which will serve as a home for religious gatherings of various sorts and will form an important exhibit of the religious life and work of the United States. Daily meetings will be held, probably in the early evening just before illuminations.

—The Harvard Summer School of Theology will hold its third session July 2-19. The list of instructors from the Harvard faculty and from elsewhere contains many notable names. Preachers who want a physical rest or a change of mental diet would do well to consider what this summer school of theology has to offer. In its general scope and extent it is more like an institute than a term of theological school. There are three lectures each morning for fifteen days. In the afternoons you can visit Bunker Hill and go swimming at Revere Beach and make little journeys to the innumerable historic points in the neighborhood. You would better go. For information address Rev. Robert S. Morison, Cambridge, Mass.

—The weekly meeting of Christian ministers at the office of the Christian-Evangelist on Monday was well attended. A paper by W. A. Meloan, of East St. Louis, on "Some Anti-Christian Tendencies in Our Modern Civilization" was a vigorous arraignment of existing social, political and industrial conditions and provoked a very lively and interesting discussion. Z. T. Sweeney, who spent Lord's day in the city, preaching for the Mt. Cabanne Church in the morning, made a short talk to the preachers. Sister H. M. Meier, of this city, was also present and presented briefly the work of the Benevolent Association of the Christian Church. Encouraging reports were made from the various churches. Howard T. Cree, of Maysville, Ky., preached to fine audiences at the Central both morning and evening. He will receive a hearty welcome when he comes this way again.

—Prof. S. M. Jefferson calls attention to the fact that in our report of the Congress we were guilty of the same error in the use of the words "warp" and "woof" which he criticized in Mr. Rowlison's paper. True enough, so we were and we had not noticed it until his correction was received. It will be remembered that we criticized Prof. Jefferson's criticism of Mr. Rowlison's paper, but we had not the slightest intention of insinuating that his use of the words "warp" and "woof" was other than correct and we gladly take this earliest opportunity to remove any stain which we may inadvertently left upon Prof. J's reputation for correctness in the use of these words. As we indicated before, it seems to us that if one wishes to criticize a speaker for inaccurate terminology a more convincing argument can be made by exposing the inaccurate use of those terms which count for something in the argument. Others may think that the employment of an occasional mixed metaphor or a failure to distinguish properly between warp and woof must be the mark of hopelessly loose and unscientific thinking. We do not care to dispute the point. At any rate Prof. Jefferson is entitled to this acknowledgment of his complete accuracy in the use of warp and woof. We might remark that in the meantime the warp and woof (whichever is which) of Mr. Rowlison's argument has not yet been touched.

—The Christian Century has an editorial on "Denominational Sentiment" showing that the feeling of "cocksureness" and of mild pity for other religionists, is not peculiar to any one denomination. The point is illustrated by two quotations good enough to quote here. The first is from "O'er Moor and Fen," by Silas Hocking, and is a Methodist's opinion of Methodism.

"Of course I need not enlarge on the fact that Methodist preachers are far ahead of any others. That goes without saying. I am anything but a narrow man, and will admit that there may be good preachers among the Independents and Baptists, or even in the Established Church, although they would all be wise if they gave up their fads and came over in a body to our denomination. But as for comparing the preachers of these sects with our preachers, well, it would be like comparing skim milk with good cream. Why, the other day I went to hear the Bishop of the Diocese, and I could not help feeling sorry for the congregation. Such poor, watery stuff you never heard. As I said to one of our local preachers, what a pity it was we couldn't get the Bishop to one of our local preachers' homiletical classes, it would have done him a world of good. But there, the man was more to be pitied than blamed."

The other quotation is credited to a "mountain preacher in Kentucky," religious persuasion not stated. Perhaps it would not be far wrong to set him down as a hardshell Baptist. It was a triumph of charity that led him to say:

"The Lord air powerful good, an' if he neow and then lets in a sinner as has plumb repented, even if he don't come up to this yere standard, I hain't a-goin' ter object. There may be some in other churches as don't know no better, an' the Lord may, now an' then, take pity on some on 'em. But, brethering, mine's the reg'lar way."

Of course, we all have the "reg'lar way," but let us not close up all the doors of hope for the poor deluded people who have another "way."

Correspondence.

Nebraska Letter.

Oscar Sweeney has been called to the pastorate of the church at Dorchester. We are glad to have him located again in Nebraska.

Bro. I. Clark reports that two were added in the short meeting held at North Bend and two more recently.

Bro. Wm. H. Vanderzee reports the Lincoln colored work as hopeful, while laboring under difficulties. This worthy brother is deserving of all praise for his patient perseverance and should receive not only sympathy but active assistance more than the board is able to give.

A. W. Henry reported himself in a short meeting at Dawson. Mrs. Henry is reported ill again.

H. H. Utterback is retained as permanent pastor at Ord. The work is moving along nicely.

Wakefield hopes to resume their interrupted meeting in May or June.

A good opening for some brother to run a general store is known to me. Information will be given on application.

The First Church at Lincoln has purchased a very desirable lot and are moving in the matter of a building. Assistance will be sought of the brotherhood at large. The reestablishment of the work in Lincoln upon a firm basis is a consummation greatly to be desired. T. J. Thompson, 1726 K St., is the pastor.

A letter from A. C. Gearhart at Clay Center, shows a bad state of things there. Above 60 cases of smallpox have been reported there and they are more strictly quarantined now than ever. Bro. Gearhart has himself been afflicted, as well as one of his children. Naturally this has made a serious interruption in the work of the church.

I visited one day with Atwood at Seward. They are having good houses each night and seven additions have resulted thus far. Internal conditions are far from good. Bro. Reed expects to close his work at that place June 1, and will be available for a pastorate. Bro. Chapman, of York, spent an evening with them also.

J. S. Beem is at Hornick, Iowa, for a short rest. Dr. Hackett has returned to his practice of medicine.

If Easter has anything to do with the weather, this part of Nebraska will have a lovely time for some weeks to come. The day was faultless.

May is the month for the home mission offering. The first Lord's day is the proper time, if possible, but some time in May sure. Nebraska is one of those fields that is being helped by this work and we ought to largely increase our offerings. Not less than one thousand dollars should be sent in. Write to B. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, for supplies for the offering. Begin to announce it now and keep the matter before the church. The board spent $500 in Nebraska ast year.

A. L. Ogden closed at Cowles and is now at Elwood. Three were added at Cowles. The Bible-schools can well be proud of their evangelist, for he has gone to the most helpless places and in every case has built them up and left them stronger. It is truly mission work.

District No. 7 meets in convention April 22-24 at Fairfield. A good program has been prepared.

E. J. Emmons closed his meeting at Louisville on the 6th. Results not reported.

Bro. John D. Austin will be available for work in Nebraska this summer. His address is now Bloomington, Ill.

The Bible-schools and C. E. societies are falling behind this year in the matter of apportionments. Look this up in your school or society. W. A. Baldwin.

Omaha Letter.

Next week this city is to enjoy a taste of the sweet spiritual life and uplifting labors of that world-famous man of God, F. B. Meyer, of England. For three days, April 9-11, the Protestant churches are to unite in meetings under his direction, and much is expected of his brief presence among us.

A great tent campaign to reach the non-church-going multitudes in this city, where probably not more than one in twelve of the population is connected with any Protestant church, is to be carried on through June, July, August and September, under the leadership of J. Merton Smith, of Chicago, one of Moody's great evangelists. He is to have an assistant in the public meetings, and four salaried women to labor from house to house. Four sections of the city are to receive assistance for a month each, with the tent as center of operations. Nearly all the ministers are co-operating heartily with the union movement. It is hoped that the season of ministers' vacations in Omaha this summer will not be quite so easy a time for the devil as usual on account of these meetings.

The work of the Disciples in Omaha is growing, and all the churches are planning forward movements. The North Side Church and minister, W. T. Hilton, are casting about for means to inaugurate institutional features in connection with their widening work in a field which offers peculiar advantages and need of such service.

Bro. Howard Cramblett is leading the South Omaha Church in the direction of a building enterprise, which includes a new church on a new site and a parsonage. Every one should wish him quick and complete success in this much needed achievement.

The old First Church is happy, hopeful and harmonious. Last Sunday closed my first year's work here. The regular attendance on Sunday worship has grown a little, the prayer-meeting a good deal, the Bible-school a little, the number taking and reading our religious papers has been multiplied by two or three, the C. W. B. M., the Ladies' Societies and the Junior C. E. have enjoyed a steady and substantial increase in numbers and in efficiency, and the Y. P. S. C. E. has pushed forward from 30 to 120 members—the largest by far in Omaha, engaged in Christian work in the city missions, the county jail, the hospitals, etc. The church finances are in good condition and the mortgage debt is covered by good subscriptions which we expect to see paid this year. The missionary offerings have been the largest for many years, and 127 persons have joined us at regular services—only about five Sundays with no additions. A new church is a pressing need, and no one need be surprised if plans are laid to have one soon.

We are waiting anxiously and preparing diligently for our great meeting with Bro. Scoville, who comes here from his victories in Des Moines. We expect his meeting to mark an epoch in our work in Omaha. Any reader of this who knows of Disciples in Omaha not identified with our congregations, please write me, or to Bros. Hilton or Cramblett. Sumner T. Martin.

The Warrensburg Convention.

The annual convention of the Sedalia district, which comprises nine counties south of the river, will be held with the church at Warrensburg, convening Monday evening, May 13th. Free entertainment will be provided for all who attend the convention. F. W. Richardson, pastor of the First Church of Kansas City, will preach the convention sermon Monday evening. Let every church in the district send delegates. We want to have the largest and best convention in the history of the district. Announce it from the pulpits next Lord's day, brother preachers. Come early and remain late. Send names to me.

H. A. Denton, pastor.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Salem, Platte, is one of the "evergreen" country schools, all because of the leaders, first of whom now is R. H. Fife, their minister. Decision in this direction seems to make them so in others, meeting their apportionment to our work.

Edgerton has a first-class superintendent in Oscar Wells, the banker, who does in the school as in his business. The school is growing. Miss Mollie Beery sees to the work.

Bethel, Buchanan, another country school that never closes its doors, does such work as honors God and saves the children, J. W. Lower being on his 23d year as superintendent, while Henry Graves co-operates as requested.

George Womack oversees in DeKalb, but your secretary has never been overrun with invitations there. Think the school favors the work but are not overly zealous in it, but George says the apportionment will come and it will.

Versailles is a manifestation of what can be done when some one so wills it. Miss Nannie Ross saw at California last year and was conquered and set out determined that Versailles, with all their debts, should have one of the silk banners at Sedalia.

Great things have been done in Tarkio this year, in which F. E. Elmore and the workers have led, and every preparation was made for a great day in our work, but the storm ruined it all. The entire month of March was given to missions, and the results are the best in the church's history. Tarkio now ranks as one of the best of our churches in work and efficiency.

One school in Missouri has had the silk banner two years, it is Craig, and T. J. Smirl says others can have it this year, but after that, "they want it."

A. W. Chuning makes no pretense or show in his work as superintendent of Bigelow, but the work under his direct management grows. Bro. Chuning and the pastor work as co-partners in business, hence their mutual success, for the growth of the school always means the advancement of the church.

Mound City has not lost in the change in ministers, for Geo. L. Peters, as was W. E. Boulton, is a great friend to Bible-school work, while Superintendent Mitchell, with such as J. B. Denny, would soon convert him if he were not. The two missions opened by these workers go right along.

Our last quarter is passing rapidly and we want an enlistment of 500 one dollar volunteers before June 1. What say you, friends, and when will you say it? Can we not have your words of affirmation immediately as well as later? Thirty new schools, nearly 500 added; eight new meeting houses, and $800 for these, are some of the items for eight months' work, and with your co-operation, we will make the four remaining months tell mightily for Christ. Ready Cooked Food.

A Great Convenience For Housekeepers.

Two young ladies in a certain city are employed down town and rent a small flat, where they do light housekeeping. Frequently they are invited out evenings, and the subject of meals is a puzzler.

Of late they have solved the problem by keeping some nice rich milk or cream convenient and a package of dry crisp Grape-Nuts nearby.

In thirty seconds the meal is ready and it is a most fascinating meal, too, for the creamy taste blends with the peculiar delicate sweet of the grape sugar in the Grape-Nuts producing a never-to-be-forgotten flavor. The sustaining power of the food is sufficient to keep one well nourished even when a small amount is used.

In St. Louis.

The churches in this city religiously observed Easter Sunday with an offering for the National Orphans' Home. Not all have reported; Second, $20; Fourth, $40; First, $55; Central, $127; Mt. Cabanne, $135. When all the Sunday-schools have been heard from, the offerings will probably be over $400.

There were 220 in the school at Beulah on Easter, the largest attendance yet. The evening of April 12, the members and friends of West End Church assembled in the parlors for their annual social. The chief literary feature was an address by the pastor, O. A. Bartholomew, recently returned from a trip to Florida, on "What I Saw in the South." Music, refreshments and conversation filled the hours most happily. Frank O. Fannon, the irrepressible, will assist this church in a short meeting.

F. E. Meigs, whom all Missouri loves, honored us with his presence a few days recently. He and G. A. Hoffmann visited Farmington on the 7th, and dedicated their new $6,000 house. All bills had been paid, there was sixty-six cents in the treasury and Mr. Hoffmann was disappointed (?) because there was no money to raise. Mr. Meigs lectured for them on Monday night and then went on to Fredericktown.

An effort is being made to secure capable men for Carondelet and Ellendale before May 1. Ellendale is one of the best middle class suburbs of the city and the little band there are enthusiastic. They look for rapid growth, provided they can find a capable, self-sacrificing man.

The meetings at Mt. Cabanne closed with sixteen added. April 9, the pastor gave the third and last number in the entertainment course, a lecture on "Sleepy-Heads." The combined auditoriums were packed; it was by far the largest audience ever assembled in the building.

W. H. Boles has announced a Twentieth Century Assembly at Rose Lake, in Marion county, Ill., on the B & O. S.-W. R'y., to commence May 17, and continue through June. Gospel preaching is promised for every night and Sunday at 11 A. M. It is to be interdenominational and among the attractions promised we note the name of one Mrs. Carrie Nation. Mr. Boles is not a stranger in assembly management, and we see no reason why he should not be successful in the largest degree.

The police records of St. Louis show an increase of sixty per cent. in juvenile arrests during the summer or vacation months. The children of the poor are without playthings or play places. They are crowded out into the streets and alleys, which become schools of vice and crime. The benevolent women of the city have combined to conduct vacation play-grounds, and ask aid to maintain them. $2.25 will care for a child two months; Mrs. Price Lane, treasurer, 4380 McPherson Ave. If we do not care for these children, do we not bring upon ourselves the woe of the Master for offending his little ones? Surely, it is an awful injustice to turn them out into tenement courts and alleys.

The Congregational Association of St. Louis and vicinity held its convention Thursday, April 11, at the Fountain Park Church. There were several unusually strong addresses.

Do You Get Up With a Lame Back?

Do You Have Rheumatism? Have You Bladder or Uric Acid Trouble?

To Prove what Swamp-Root, the Great Kidney and Bladder Remedy, will do for YOU, all our Readers May Have a Sample Bottle Sent Free by Mail.

Pain or dull ache in the back is unmistakable evidence of kidney trouble. It is Nature's timely warning to show you that the track of health is not clear.

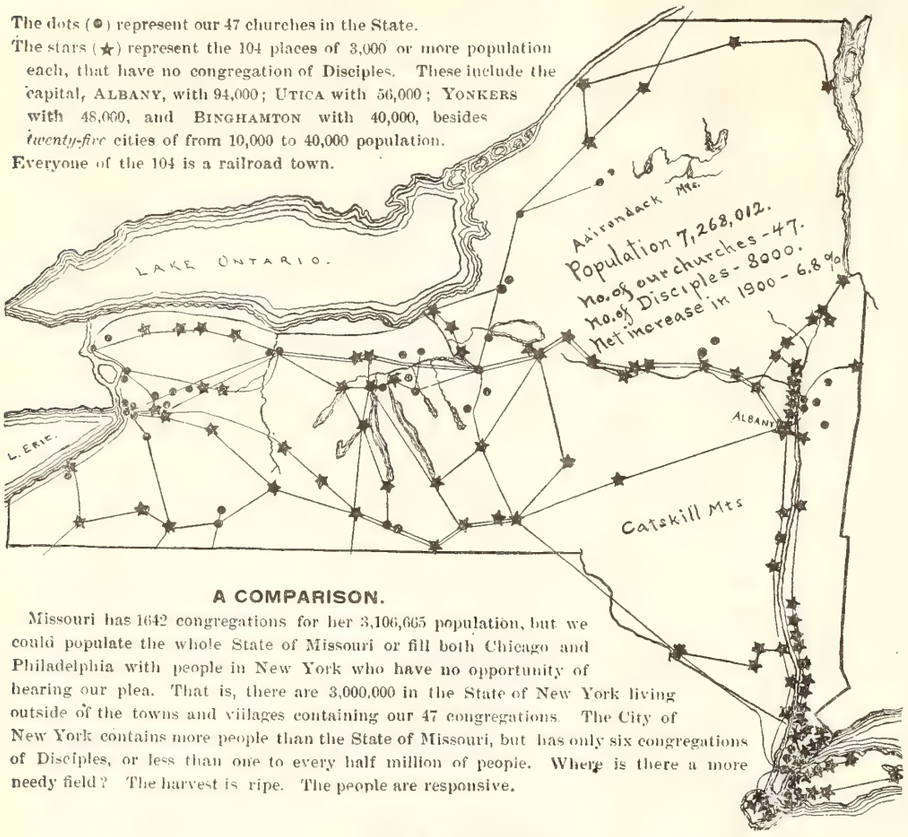
If these danger signals are unheeded, more serious results are sure to follow; Bright's Disease, which is the worst form of kidney trouble, may steal upon you.

The mild and the extraordinary effect of the world-famous kidney remedy, Swamp-Root, is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. A trial will convince anyone—and you may have a sample bottle for the asking.

Lame back is only one symptom of kidney trouble—one of many. Other symptoms showing that you need Swamp-Root are, obliged to pass water often during the day and to get up many times at night; smarting or irritation in passing, brick-dust or sediment in the urine, catarrh of the bladder, constant headache, dizziness, sleeplessness, nervousness, irregular heart beating, rheumatism, bloating, irritability, wornout feeling, lack of ambition, loss of flesh or sallow complexion.

If your water, when allowed to remain undisturbed in a glass or bottle for twenty-four hours, forms a sediment or settling, or has a cloudy appearance, it is evidence that your kidneys and bladder need immediate attention.

In taking Swamp-Root you afford natural help to Nature, for Swamp-Root is the most perfect healer and gentle aid to the kidneys that is known to medical science.



Swamp-Root is the triumphant discovery of Dr. Kilmer, the eminent kidney and bladder specialist. Hospitals use it with marked success in both slight and severe cases. Doctors recommend it to their patients and use it in their own families, because they recognize in Swamp-Root the greatest and most successful remedy.

If you have the slightest symptom of kidney or bladder trouble, or if there is a trace of it in your family history, send at once to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., who will gladly send you free by mail, immediately, without cost to you, a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a book of wonderful Swamp-Root testimonials. Be sure to say that you read this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, St. Louis.

Swamp-Root is pleasant to take, and if you are already convinced that this great remedy is what you need, you can purchase the regular fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles at drug stores. Don't make any mistake, but remember the name, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root.

OUR GREATEST FIELD FOR CITY EVANGELIZATION.

The dots (●) represent our 47 churches in the State.
The stars (★) represent the 104 places of 3,000 or more population each, that have no congregation of Disciples. These include the capital, ALBANY, with 94,000; UTICA with 56,000; YONKERS with 48,000, and BINGHAMTON with 40,000, besides twenty-five cities of from 10,000 to 40,000 population.
Everyone of the 104 is a railroad town.

A COMPARISON.

Missouri has 1642 congregations for her 3,106,665 population, but we could populate the whole State of Missouri or fill both Chicago and Philadelphia with people in New York who have no opportunity of hearing our plea. That is, there are 3,000,000 in the State of New York living outside of the towns and villages containing our 47 congregations. The City of New York contains more people than the State of Missouri, but has only six congregations of Disciples, or less than one to every half million of people. Where is there a more needy field? The harvest is ripe. The people are responsive.

More Dogs in the Manger.

In the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of March 21, H. C. Patterson says some things under the above heading that ought to be said until the state of affairs to which he refers should cease to exist.

That there are many congregations going down for the lack of ministerial aid is true, and alarming also, and that they excuse themselves as Bro. P. states is also true. It may not be charitable but the question will arise, are these congregations converted? Their actions do not indicate much enthusiasm, nor betray a very large amount of interest for the upbuilding of the cause of Christianity in the community in which they live.

I know a man who has traveled and evangelized to some considerable extent in four different states, who, in the last few months wrote to five different brethren offering to come and hold meetings for them, and yet not one of them ever made any reply of any kind. And these were all considered number one brethren. Afterward this brother wrote to others, this time enclosing a self-directed card for reply. Some of these were answered and one said: "We have decided not to hold a meeting now, but did not decide when we would have a meeting."

This state of affairs exists in many places and many congregations are losing all the prestige they ever had in their community and are dying out.

Will some one be kind enough to supply a remedy and save the lives of these waning churches and thus supply earnest workers with something to do? C. P. EVANS.

Disciples at the Pan-American Exposition.

All members of our churches who are coming to the Pan-American Exposition this summer, and who desire boarding places among Disciples in Buffalo, may secure them by writing to me. A number of our people in the Richmond Avenue Church are going to keep open house, and this will be an opportunity of mutually extending acquaintance among brethren. All those who write to me will be assigned, so far as possible, to the homes of our own church folks. The regulation rate is $1.00 a night for a room. Possibly some more elegant homes may charge more, but this is the general rate. Please state definite dates, that the rooms may be held for you. We hope to make it pleasant for visiting Disciples. Write at once. Local church papers please copy.

Comparative Statement for March.

The following comparative statement show the receipts for foreign missions during the month of March, 1901, as compared with the corresponding month of 1900:

	1900	1901	Loss
No. of contributing Churches,	1,804	1,438	366
" " " S. S's,	54	36	18
" " " C. E. Soc's,	50	55 gain	5
" " Individual Offerings,	416	82	334
Amounts,	$39,848.21	$35,708.92	$4,139.29

Comparing the receipts from different sources shows the following:

	1900	1901	Loss
Churches,	$29,958.34	$23,492.12	$6,466.22
Sunday-schools,	337.61	180.33	157.28
C. E. Societies,	285.64	453.94 gain	168.30
Individual Offerings,	2,300.75	1,512.68	788.07
Miscellaneous,	1,005.87	969.85	36.02
Annuities,	950.00	100.00	850.00
Bequests,	5,010.00	9,000.00 gain	3,990.00

Loss in Regular Receipts, $7,279.29; loss in Annuities, $850.00; gain in Bequests, $3,990.00.

We are hoping to regain all the losses of March during April. If losses continue, it will work great hardship to the missionaries and the native Christians.

"I Advise

All women who suffer from chronic diseases to write to Dr. Pierce."

That advice is based upon practical experience. After suffering for months, and finding no benefit result from the treatment of the local physician, Miss Belle Hedrick wrote to Dr. Pierce for advice. She acted on the advice, regained her appetite, recovered her strength, and gained several pounds in weight.

"Write to Doctor Pierce" is good advice for every woman to follow. It costs nothing. Dr. Pierce invites sick women to consult him, by letter, free. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, Buffalo, N. Y.

In a little over thirty years, Dr. Pierce, assisted by his staff of nearly a score of physicians, has treated and cured over half a million women.

"I suffered from female weakness for five months," writes Miss Belle Hedrick of Nye, Putnam Co., W. Va. "I was treated by a good physician, but he never seemed to do me any good. I wrote to Dr. R. V. Pierce for advice, which I received, telling me to take his 'Favorite Prescription' and 'Golden Medical Discovery.' I took thirteen bottles of 'Favorite Prescription' and eight of 'Golden Medical Discovery.' When I had used the medicine a month my health was much improved. It has continued to improve until now I can work at almost all kinds of housework. I had scarcely any appetite, but it is all right now. Have gained several pounds in weight. I advise all who suffer from chronic diseases to write to Dr. Pierce."

Stenography as a Profession.

Twenty-five years ago, and even later, a very large part of the time of every business man was necessarily taken up in attending to his correspondence. The writing machine was practically unknown and all letters had to be written out with pen and ink. Stenographers were few and found employment chiefly in the courts and with newspapers. In only rare instances were they employed in business offices.

With the introduction of the writing machine all this was changed. The labor of correspondence was greatly lessened. The business man could dictate to his stenographer, in an hour, more correspondence than he could write with his own hand in six hours, and thus he had more time to attend to other matters. This revolution in business opened up a means of employment for thousands of young men and women as shorthand writers and writing machine operators. Shorthand schools multiplied and soon were turning out armies of graduates, all supposed to be capable and competent stenographers.

It would seem that with all the present facilities for learning stenography and with the brisk demand for competent stenographers, the supply of these would fully meet, if not more than meet the demand. Yet this is not the case. It is a strange fact, but nevertheless it is a fact, that really first-class stenographers are rare. Any business man who has had experience with a succession of stenographers in the endeavor to secure one who could do satisfactory work, knows this to be true. The average girl that answers an advertisement for a stenographer makes sad blunders. Sometimes she cannot spell and will not take the trouble to consult the dictionary. More often she works without using her brains and, writing phonetically the sounds that come to her ear, makes sad nonsense, where a moment's thought would show her her mistake. Sometimes she can write the stenographic characters very rapidly, but cannot decipher them when she tries to write out her notes.

In 1896 the writer had occasion to make an extended tour through the country, visiting most of the principal cities and stopping at the leading hotel in each place. Every large hotel had a stenographer for the use of its guests. In all this tour he found just one really capable stenographer. All the rest were incompetent amateurs.

There are more stenographers in the country than can find positions, it is true, but nineteen-twentieths of them are incompetent. The really capable writer of shorthand need never be idle. Not long ago a friend of the writer, who is an expert stenographer, went to Chicago to seek employment. He went among strangers without introductions or recommendations. He reached the city at 9 o'clock in the morning and at 11:30 was installed in a position at $75 per month. That was six months ago, and within that time his salary has been twice raised.

So, then, I urge that the young man or woman who intends to go into business cannot do better than to first learn shorthand, and learn it thoroughly. Followed as a distinct profession, it will pay well, or, it will lead to even better things, and is always a decided help to the business man or woman.

The schools of the country are just about to close for the long vacation. We strongly advise the young people to spend the summer in the study of stenography. The Christian Publishing Company is now making a special offer of a complete set of instruction books whereby shorthand can be learned at home without a teacher, and at a trifling expense. These books are unquestionably the best ever published for this purpose. We have been selling them for years to schools, but have never before offered them directly to the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. On page 2 of this issue will be found full announcement and description of our special offer. Read it carefully, think over the matter, and then send us your order. It will be an investment that you will never regret.

Alexander Campbell's Theology

By W. E. GARRISON. This book is a scientific statement according to the historical method of the religious and philosophical influences which molded the theological teaching of Mr. Campbell. Here are some extracts from reviews:

J. J. HALEY: "This book marks the beginning of a new epoch in our literature. . . . . I heartily commend it to the perusal of thoughtful men and women."

F. D. POWER: "A distinct and noteworthy contribution to our literature. It is a clear and comprehensive statement of a very important theme."

ERI B. HULBERT: "Readers whose desire it is to understand the theology which Mr. Campbell elaborated will find in this treatise exactly the information they are seeking."

ASIA MINOR.

Sivas, March 5.—Immediately after the sisters' meeting on last Thursday afternoon the Lord added to his church in this city four souls These were the wives of our faithful brethren, but being members of the old Armenian Church, great was the difficulty before them to turn a deaf ear to the unscrupulous remarks and powerful opposition of their numerous friends.—G. N. SHISHMANIAN.

COLORADO.

Colorado City.—Six additions here since the first of the year; four of them by confession and baptism. The church conditions very much improved in every way.—FLOURNOY PAYNE.

Loveland, April 8.—The church here was made to rejoice by six young people confessing Christ on Easter Sunday, making eight additions not yet reported.

FLORIDA.

Jacksonville, April 10.—Three were baptized to-night at the Adams Street Christian Church at the close of our regular prayer-meeting service, making five since last report to CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.—T. H. BLENUS.

ILLINOIS.

Cairo, Apr. 2.—I am now engaged in a meeting at this place where Elder Clark Braden is minister. The organization has about 80 members and in the city there are several persons who are members of the Christian Church, but not of this local organization. Cairo has about 13,000 inhabitants and 52 saloons. The law of the state says, "Whoever keeps open any tippling house or place where liquor is sold or given away on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, shall be fined not exceeding $200." Also the law of the state says, "Whoever disturbs the peace and the good order of society by labor (works of necessity and charity excepted), or by any amusement or diversion on Sunday, shall be fined not exceeding $25." Notwithstanding these plain laws the saloons of Cairo and a great many of the houses of business are running wide open all day Sunday. And notwithstanding the law plainly says, "Whoever in any place, room, saloon, inn, tavern, shed, booth or building, or in any part thereof, operates, keeps, owns or rents, or uses clock, joker, tape or slot machine, or any other device upon which money or any other valuable thing is staked, bet, hazarded, won or lost, shall on conviction be fined for first offense not less than $100 and for the second offense to be fined not less than $500 and to be confined in the county jail not less than six months, and for the third offense shall be fined not less than $500 and imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than two or more than four years," yet the saloons have these gambling devices in plain view. The people of Cairo are in bondage to the saloon power. There is now on foot an effort headed by Clark Braden to put a stop to such open violation of law. I am here assisting in getting the public sentiment against these evils and to help enforce the law. Our meeting is one week old and 15 names have been added to the congregation. I will probably continue here two weeks longer. From this place I go into West Virginia to hold a revival meeting at Wyatt. Any church needing my services during the summer months may address me at Lexington, Ky.—JAMES W. ZACHARY.

Cameron, Apr. 8.—Three additions by letter yesterday and a good collection for the Orphans' Home. Church will celebrate April 30th as the 70th anniversary of the organization.—O. D. MAPLE, pastor.

Centralia, Apr. 6.—Our meeting with Hill and Williamson closed here Sunday night, having continued 31 days. Thirty-three additions; 25 by confession. Brother Hill's greatest work with us was done by waking up the church and giving first principles a strong presentation. Brother Williamson's work is first-class.—PAUL H. CASTLE, pastor.

El Paso, Apr. 4.—Our revival of four weeks closed March 31. There were 22 additions; 18 by primary obedience. Bro. Thos. J. Shuey, of Valparaiso, Ind., did the preaching and did splendid work. We expect to have him return in the fall when we hope to have more favorable weather.—H. H. JENNER.

Sullivan, Apr. 8.—Yesterday was a joyful day in the work here. Miss Anna Hale, state organizer, spoke in the morning and again in the afternoon and organized an auxiliary of 18 members. Five additions in the morning and two confessions in the evening. J. Fred Jones will be with us to-night in the interest of the C. M. S.—EDWIN E. CURRY.

INDIANA.

Anderson.—Evangelist J. W. Taylor, of Benton Harbor, Mich., has just closed a 12 days' meeting here with three additions to the East Lynn Church. One evening during the meeting the congregation surprised their pastor and wife and presented to them a token of appreciation.—R. B. GIVENS.

Bedford, April 12.—The church here is full of hope and willing workers. We dedicate our new church the first Sunday in May. Bro. Z. T. Sweeney will preach on the glad occasion. Many of our preachers who have seen it say it is the finest and most convenient church they have ever seen. S. M. Martin, of St. Louis, will begin a meeting for us immediately after the dedication, and James Hawes, of Ada, O., has been selected as the singer. The 12th district, composed of the six southwestern counties of Indiana, will meet with us Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, April 25, 26, 27. Our hearts and homes and purses will be open to all the delegates that week. Preached three sermons at Stinesville a week ago. The result was five baptized and two by statement, one from the Baptists. Bro. E. R. Black, of Jeffersonville, continues the meeting.—JAMES SMALL.

Marion.—Two additions in the Tabernacle Church in the last week.—E. L. FRAZIER.

Marion, April 10.—Five accessions recently at the Central Church and also a number at the Tabernacle.—M. F. RICKOFF.

IOWA.

Akron, April 8.—Yesterday was a good day with us here. Bible-school outdid itself. Splendid audiences, although we had no Easter program. Two additions by letter at the morning service. Our church roll has been trebled since January, about 30 having been added during our recent meeting with Lawrence Wright.—R. D. MCCANCE.

Cherokee, April 9.—Our meeting closed Easter Sunday. It lasted 23 days. There were six conversions. We had an exceedingly stormy period for the meeting.—SIMPSON ELY.

Corning, April 8.—Our Bible-school observed the Easter day offering for Orphans' Home. Receipts about $10. Our union meetings closed after two weeks of bad weather. No conversions reported. Much good accomplished for the Church of Christ.—I. H. FULLER.

Corydon, April 12.—We have more than doubled our membership here in a little less than two years. We are invited to preach the baccalaureate sermon for the high school graduating class, May 12, also the memorial sermon May 26. Preached the sermon for the Union Bible Society of the county March 24. Will close my pastorate here about Louisville, Ky.

June 1 to take the work at Oelwein, Ia. Oelwein is a town of over 5,000 inhabitants, with a strong church and a bright future.—J. T. SHREVE.

Council Bluffs, April 7.—The work here is moving along nicely. Fine audiences with two additions; 130 enrolled at the Bible-school, with $5.08 collection. The C. E. Society, both Senior and Junior, are doing good work. We feel strengthened and encouraged.—W. B. CREWDSON.

Des Moines, April 8.—We began our meeting with home forces preparatory to the coming evangelist. Deep interest and 32 added; 20 since last report.—E. W. BRICKERT, pastor East Side Church of Christ.

Hornick, April 8.—Our meeting of three weeks at Craig, Neb., came to a close Sunday eve, March 24, with 20 added. This makes just 200 since we began our meeting at Tekamah. It was considered by all a splendid meeting. We are now resting for a few days with friends in Iowa. We hope soon to be at work again in Nebraska.—J. S. BEEM, evangelist.

Mt. Ayr, April 8.—Yesterday, Easter Sunday, was our missionary day in Mt. Ayr. We combined our offering this year and take but one offering for missions during the year, and this we apportion among the different boards. Our people responded liberally to our call. Although the roads were impassable and streets and crossings almost as bad, we had a fair attendance and the offering amounted to $103.15. The Junior Band gave their Easter program in the evening and $4.50 additional was taken, making in all $107.65. We think we will reach $150 or more when all have handed in their offerings.—L. C. SWAN, pastor.

Waterloo, April 9.—Five confessions last week, and several by statement. A good deal of talk of a new church. Last week George F. Hall, of Chicago, gave us several of his great evangelistic sermons and lectures. He is engaged to lecture this summer in our Chautauqua course.—JOE S. RILEY.

KANSAS.

Columbus, April 10.—We have just closed a 3 weeks' meeting with 32 additions, 26 by confession. My son Eugene, of St. Louis, did the preaching and Prof. G. A. Butler of Mound City, Mo., singing evangelist and soloist had charge of the music. Began a third year here April 7. During my two years' pastorate here have had 110 additions altogether, most of them by baptism. This was our first meeting at Columbus since coming here but have held meetings away from home with 66 additions making 176 altogether in our work here in the last two years.—M. MCFARLAND, pastor.

Lincoln Center.—Evangelist Clara H. Hazelrigg, of Topeka, Kan., has held successful protracted meetings in the sixth district, at Plainville, Stockton, Randall, Jewell City, Kensington, Mankato, Ionia and Lincoln Center. These meetings have greatly revived the work in all parts of the districts and have been the cause of the construction of a number of fine church buildings. Sister Hazelrigg's last meeting closed recently at Lincoln Center with 60 additions and Chas. C. Hill located as pastor. This meeting was not so great in numbers as a number of her other meetings yet in many respects it was one of her best meetings held during this year. The church is greatly revived and all departments of the church are in good condition.—H. C. SHIPLEY, district secretary.

St. Francis, April 8.—I have just returned from a meeting at Phelps, Kan. We had one addition by statement and left the church greatly strengthened otherwise.—H. C. VARNER.

MISSOURI.

Blairstown.—Two by letter and one by baptism, and a church wedding at Blairstown on Easter Sunday.—S. W. CRUTCHER.

Clarksville, April 10.—Had three confessions, one reclaimed last Sunday morning at regular services. Everything in finest condition here, and are planning to begin meeting April 24.—J. P. MYERS.

Everton, April 9.—I am now in a meeting at this place. Meeting ten days old, 21 united in the name of Christ organized and ready for work, one confession last night and one from the Methodists; $450 raised for building, more within easy reach. We will organize Bible-school next Sunday.—JOS. GAYLOR.

Paynesville, April 9.—The Paynesville Sunday-school rendered a fine Easter program. The house would not hold the audience which wished to attend. About $24 was raised for the Orphans' Home.—J. O. WALTON.

Princeton, April 8.—Last Sunday we had a splendid service; the Bible-school has increased to over 80, while the audiences have been increasing very rapidly. We feel that we have been sowing good seed and will have some good additions to Christ's church in the near future. The last Sunday in March we raised $15.16 for foreign missions.—J. E. DAVIS.

Salem, April 10.—Have been here in a meeting since Saturday assisting the pastor, E. E. Davidson. Evangelist Ben F. Hill will join us in the meeting to-morrow. I am ready to make an engagement for a meeting in June. Address me at 915 Aubert Ave., St. Louis, Mo.—GUY B. WILLIAMSON, singing evangelist.

West Plains, April 8.—We had four more additions last evening. Baptized a Catholic also. Our Sunday-school has increased from 100 to 152. Our house is crowded at every service.—E. W. SEWALL.

NEBRASKA.

Deweese, April 8.—Three additions here yesterday; expect more soon. I closed my third year's work at Ox Bow March 31; have been called to labor for them another year. The work moves on so nicely, all is peace and love and harmony. Bro. McVey will be with us the 14th.—E. W. YOCUM.

Grand Island, April 8.—Bro. W. H. Waggoner held a missionary institute for us March 10-17. It was of high merit and far-reaching. We had the largest audiences ever assembled in any church in the city. Our building that accommodates nearly nine hundred people was crowded every night. This gave us a good start for our meetings of three weeks. We closed last night with 21 accessions. It stormed nearly every day. Great good has been accomplished. Bro. R. M. Marshall, of Rock Creek, Ohio, did the preaching.—Z. O. DOWARD, pastor.

NEW YORK.

Syracuse, April 8.—We are improving our auditorium, new pews, carpet, pulpit platform and furniture, decorations. A friend gives us a handsome antique oak communion table. A young men's class in our Bible-school furnish and pay for an arc light at the entrance. Recently we have lost about 30 members by their removal from the city. This is the seventh year of my pastorate. Long enough to see our boys and girls ripen for the kingdom and service. They are being gathered. Easter Sunday three of our young men were baptized.—E. RICHARD EDWARDS, pastor.

OHIO.

Minerva, April 9.—Closed a two weeks' meeting here March 31, with 17 accessions, 13 baptisms and four others. This church gave $338 for missionary enterprises during the past year, thereby trebling its previous yearly missionary offerings.—GUY HOOVER.

TEXAS.

Weatherford, April 8.—The Haddock-Stanley meeting closed with 50 additions; 24 by obedience, 10 from Baptists, 14 by statement and two by restoration.—J. T. MCKISSICK.

Milford, April 8.—Our meeting at Weatherford, Texas, just closed with 50 additions. The meeting here starts off nicely. I go from here to Italy, Texas, and from there to Shreveport, La.—J. L. HADDOCK.

WISCONSIN.

Milwaukee, April 12.—Four more additions last Sunday, making 15 since last report and 64 since the first of last October; all at regular services.—C. M. KREIDLER.

Ideals.

By Mrs. Mattie S. Wright.

I have read in a grand old story,
That is lost beyond recall,
That the sweetest song of the singer
Has never been sung at all.

That ever before the painter,
Like a mist-cloud, soft and faint,
Floats a fairer, sweeter picture
Than ever his brush can paint.

And that deep in the soul of the sculptor,
Seen by his eyes alone,
Sleeps the perfect form of the angel
In the uncarven stone.

I know that the dreams that are fairest
Have never yet come true;
For they melt away in the morning
Like the sparkling drop of dew.

The depths of our lives are hidden
'Neath the ripple's constant roll;
And the thoughts that we do not utter
Are the language of the soul.

But the song of the singer was sweeter
For the one that he might not sing;
And the painter caught some tintings
From the glint of the dream-dove's wing.

Our days would be often dreary,
Were it not for the flitting dream;
And the lives that we live are the better
For the surge of the pent-up stream.

A Fight With Bolo-men.

By Leslie N. Collins.

Bolo-men are knife and spear throwers. They are generally "cut-throats" of the worst type, who deem it delight to sneak upon their intended victims from behind.

It was some little time after our return from our first real scouting expedition, and we were becoming restless after the long protracted calm, when word reached camp that there were some two hundred Bolo-men secreted in the rice and tule swamps twenty miles to the south. Thirty men were immediately detailed to look the matter up. I had the honor of being the seventh man chosen—a lucky number, indeed.

We left camp the same evening with orders to "take no prisoners," and fully prepared, equipped and determined to tackle anything we ran up against.

After a long, cool twilight of especially fine "hiking" we arrived at the desired district the next morning—and what a morning it was! As long as my memory retains pleasant recollections of the Philippines, I shall recall its beauty. One who has never beheld a sunset characteristic of the torrid zone, where the last peaceful rays of the burning orb blend into parting smiles of purple, red and gold; or gazed in admiring rapture at the dazzling loveliness of an ideal tropical dawn—can form no opinion of the brilliant and lovely scene. Far to the south, directly in our front, and half lost to view in the silvery sheen of sunlight, extended the melancholy marsh we had come to penetrate. We entered the bog without ceremony. Not a Bolo-man was to be seen. At that season of the year the marshes are almost dry, and the grasses about the height of one's head. I had never been entirely in the swamps before and what a strange sight met my eyes. What a contrast from the breezy mountain peaks and verdant valleys we had long been used to! Its dismal surroundings; its large and fearful lizards; its loathsome crocodiles; its monstrous slimy snakes, coiling and hissing as you passed, with their cruel eyes dilating and forked tongues protruding; the discordant croakings of unnumbered bull frogs, the weird honk of geese, the quack of ducks, and the sad, shrill cry of rice birds, and many other sights and sounds suggest the gloom and melancholy of that awful swamp. Occasionally a half-wild water buffalo startled us, and at times some struggling, swearing soldier sank into the mire and mud. Thus the time wore wearily on, when suddenly some one sang out:

"We are surrounded by Bolo-men!" At the outcry we all made a run back a few yards to a large clearing we had just crossed, and formed a square. No sooner had we done so than fierce and half-naked Bolo-men rushed out of the tall reeds and rushes on every side at us, brandishing their knives and spears in a horrible manner. I shall never forget the sight. It was wild in the extreme. As we stood there in the clear morning sunlight, calmly watching their approach, we thought the command to fire would never be given. On, on, the black fiends came, but still we stood mute and motionless. I can not describe the sensations which came over me. It was all I could do to command my nerves. The "niggers" were now within about one hundred yards of us and we had begun to almost regret our coming—and theirs too—when the command rang out sharp and clear:

"Ready, Aim, Fire!"

And what a fire it was! Thirty Krag-Jorgensens cracked simultaneously on the morning air, and kept on cracking. Our fire was terrific. We shot and tore great holes through them, as if they were nothing but paper men. They fell like weeds before the scythe—mangled and bleeding and dying on all sides. Especially do I recall one horrible and heartrending scene. It was while I stood busily engaged in refilling the chamber of my magazine. I did not look down at my work, but kept my eyes riveted straight ahead. Two Bolo-men were approaching in single file. They were coming towards me, but before I could look down the barrel of my Krag, the man at my right, a brave and gallant Michigan lad from Grand Rapids, had fired. Our rifles are supposed to carry two miles, and the two Bolo-men were so close that the ball from my friend's rifle passed entirely through the first man, and then, not satisfied with its mission, tore itself into the body of the second man, bespattering him with his companion's blood. They fell dead in each others arms.

The Bolo-men could not withstand our terrible fire. They broke and ran back into the tangled reeds and rushes. We did not give them chase. Sixty-eight Bolo-men had bit the dust, and others lay dying where they dropped. Not an American soldier was injured.

A missionary lady had a little Hindu orphan named Shadi living with her. She had taught him about Jesus, and one night, when he was six years old, she said to him:

"Now, pray a little prayer of your own."

And what do you think Shadi's prayer was? It was a good prayer for any little child to make, for it was this:

"Dear Jesus, make me like what you were when you were six years old."—Child's Gem.

IF you look at a dozen common lamp-chimneys, and then at Macbeth's "pearl top" or "pearl glass," you will see the differences—all but one—they break from heat; Macbeth's don't; you can't see that.

Common glass is misty, milky, dusty; you can't see through it; Macbeth's is clear.

Tough, clear glass is worth fine work; and a perfect chimney of fine tough glass is worth a hundred such as you hear pop, clash on the least provocation.

Our "Index" describes all lamps and their proper chimneys. With it you can always order the right size and shape of chimney for any lamp. We mail it FREE to any one who writes for it.

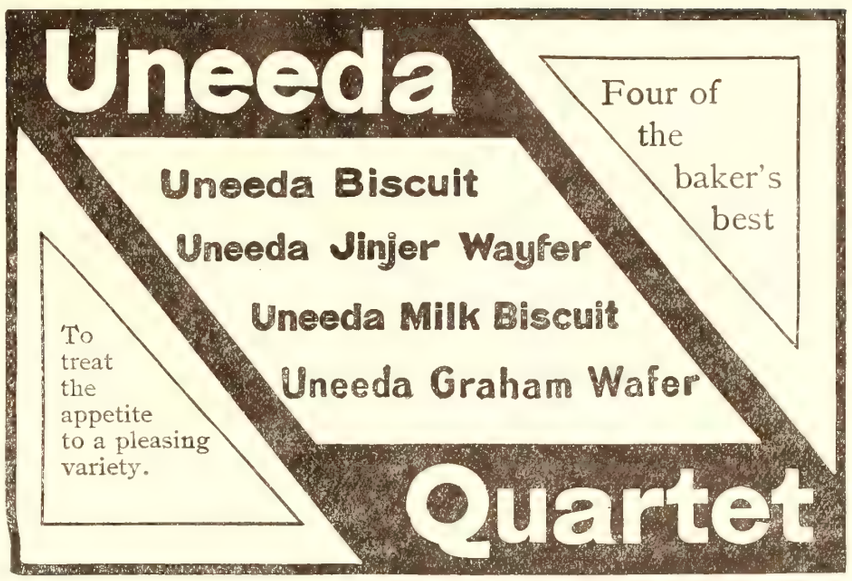
When The Cows Come Home.

With klingle, klangle, klingle,
Far down the dusky dingle,
The cows are coming home;
Now sweet and clear, and faint and low,
The airy tinklings come and go,
Like chiming from the far-off tower,
Or patterings of an April shower
That make the daisies grow;
Ko-ling ko-lang, kolinglelingle,
Far down the darkening dingle,
The cows come slowly home.
And old-time friends, and twilight plays,
And starry nights and sunny days
Come trooping up the misty ways,
When the cows come home.

With jingle, jangle, jingle,
Soft tones that sweetly mingle,
The cows are coming home;
Malvine and Pearl and Florinel,
Dekamp, Red Rose and Gretchen, Schell,
Queen Bess, and Sylph, and spangled Sue,
Across the field I hear her "loo-oo,"
And klang her silver bell;
Go-ling, go-long, golingledingle,
With faint, far sounds that mingle,
The cows come slowly home.
And mother-songs of long-gone years,
And baby-joys and childish fears,
And youthful hopes and youthful tears,
When the cows come home.

With ringle, rangle, ringle,
By twos and threes and single,
The cows are coming home;
Through violet air we see the town
And the summer sun a-slipping down,
And the maple in the hazel glade
Throws down the path a longer shade,
And the hills are growing brown.
To-ring, to-rang, torringleringle,
By threes and fours and single,
The cows come slowly home.
The same sweet sound of wordless psalm,
The same sweet June-day rest and calm,
The same sweet smell of buds and balm,
When the cows come home.



With tingle, tangle, tingle,
Through fern and periwinkle,
The cows are coming home;
A-loitering in the checkered stream,
Where the sun-rays glance and gleam,
Clarine, Peachbloom and Phebe Phyllis
Stand knee-deep in the creamy lilies,
In a drowsy dream;
To-link, to-lank, tolinklelinkle,
O'er banks with buttercups a-twinkle,
The cows come slowly home.
And up through memory's deep ravine
Come the brook's old song and its old-time sheen,
And the crescent of the silver queen,
When the cows come home.

With klingle, klangle, klingle,
With loo-oo, moo-oo, and jingle,
The cows are coming home;
And over there on Melvin Hill
Sounds the plaintive cry of the whip-poor-will,
And the dewdrops lie on the tangled vines,
And over the poplars Venus shines,
And over the silent mill;
Ko-ling, ko-lang, kolinglelingle,
With a ting-a-ling and jingle,
The cows come slowly home.
Let down the bars; let in the train
Of long-gone song, and flowers and rain,
For dear old times come back again
When the cows come home.

The Sheriff and the Widow.

An Irish Sheriff got a writ to serve on a young widow, and on coming into her presence said: "Madam, I have an attachment for you." "My dear sir," she said, blushing, "your attachment is reciprocated." "You don't understand me. You must proceed to court," said the sheriff. "Well, I know 'tis leap year, but I prefer to let you do the courting yourself. Men are much better at that than women." "Mrs. P——, this is no time for fooling. The justice is waiting." "The justice waiting! Well, I suppose I must go, but the thing is so sudden, and besides I'd prefer a priest to do it."—Pilot.

Rich Bachelors.

Samuel J. Tilden was the richest American who ever entered public life and remained single to the end of his days. His persistent celibacy was remarkable; for Mr. Tilden was born with money, and thus from his youth was considered eligible by the mammas of many young women. No Republican of half Mr. Tilden's prominence has gone through life without marrying, but, including David Bennett Hill, who seems to be a confirmed bachelor, Democracy's rolls show a noteworthy triumvirate of distinguished celibates, James Buchanan, the only bachelor president, being the third member thereof. Buchanan is understood to have refrained from taking a wife because the girl upon whom he set his youthful affections was obdurate. He is said to have regretted the single state to the day of his death. Mr. Hill, on the other hand, is reported to be a bachelor from choice.

Literature has furnished a long string of names to the list of eminent bachelors. Possibly the best known unmarried man of letters to-day is Henry James, the novelist. He maintains stoutly that the artist, no matter what the medium of his expression, should remain single, on the ground that the petty cares and carpings of domestic life tend to wear on delicately adjusted nerves and exhaust the mental fiber of genius, whether its possessor be a painter of pictures, a worker in words, a modeler of statues, a composer of music, a singer or one who amuses the people from the stage.

John Greenleaf Whittier was a bachelor, though not from the same cause as the brilliant fiction writer mentioned. Whittier was a great admirer of the married state, we are told, and in his boyhood had a blue-eyed, red-cheeked New England girl for his sweetheart. Together they went to school as children, and when they grew to youth's estate he told her the story most girls like to hear. She heard it gladly, too, but he was poor and a poet, and love must wait for recognition. She promised, but waiting is wearisome; before recognition came to the young verse-maker she forgot him as a lover, and was married to someone else.—Herald and Presbyter.

The Best Chance of Winning.

"If I spend four years in college, the other fellow will have four years' start of me in the race," you say, young man. Be careful how you are influenced by such reasoning. Take note of some facts:

Thirty per cent. of the editors of the country have had college training.

"But I don't intend to be an editor; there is no money in that."

Very true, my friend; but if you are after money, and have no capital, we would advise you to give your mind a thorough training, and when the captains of industry want the right kind of man you will stand a good chance. If it is one of the professions you want to enter, the college course will not be time lost. Notice these facts:

Sixty per cent. of the physicians have been through college.

Eighty-five per cent. of the teachers have had college training.

Seventy-three per cent. of the justices of the Supreme Court and eighty-three per cent. of the chief justices have college diplomas.

Ninety per cent. of the preachers have rubbed their backs against college walls.

There is only one college graduate for every one hundred of our population, or one-half of one per cent. But this one-half of one per cent. furnishes fifty-eight per cent. of the teachers and leaders and rulers of the country.

Better go to college if you want to run a long race with hope of winning.—The Watchword.

"Doctor, don't you think that raw oysters are healthy?" "Yes; I never knew one to complain."—Baltimore Jewish Comment.

Two Schools.

I put my heart to school,
In the world where men grow wise.
"Go out," I said, "and learn the rule;
Come back when you win the prize."

My heart came back again.
"And where is the prize?" I cried.
"The rule was false, and the prize was pain,
And the teacher's name was Pride."

I put my heart to school,
In the woods where wild birds sing,
In the fields where flowers spring,
Where brooks run cool and clear,
And the blue of heaven bends near.
"Go out," I said, "you are only a fool,
But perhaps they can teach you here."

And why do you stay so long,
My heart, and where do you roam?"
The answer came with a laugh and a song—
"I find this school is home."

The Case of Solomon Hotema.

By James Norvel Crutcher.

A striking example of the force of heredity is shown in the case of Solomon Hotema, full-blood Choctaw Indian, who killed two women and a man under the impression that they were witches. Hotema was one of the most prominent men in the councils of his tribe. His father, John Hotema, was for forty-five years a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church, a captain of light-horsemen, and a firm believer in witchcraft. The son attended school in Roanoke, Virginia, for three years, and is a speaker and writer of ability. Soon after his return from the east, the sturdy young Choctaw was elected county judge of Kiamichi county, and held the office a number of terms. He held the office of district attorney several years and for eight years served as national councilman. In addition to this he was a regularly ordained minister of the Presbyterian Church. He attended a meeting of the General Assembly in New Orleans just before he committed the crime for which he is now suffering.

It is interesting to note that in all of his busy life and in his varied experiences at the bar and in the pulpit, Solomon Hotema never gave up the idea of witchcraft as he had learned it in his childhood. After all of his usefulness, and in spite of his learning and experience, this man, of whom no one has an unkind word, must answer at the bar of justice for the crime of triple murder. He admits the killing, and adds that he felt that in ridding his people of witches he was doing them a noble service. He is at loss to know why he should be brought before Judge Dave Bryant, of the Federal Court at Paris, for an affair that concerns Choctaws alone. It is the first case of the kind, so I am informed, ever brought to trial, because the natives would refuse to give evidence on the many "removals" that have taken place in the mountains of the Choctaws.

Despite the law that fifty lashes on the bare back is the penalty for saying one is a witch, the belief is still very popular among them, and executions take place, although not as openly as before. As a rule very old women are witches and sometimes hunters come across them dead in the woods, or in their homes hacked to pieces. The evil charm left by the witch is dispelled in several ways. Where the victim is not too badly witched, the doctor sweats the evil out. A pit is dug in the ground, a little fire is made in it, and a pot of water is placed over the fire. Then the victim is laid on rods over the steaming kettle, and a scene similar to that in Macbeth takes place, the doctor and members of the family marching around the pit, all the while engaging in a weird incantation.

'Mid such surroundings Solomon Hotema, lawyer, writer, preacher, councilman, and judge of his people, grew into such a life of usefulness, and in his old age, having a child to die mysteriously, charged it to the superstition of his earlier years and removed the offenders from this scene of action. And this in the beginning of the twentieth century, in the very heart of the greatest republic on the earth, and among a people civilized, Christianized, who in their peculiar philanthropy are reaching out after other races to teach and help, when these wards of our beneficence are helpless in their sin and misery.

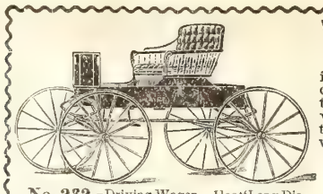
Buddha's Teeth.

Do the priests of Buddhism know that they are deceiving the people when they exhibit to them—for a money consideration—the teeth of Buddha? One cannot avoid the conclusion that they practice a conscious fraud, for some of "Buddha's teeth" in shape and size are remarkably like horse teeth, and Buddha must have had immense jaws to afford room for his many teeth which are shown in temples here and there. When Mary Clement Leavitt, of the World's W. C. T. U., was in a temple in Colombo, Ceylon, a priest offered to show her, for a rupee, one of Buddha's teeth. She replied that she had seen one in Siam, and that she would prefer to keep her rupee. With a serious face she remarked to the priest, "Buddha must have had many teeth." He looked at her sharply, but as she did not seem to be making fun of him he replied very seriously, "Yes, Mem, he had about three bushel." Mrs. Leavitt adds, "This statement did not exceed the fact; that is, if all that are shown were his."—The Advance.

To Preserve Temper.

By W. T. Cooper.

Have always on hand the jar of self control. To prevent this jar from being easily broken, immerse it in a solution composed of the following: Prayer, patience and determination.



When your temper reaches the boiling point, transfer to the jar and seal immediately. When cool it will be ready for use, but should never be served hot.

Thackeray Forgot.

Thackeray, though a polished lecturer, was a somewhat precarious speaker when he dispensed with manuscript, says James T. Fields in his delightful "Yesterdays with Authors." He always cherished the delusion that the particular speech which he was about to make was destined to be one of the most eloquent addresses ever offered to the British public, but not infrequently he forgot what he wanted to say and calmly sat down before coming to the point. This habit of his was well understood and caused no surprise to the audience.

On one occasion he was to deliver an address at a very important function in Manchester and had written a speech which pleased him immensely. He thought it would be the finest thing ever heard in Manchester.

"He began," says Mr. Fields, "in a clear and charming manner, and was absolutely perfect for three minutes. In the middle of a most earnest and elaborate sentence he suddenly stopped, gave a look of comic despair at the ceiling, crammed both hands into his trousers' pockets, and deliberately sat down. Everybody seemed to understand that it was one of Thackeray's unfinished speeches and there were no signs of surprise or discontent among his audience. He continued to sit on the platform in a perfectly composed manner; and when the meeting was over he said to me, without a sign of discomfiture: 'My boy, you have my profoundest sympathy; this day you have accidentally missed hearing one of the finest speeches ever composed for delivery by a British orator.'"

God Will Sprinkle Sunshine.

If you should see a fellow-man with trouble's flag unfurled,
An' lookin' like he didn't have a friend in all the world,
Go up and slap him on the back and holler, "How d'you do?"
And grasp his hand so warm he'll know he has a friend in you.
Then ax him what's a-hurtin' him, an' laugh his cares away,
And tell him that the darkest night is just before the day.
Don't talk graveyard palaver, but say it right out loud,
That God will sprinkle sunshine in the trail of every cloud.

This world at best is but a hash of pleasure and of pain;
Some days are bright and sunny, and some all sloshed with rain,
And that's just how it ought to be, for when the clouds roll by
We'll know just how to 'preciate the bright and smiling sky.
So learn to take it as it comes, and don't sweat at the pores
Because the Lord's opinion don't coincide with yours;
But always keep rememberin', when cares your path enshroud,
That God has lots of sunshine to spill behind the cloud.

A Perilous Lesson.

The strange temptation to cast themselves into space which assails certain persons when they look down from high places is hard to account for scientifically. One having this singular infirmity should not expose himself to danger, for the impulse may suddenly pass beyond control. In this connection a Southern neurologist tells the New Orleans Times-Democrat of a personal experience with a patient of his.

In my younger days as a nerve specialist, he says, it was a theory of mine that the impulse to hurl one's self from a height could be overcome by education. But I had a lesson, and never experiment on such cases now.

The patient in question was a big, strapping fellow, a cabinet-maker by trade, one of the last persons, apparently, to be bothered by nervous fancies; but he was afraid of elevations. To cure his terrors I planned that he should look into space daily until the impulse to hurl himself down was outgrown.

I took him to the top of a six-story building that had a flat roof, and told him to lie down and look off, his eyes just over the edge.

"I'm afraid," he said. "If I look over there I shall go over, sure."

"Nonsense!" I urged. "How can you go over when your whole body is stretched out along the roof? Your head can't go without your body."

So I overcame his objections, and he lay down, keeping his eyes closed for a minute or so. When he opened them and looked into the street a strong shudder ran through his whole body, but I encouraged him to hold out and not draw back.

Suddenly he seized the edge of the parapet with both hands, drew his body violently forward, flung up his legs, and would have gone over the edge had I not instantly flung myself on his back. His movement seemed convulsive and involuntary. He declared that he could not help it, and I believe him.

We were both glad to get to the ground, and there the man's education in that direction ended. I have lived over the experience in nightmare several times, and I always awake shaking like an aspen.

The Senator on a Keyboard.

Senator Beveridge is one of the youngest of the body, but he never forgets the dignity due to him, says a correspondent of the Globe-Democrat. When Senators, Representatives and other people meet in the anteroom of a cabinet officer, the Senators go in first, no matter what the order of arrival. Senator Beveridge not only goes in first, but if the secretary is engaged with somebody not a Senator, and Mr. Beveridge is in a hurry, the Indiana man has a cheerful habit of walking in with an, "Excuse me, please, I am in a great hurry." He transacts his business and goes his way, covering ground in a way that surprises older Senators. Senator Beveridge entered the private office of the Secretary of War the other day. The secretary is to some people a man of considerable dignity, not to say austerity. The Indiana Senator not only spoke with much freedom, but making himself entirely at home, seated himself upon the edge of the secretary's big flat table as he talked, swinging one leg to and fro. The conversation hadn't proceeded two minutes when the door on one side opened and in walked Adjt.-General Corbin, of grenadier proportions. Through the door on the other side entered briskly the chief clerk. Then came the private secretary, followed quickly by two bureau chiefs, and finally the colored messenger at the outer door, whose principal business it is to say the secretary is busy and can't see anybody. All of these people approached the secretary's desk and stood in expectant attitudes. The Senator stopped talking and his swinging limb became motionless. The secretary stood up and looked at the unusual assemblage. His gaze went around the semicircle and back to Mr. Beveridge and the motionless leg. "Senator," said the secretary, without a smile, "if you will get off that keyboard we will resume our conversation." Then the Hoozier climbed down from his perch and saw that he had been working his hip over the surface of a dozen annunciator keys set into the top of the desk, each key communicating with a different room and when pressed summoned the official of that room to the secretary's presence.

He Felt Relieved.

An English poet staying in Italy was one morning surprised to receive from a friend at home an unpaid letter containing nothing but the words, "I am well; with kind regards." The poet was annoyed at having to pay double postage for such a small piece of news, and wanted to have his revenge. He procured a heavy stone and packed it in a box, and sent it to his friend labeled, "To be paid on delivery." Thinking its contents were valuable, the friend gladly paid the heavy charge for carriage. When the box was opened he found, to his horror, nothing but an ordinary stone, bearing a ticket, on which was written: "On receiving the news that you were in good health the accompanying load rolled off my mind."

Advance Society Letters.

Big stack of letters. Only two columns to put them in. Must condense, crowd together, and leave many over for another time. Please take notice; I am not a preacher; never was; don't expect to be. When you feel tempted to address me as "Rev.," kindly stifle the desire. Nothing against preachers; good things; but I happen to be something else; just a schoolteacher. But please don't address me "Prof." Don't like to be called "Professor." Don't know why; can't help it, I suppose. Some teachers like to be called "Professor." It does them good. I used to like it when I was real young, but you know you even get tired of lightbread on rare occasions.

Blanche Green, Akron, O.; "I am much interested in 'Pete'; I also like to read the letters of the Av. S. I am 14 and a freshman in the High School. I belong to the church and Y. P. S. C. E., and want to become a member of the Av. S. Will you please tell me when the guessing time ends?" (Yes, everybody listen; No guess of "Pete", as to who Nap really was, can be considered, if it has not reached me on or before the first day of May, 1901. So get your guesses here quick—those who have not already sent answers; and if a thousand of you solve the mystery correctly, I will just have to send you a thousand copies of my novel, "Shem"; there is no other way out of it!) Edith Brown, Willow Springs, Mo.; "I wish to join the Av. S. What are the rules, and how do you make the badge? We have just moved from Lathrop. I am 13 and live on a farm two miles and a half from town." (Rules: read 5pp. history and 30 lines poetry and memorize a quotation, each week; read Bible verse each day; keep account of what you do in note book; send report to me every 12 wks. Badge: red ribbon—work on it, in any colors you please—white and blue make a patriotic combination—the letters 'Av. S.') Eliz. Vilpey, Warm Springs, Cal.; "I could not keep the resolutions; I have just gotten over scarlet fever—I was in one room five weeks. I am twelve. My sister Lucy (9) and I will both try to keep the resolutions." (I expect you got pretty well acquainted with that room. I hope you won't mind me putting your name 'Eliz.' You see it was to keep from taking up so much space, though it occurs to me that if I had written it "Elizabeth" at first, it would have saved all this explanation.) Madge Masters, Ozark, Ark.: "I have something good to tell you. We have built us a little church at Oak Hill. When we came to this state six years ago, we held our meetings in an old arbor; we kept that up for two years, meeting in a little old dwelling house when it would get too cold for the arbor. Then we met in the school house. Bro. Browning of Little Rock preached our dedication sermon Feb. 23rd; Bro. Ferrill of Coal Hill is our pastor. We feel good to have a church to meet in. I think you know the best kind of cake for birthdays; ever since I can remember I have had a chocolate cake for my birthday. I will be 15 on the 15th of May; if you will come down then, I will give you a piece of my cake." (Children, this invitation is just to me and does not include the rest of you Should you hear of my being sick in the middle of May, you can know I was down in Arkansaw.) Florence Belle Beattie, Dover, Mo.; "I failed to keep my poetry one week and I can not conscientiously fail to tell you so; my auntie says she did not read her history one week. We kept the other rules. Now comes our guess. . . ." Mildred Brooks, Aspen, Colo.; "I should like for some of the members to write to me; I would answer just as soon as I could." Elsie Mershon, Des Moines; "I want to join the Av. S. very bad. I am 12. When I become an active member I will get some other children to join." (That is the kind of active members we are looking for.) Philip Beesley, Moselle, Mo.: "I desire to join your circle. I united with the church in Feb., and belong to the Y. P. S. C. E. I like Julia Cox's quotation, and have learned it to memory. I would be glad if you could have a button or pin as the badge of the society; ribbon is so easily soiled." Jessie Keedy, Toluca, Ill.; "I would like to be a member. I wish somebody would write to me. I would answer them. It is very seldom that I get a letter." Aurora, Mo.; "We are two sisters, Flora (19) and Alma Berry, (13); we belong to the church; we wish to join the Av. S." Neva Stover, Clarence, Mo.; "I wish to become a member. My only objection is that you don't get enough of that good story 'Pete' at a time. My favorite books: Gems of Truth and Beauty, Black Beauty, A Devotee and a Darling." Orrell Fidlar, Terre Haute, Ind.; "I joined the church when I was 7; I am now 14. I would like to become a member of the Av. S. I read a great deal and do not think it will be hard to keep the resolutions. I will begin to-day." (Best time.) Julia Cox, Cox, Mo.; "The more I read of Pete the better I like it. I have read several books lately; I liked Black Beauty best. I am reading Idle Thoughts of an Idle Fellow. I read the letters by the young writers in the Courier-Journal. Cox, Mo., was named after A. S. Cox, my uncle. You asked if it was named after me, or me after it. Neither one. I have made me a badge." Lola Cox, Cox, Mo; "Julia and I failed to keep the rules this week, but we felt so lost we are going to begin again. How many of the members would like to write stories to be printed in our page, when 'Pete' is ended?" (Children, I would like to know what you think of Lola's proposition—plan would have been a shorter word, but it's too late now. Write and tell me if you would like to send short stories and short poems and short articles of any kind, except long kind, to be printed in our columns when Pete is finished—which will not be for a long time, yet. Now don't forget; the next time you write, tell me if you think that a good plan, and if you will contribute something short. I think it would make a very interesting page.) Don Hockaday, Granite, Okla.; "Granite is a nice town by the mountains. Papa and I started to go around the mountain one evening. We came to our milkman's house and he is a real old settler. He told papa he was taking a pretty late start. Papa says, 'Why?' Papa said he thought it was about a mile around. The milkman said it was 13. So we went on back to town. Our teacher is pretty strict. If a boy smiles at a girl, or a girl at a boy, he suspends them. Don't you think he is mean? I do. Next door the boys have a fine shepherd dog; they have to keep him tied up. If any cows would come about when he could get loose they had better run with all their might, for he would bite them like everything. Sometimes when they let him loose and they fly a kite, he pretty near breaks his neck to get it." (I cannot imagine why a girl should wish to smile at a boy. I never could see anything about a boy to smile over. But I think that teacher is pretty strict, not to let the boys smile at the girls. Sometimes it is nice to smile at a girl. If that shepherd dog lived up here in Albany, he could have a big time every day, because the cows are always 'coming about' up here. They do not like to stay at home a single minute. I wish we had that shepherd dog. There is an old red cow that visits our place every day, and we have tried to persuade her to go some other place. I think she could understand a big dog with real sharp teeth.)

PYRAMID PILE CURE

Physicians Recommend It, Druggists Sell It, Everybody Praises It.

If we could sell one package of Pyramid Pile Cure to every person in America who is troubled with piles and who would gladly give the 50 cents to be rid of piles, we would have about ten million dollars. The only reason that we don't sell that many packages this year is that we will not be able to get ten million people to try it. Just one application will prove its merit and amply repay the cost of the whole box.

The effect is immediate. Comfort comes at once and continued treatment will cure any case no matter how bad.

Pyramid Pile Cure soothes the inflamed surface the instant it touches it, heals it, reduces the swelling and puts the parts into a healthy, active condition. There is no substitute for it. Nothing compares with it.

We have never heard of a single case that it failed to cure; we have heard of thousands that it has cured quickly and completely.

Here are a couple of letters recently received.

From Geo. C. Geick, Owens Mills, Mo.:

"Some time ago I bought a package of Pyramid Pile Cure for my wife who had suffered very much. The first trial did her more good than anything she has ever tried. It is just what is claimed for it."

From Richard Loan, Whipple, Ohio:

"I have used the Pyramid Pile Cure and am entirely pleased and satisfied with results. It does the work and no mistake."

The proprietors of the Pyramid Pile Cure could publish columns of similar letters, but these are enough to show what it will do in different cases.

All druggists sell Pyramid Pile Cure or will get it for you. It is 50 cents per package and made only by the Pyramid Drug Co., of Marshall, Mich.

Jesus Appears to the Apostles.*

It was yet the day of Jesus' resurrection, and the evening was rapidly drawing on. Ten of the apostles were gathered together, probably in the upper room where the Passover had been eaten, and others of the little company of Galilean followers were present. But one subject occupied their minds and hearts. The first story of Jesus' appearance, told by Mary Magdalene, had been confirmed by the other women, by Peter, and by the two disciples who had just returned from Emmaus. Still were the company in doubt, and disposed to treat the matter as one of superstition, rather than sober truth. It might have been his spirit, or, as we would say, his "ghost," that had appeared. How could it be that he should really appear again in the body which their own eyes had seen expire upon the cross? It is easy for us, who have been familiar always with the thought of the resurrection, to unduly censure the doubt of those to whom the thought was before unheard-of.

The doors were shut and carefully guarded, for the city was full of enemies. The Jewish leaders might arrest them upon some pretext, or Pilate even might be prevailed upon to persecute them. Treason seemed to lurk on every hand, for had not Judas, one of their inner circle, been the base instrument for their Lord's betrayal? Thomas was too indifferent, from his utter lack of confidence in the rumors afloat, to join the others at all. In the midst of their subdued and troubled conversation, suddenly they became conscious of the presence of one whom they had not seen to enter at the door. A glance revealed to them the well known face andform of their Master. They cried out with fear, thinking that it must be such a spectral appearance as had, in their estimation, already given rise to the stories they had been discussing. But the Lord soon dispelled all doubts and fears. The sweet and familiar salutation fell from his lips, "Peace be unto you." He held up his hands, in the attitude of blessing, and they saw the cruel wounds made by the nails of the cross. Drawing aside the skirt of his outer robe, he showed them his feet, marked with the jagged wound through which the great spike had been driven. Opening his tunic at the side, they beheld the gash of the soldier's spear. Then perceiving that they could hardly yet believe for very joy, the Lord sat down with them, and again ate of their common food, as in the days of their humble comradeship. It was impossible longer to doubt. "Then were the disciples glad, when they saw the Lord."

How glad, we can never realize, for we have never been cast down into the utter depths of their former despair. But he would not, even in the first moments of their newborn joy and hope, suffer them to forget the supreme purpose of his whole mission and ministry. Not for them alone did he teach and work and suffer and die and rise again. For the world that lieth in wickedness did the Son of God come to earth. So he said to them, "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you." Luke tells us more in detail of his discourse on this occasion. He "opened their mind, that they might understand the scriptures." He showed them how his death and resurrection were a necessity, in order that repentance and remission of sins might be preached in his name, among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. Drawing near to them, he breathed upon them, thus expressing in symbolic act the divine endowment they were soon to receive, when the Holy Spirit should come upon them, and told them that their ministry of forgiveness should be ratified in heaven. Much that is mystical and foolish has been written on the 23rd verse of our lesson, but the simple interpretation which the Disciples of Christ have adopted solves all its seeming difficulties. The apostles were to forgive or retain men's sins, not by the exercise of any ghostly authority, but by the proclamation of the gospel of Christ, upon whose simple terms of sincere faith and complete surrender men are granted the supreme gift of pardon. Only in this manner did any of the apostles presume to dispense the gracious boon of the gospel.

Once more the Master disappeared from the eyes of the disciples, but his intercourse with them had been so direct and ample as to dispel their doubts, and fill their hearts with joyful assurance. They quickly sought Thomas, that they might share with him their glad tidings. But Thomas was a matter of fact man, who discarded sentiment, and demanded other evidence than the testimony of others. His spirit of doubting was a sad thing for himself, for it robbed him of a week of rapturous faith, such as the others were experiencing, and filled him with shame when the Lord at last made himself known to him. But his doubt was a blessing to us, for it made his final confidence a surer token of the indubitable evidence upon which rests the doctrine of the resurrection. Jesus must show himself alive "by many infallible proofs," if he would win the faith of the coming ages. But, while a doubter, Thomas was not hostile to the truth. He was ready to believe, when sufficient evidence appeared. His language bore the mark of infidelity, but his spirit was that of faith. On the succeeding Lord's day, therefore, when the disciples were once more gathered in the same place, Jesus came again, and invited this doubter to set his mind at rest, by personally examining the body of his crucified Savior. It was enough. "My Lord and my God!" is the reverent exclamation of the apostle, upon whose mind broke in a flash the light of infinite truth, like the bright sun from out a midnight sky.

"Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." Such is the benediction that rests upon us who believe on the name of the Son of God, through the testimony of those who personally witnessed his resurrection from the dead. Sight is good but faith is better. To know is satisfying to the mind but to trust is restful to the heart. We have his word, that "because I live ye shall live also." We are content. We know not what body we shall wear, but it will be like his own, immortal and glorious, not subject to decay, nor limited in its powers by the laws of matter. Yet it shall be our own, and in no sense lose its identity. The risen body of our Lord preserved its earthly semblance, and even the marks of the death wounds were visible. John on Patmos saw the Lamb of God" as it had been slain"; or with the marks of death upon him. All the signs of our sacrificial service and suffering shall be retained in the glory land, it may be, but they shall be marks of honor, and features of true beauty, in the society of the redeemed and the blest.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and, therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address,

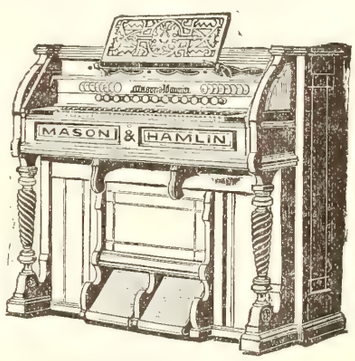
The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.



Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

SANKEY MODEL, STYLE 431.

Known abroad as the Empress Model.

More than two hundred thousand organs were made in our factory before this instrument was perfected. It is the result of great experience in making for all purposes for everybody.

The missionary's tent in the jungles and Westminster Abbey, the humble cottage and the king's palace contain a Mason & Hamlin Organ. The self-taught amateur and Franz Liszt, Saint-Saens, Theo. Thomas, George W. Chadwick, Emil Paur and scores of great musicians have written words of highest praise for Mason & Hamlin Organs.

The Sankey Model (so called because it was designed for and is used by Ira D. Sankey) is suitable for churches, lodges, schools and homes. Cash with order price, $180.00. Other organs, $27.00 to $2,400.00.

We have accumulated organ information for 45 years. Write us about organs if you are interested.

TOPIC FOR APRIL 28.

Fidelity to Pledges: "I Promise."

Ps. 65:1-4; 61:1-8; 116:12-14.

There may be some room for debate regarding the wisdom of exacting pledges or making pledges, though most of us believe they have their place and value; but there can be no debate regarding the necessity of keeping pledges once made. He who sweareth to his own heart and performeth his vow is worthy of admiration in all times and places.

There is an incident in the words of our Savior, recorded in the New Testament, that might well be added to the list of our Scripture references. You will find it in Matt. 21. One son in the parable promised that he would work, and did not; the other made no promises, but went and worked. There are many people of both sorts. There are the fair-seeming Christians who promise all things and do not perform; and there are those who have been able only to lift up their voices and say, "Lord, have mercy on me a sinner," and have turned away from being publicans to become righteous.

There ought to be a definite pledge made to God that we will devote our lives to his work. It is needful for men to declare themselves, to take the oath of allegiance to him, to identify themselves with his people; but more than all it is needful to keep the pledge when once it has been made.

Nothing keeps so many people away from the church of Christ as the inconsistent lives of its people. Those who cry Lord, Lord, and do not the will of their father which is in heaven, are driving other men and women way from the church. Confess Christ, make the lifelong pledge, and then keep it inviolate.

To be sure we shall all stumble, we shall all shatter, now and then, our best resolutions; but it is ours to struggle to our feet, reconstruct our broken purposes and live the pledge we have taken to our Lord. We shall go on doing this through many years; not attaining, but striving to attain; falling short of our greatest fidelity, but trying over and over to do well.

But choosing between the two sons in the parable, I'd far and away rather be the son who promised not and performed than the son who promised and performed not.

BUSH.

Fannie Smarr Bush was born in Ralls Co., Mo., Oct. 10, 1844, and died near Hannibal, Mo., April 1, 1901. She became a Christian at the age of 15 years. She has set forth the religious life in a way that has made her a great help to others. She had hosts of friends who admired her for her frank, unselfish life. Besides other relatives, she leaves husband, John S. Bush, who mourns the departure of a faithful wife. The funeral service was conducted at the Mt. Zion church, near Hannibal, by the writer. The large attendance showed the esteem in which she was held by the whole community. She was a faithful member of the Hannibal church.

Levi Marshall.

CALDWELL.

Evaline Sharp Stites, daughter of Ann and Abram Stites, was born in Hopkinsville, Christian county, Ky., February 22, 1824. She joined the Church of Christ when she was 19 years old, and was baptized by Henry T. Anderson. In November, 1847, she was married to Isaac H. Caldwell and was the mother of four sons and three daughters, all of whom are still living. Her home was at Hopkinsville, her birthplace, until 1863, when the family removed to Louisville, and in 1868 they came to Carbondale, Ill. For 30 years she lived in the house where she died. She was a member of the Carbondale Christian Church for 33 years. She was a most faithful attendant at church service, never failing to attend if she was physically able to go. She often spoke of this as one of her greatest pleasures. The last time she left her home was to attend church. She was a most accomplished woman—took an interest in all that was going on in the world. She was a fine musician and enjoyed her piano as long as she lived. Her last illness began just after her return from Kentucky, where she went Christmas week to attend the funeral of her sister, Miss Eliza A. Stites, of Louisville. Two weeks ago her illness assumed an alarming form and her children were sent for. She died peacefully Tuesday afternoon, March 5, at 5 o'clock, with two of her sons and her three daughters at her bedside. Her last words were, "The Lord knows it all." She was the last of her father's family to die and the first of her own family, leaving her husband, her seven children and 10 grandchildren. M. C. E.

CHITTENDOM.

Jas. Chittendom, after long suffering, died at his home in Arcola, Ill., Jan. 27, 1901, aged 52 years. He leaves a wife and son to mourn their loss. Funeral from the house, the writer officiating. L. T. Faulders.

CLARK.

"'Tis better to have loved and lost
Than never to have loved at all."

May this be fully realized by Mr. and Mrs. Winchester Clark, the young parents of Henrietta Banks Clark, who was born February 9, and died March 9, 1901, having lived only one month before taking flight for that home where the union of hearts finds never an end. There's only four short weeks, yet "our baby" are words that will be ever sweet to the bereaved. For comfort, may they look to him who doeth all things well.

Jennie P. Banks.

Emerson, Mo.

GIBSON.

Mary Jane Gibson, wife of O. H. P. Gibson, died in Davenport, Wed., Feb. 20, 1901. Mrs. Gibson, whose maiden name was DeAtley, was born in Virginia, July 27, 1830. The family moved to Kentucky when she was six years of age, and to Clinton county, Mo., when she was 15 years old. At the age of 16 years she became a Christian and was faithful until death. On July 25, 1854, she was married to O. H. P. Gibson, who, though at the advanced age of 85, still survives her. In the fall of 1882 they moved to Washington and settled on a homestead one mile west of Davenport. She was an affectionate mother and a devoted wife, who always had a large number of friends wherever she lived.

GREEN.

Amos Hancox Green was born in Pennsylvania, Aug. 5, 1837, and came with his parents to Iowa in 1845, settling in Dubuque county. In the year 1860 he was married to Miss Sarah A. Spurgeon, to them were born seven children, three of whom are still living. He came to this place in 1862 and has made this his home ever since. He was an honored citizen and had been a faithful member of the Church of Christ for 40 years. He obeyed the gospel while living in Dubuque county, perhaps under the preaching of some of the Sweeney's, for I have often heard him tell about hearing them preach. He died March 18, 1901, being 63 years, 7 months and 13 days old. F. L. Platt, of Central City, preached his funeral from 2 Tim. 4:7,8.

I. S. Hanna.

KENNEDY.

Yesterday we laid to rest in the Green Pond Cemetery the remains of Bro. Ambrose Kennedy. He was born in St. Clair Co., Ill., in 1830, and has been an exemplary citizen of Pike county, Ill., since 1851. He has been a faithful member of the Green Pond Church of Christ since 1877. He passed away at the age of 70 years leaving a wife and two children to mourn his loss. C. B. Dabney.

Milton, Ill., April 9, 1901.

LIONBERGER.

Mary A. Browning who was married to Emanuel Lionberger in Hancock county, Ill., September 30, 1847. From this union eight daughters lived to have families. All united with the church in early life. Seven are now living. During the last years of his life Emanuel Lionberger was a preacher of the primitive Baptists. Mrs. Lionberger had been visiting for several months at her son-in-law's, Charles Young, in Benton county, Ark., where she became a victim of la grippe, and died peacefully and without much suffering on the 6th of February, 1901. The body was removed to Jonesboro, Ark.

MAUPIN.

Pauline E. Maupin was born in Carter county, Tenn., January 14, 1824, and moved with her parents to Indiana, Kentucky and Missouri. Married to M. R. Childen in October, 1846. She later, with her husband, moved to Illinois, where her husband died in 1860. In 1867, she, with her children, moved to Oregon, and in 1868 married B. E. Maupin. Her husband died in 1878. In 1879 she moved to Latah county, Idaho. She was the mother of eight children, four of whom have already crossed the silent river of death. She early confessed her faith in Christ and has since lived a devoted Christian life. She was well posted in the word of God; she made it her constant companion. She loved to talk of the Savior and of his redeeming love. She loved the house of God and was always present when it was possible to be present. Her death occurred March 20, 1901, as the result of a stroke of paralysis. She died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. P. T. Powe, near Viola, Idaho. The funeral services were held in the Christian Church, Viola, Idaho, conducted by the writer. E. A. LaDou.

MEADOWS.

March 1, 1901, Lemuel C. Meadows passed peacefully away at his home near Abingdon, Ill., after two weeks' illness of pneumonia, surrounded by friends and two daughters, Mary and Adda, with whom he made his home. He was 77 years old. Joined the church when 21 years old, and had been an officer for 40 years, an elder for nearly 20. His companion and one son had preceded him to the better land, leaving five children to mourn his loss. The funeral was conducted by C. H. Boss, his minister, and Bro. T. H. Goodnight. Interment in Abingdon Cemetery. He fought a good fight and kept the faith. J. G.

MOFFITT.

J. T. Moffitt, an elder in the Christian Church at California, Pa., died suddenly while working in his garden on Friday, April 5, at three o'clock (anniversary and hour of Christ's death). Bro. Moffitt had been a member of the Methodist Church for 24 years and of the Christian Church for 12 years. He was a teacher in the Bible-school and a regular attendant at church services. He leaves a wife and six children. W. D. Cunningham.

California, Pa., Apr. 10.

ANEMIA

is little red in the blood.

The red in the blood is the oxygen-carrier. Better to breath with half of one lung than not have enough red in the blood.

The blood is full of digested food; but it can't build muscle and nerve and bone without oxygen.

Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil puts red in the blood: the oxygen-carrier. It is like building a railroad into a famine-stricken country.

We'll send you a little to try if you like.

MOHLER.

Asenath Maria Balcom was born Sept. 5, 1831, at Canandaigua, New York. Died March 13, 1901, at her home in Jewell Co., Kan. Her age was 69 years, 6 months, and 8 days. The cause of her death was heart disease. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Lee, United Brethren minister of Lovewell. The mortal remains were laid to rest in the Webber Cemetery. In 1844 she moved with her parents to Athens Co., Ohio, and on April 5, 1849, was united in marriage to T. K. Mohler, at Athens, Ohio. In 1851 they moved to Iowa, lived there 38 years. In 1889 moved to their present home, Formoso, Jewell Co., Kan. Twelve children were born to them. She leaves an aged and sorrowing husband, seven sons and two daughters to mourn her loss. Her children were all present at the funeral. Her daughters, Mrs. M. M. Kirkpatrick, and Mrs. J. L. Peters, live in Jewell county. All her sons lived near her except H. B. Mohler, of Butler Co., Kan., and Ziba Mohler, of Grant Co., Oklahoma. In 1848 she was converted and united with the Free Will Baptist Church and lived a faithful Christian life. At the time of her death she was a member of the Christian Church at Mankato, Kan. She was a faithful Christian, a kind and loving wife and mother, and was loved and esteemed by all who knew her.

RULE.

Died, in this city, Feb. 26, 1901, Mrs. Margrett J. (Burbridge) Rule. Sister Rule was born the 6th of February, 1825, hence, 76 years and 20 days of age. She was married to Edward Byron Rule in January, 1852. She was a widow thirty-two years. Sister Rule was the mother of three sons, Thomas B. and E. B. Rule, of this city, and Dr. Rule, of St. Louis. Her two daughters, Mrs. Robinson and Mrs. Simpson, also live in this city. Sister Rule was a consistent Christian for 60 years; one of the charter members of the church of Christ in this city. She lived a life that commended the faith she loved to those about her. E. J. Lampton.

Louisiana, Mo., Feb. 28, 1901.

SHOOK.

Mr. M. G. Shook died at his home in Swan, Iowa, April 1, 1901, aged 76 years. He was one of the pioneers of the church in Iowa. He became a Christian at Akron, Ohio, at the age of 17, and came to Iowa in 1849. He was a public-spirited man and believed in the spread of the gospel as the greatest benefit to mankind. His last act was to sign a check for a liberal gift to help build a church in his own town. "His was a house by the wayside." The funeral, by request, was conducted by the writer, April 4, 1901.

Book Notes.

Do not neglect sending for a copy of Special Catalogue No. 31, a little pamphlet entitled Bargains in Books, which will very soon be ready for distribution. It contains a great many good things, which you should not miss. If you disregard this injunction and after awhile you discover that you have purchased, somewhere else, for $1.50 a book that we are selling for $ .75, you will be sorry. This is just what is likely to happen if you fail to have a copy of Special Catalogue No. 31. A line on a postal card is all that is necessary to secure this booklet. Please be careful and specify just what you want. If you merely say "catalogue," we will think you want our General Catalogue, which you probably already have.

Churches and Sunday-schools everywhere seem to be providing themselves with new song books, just now. We are having a very large sale of the several excellent works which we publish—Gospel Call, Silver and Gold, Tidings of Salvation, Popular Hymns No. 2, Christian Hymnal, Gospel Melodies, etc., etc. The Christian Hymnal is the book, pre-eminently, for the Lord's day services of the church. The other works mentioned are compilations of the latest and best music for Sunday-school, evangelistic services, prayer-meetings, conventions, etc., etc. There are none better and few as good as these books. If your church or Sunday-school is contemplating the purchase of new books, by all means examine what we have before sending your order.

Elsewhere in this issue we repeat our special announcement of the offer of the Complete Moran Series of instruction books in shorthand. We are glad to note that orders are coming in rapidly for this set of books. We have, during the past few years, sold thousands of copies of these books all over the United States, and everywhere they have given the best satisfaction. Our trade has been chiefly with teachers of shorthand, but we have now decided to offer the books direct to our patrons. The books are especially adapted for self-instruction. Any person with average intelligence and a fair English education may, with the aid of this series of works, and without the assistance of a teacher, become an expert stenographer, able to command a good salary. Among the readers of the Christian-Evangelist there are doubtless thousands of persons who are working as clerks, salesmen or saleswomen, mechanics, etc., who might improve their condition in life by studying shorthand at home, devoting their evenings to the work. Five dollars spent in this way will prove a splendid investment. Do not neglect it.

The many persons who are now reading and enjoying W. J. Russell's new work, What is Your Life? will also want to read, if they have not already done so, the same author's former work, Wonders of the Sky, a short, popular treatise on astronomy—this universe in which we live. It is a charming little volume, entirely free from the dry, didactic style of the text-book, beautifully printed and bound. The price is Fifty Cents.

In view of the constant inquiry that we receive—"Please tell me where I can get such-and-such a book"—we are constrained to frequently repeat the announcement that we can supply our patrons with any book, no matter where or by whom published, and will send any such volume, prepaid, on receipt of the regular retail price. There is no reason why people living in the Mississippi Valley and the west should send to Boston, New York or Philadelphia for a volume that they might as well order from St. Louis. The price is the same, no matter where you send, and time can generally be saved by sending to us for the work desired.

Christian Endeavor supplies of all kinds—pledge cards, application cards, invitation cards, topic cards, badges, pins, large pledge charts, etc., of the best quality and lowest prices, are for sale by the Christian Publishing Company. No society should try to get along without an adequate supply of these aids to successful work. These supplies are described and priced on pages 82 and 83 of our General Catalogue, which is sent free on application.

Among Our Advertisers.

Barclay Meador, Ad'v. M'gr.

The popularity of our Subscribers' Want Column goes on increasing. A glance at it will reveal the fact that subscribers from the remotest parts of the country, as well as those near at hand, are making use of it. For instance, this issue contains the advertisements of subscribers in Arizona, Colorado, Kansas, Oklahoma and Virginia, as well as Missouri, Illinois and Indiana. Answers to these advertisements come from points quite as divergent. The cost is so small, one cent a word, that any one can make use of the column.

The Baltimore & Ohio South-Western Railroad, patrons of our advertising columns, have anticipated the needs of Christian Endeavorers and all others who will journey to Cincinnati upon the occasion of the 20th annual Christian Endeavor International Convention, by issuing a map of Cincinnati, showing the location of the principal churches, suburbs, railroads, street car lines, public buildings, summer resorts, etc. There is shown a number of Cincinnati's public buildings, including music hall, where the convention will be held July 6th to 10th. On the whole it is a very helpful guide and may be had for the asking. Any reader not familiar with the names of the B. & O. S.-W. agents may obtain it by applying through the Christian-Evangelist Advertising Department.

One of the liberal users of our advertising space is the Columbus Carriage & Harness Co., of Columbus, O. This company now has on hand the greatest exhibit of pleasure vehicles ever assembled in one building. They range from my lady's dainty phaeton to the pretentious family carriage—in all the variations of dashing style and substantial utility—and the numbers are surprising, aggregating nearly 2,500 forms of wheeled comfort. It is not an exposition of carriage-makers' craft—and it is, too. This great show is composed of this company's current stock. The method of selling direct from the factory without intervening profits of jobber and retailer, sharply reducing prices near the cost line, has many admirable features to recommend it. The Columbus Carriage and Harness Company publish a very handsomely illustrated descriptive price-list which they will gladly mail free to any one who will write stating what particular style of vehicle or harness is wanted.

An advertiser appears in our columns this week whose name is, no doubt, new to most of our readers, namely, H. A. Hyatt. The name is well known in St. Louis, however, and especially so to all lovers of the camera. Mr. Hyatt carries an immense stock of cameras and supplies, and is now selling the stock on hand at greatly reduced prices. Those who are prepared to anticipate the camera season by a few weeks can buy from 20 to 50 per cent. cheaper now than when the season is upon us. We can give our readers assurance of the fact that all of Mr. Hyatt's representations will be fully met. The bargain sheet referred to in the advertisement presents some very attractive bargains. A request to us or to Mr. Hyatt will fetch it.

"New occasions teach new duties." Ours is an age of reconstruction. The era of creed-making and theological hair-splitting is forever past. Christ Jesus is the creed of Christendom, and about him shall be the gathering of the peoples. Unity is the watchword of the hour. Christ's prayer for the unification of his followers is the dominating petition of the twentieth century. The church has reached a point in its development when it can no longer ignore the prayer of its Lord for unity. A thousand lesser problems must wait on this: How can we fulfill the desire and petition of the great Head of the Church that we heal our divisions that the world may believe on Him? Let a divided and discredited church wrestle with this problem on its knees. When it puts away its pride of opinion, its dogmatism, its love of power and social respectability, its worldliness, its strife and divisions, and all its other sins, and puts itself under Christ's leadership alone, filled with the Spirit, and united under one banner, the world will believe. But not before.

Current Events.

Aguinaldo's Manifesto. The long delayed address of the ex-dictator to the Filipino people has at last been published. The termination of hostilities, Aguinaldo says, is essential to the welfare of the Islands and peace under American sovereignty is the best thing that can happen. "This cause has been joyfully embraced by the majority of my fellow-countrymen who have already united around the glorious sovereign banner of the United States. In this banner they repose their trust and believe that under its protection the Filipino people will obtain all those promised liberties which they are beginning to enjoy. . . . After mature deliberation, I resolutely proclaim to the world that I cannot refuse to heed the voice of people longing for peace, nor the lamentations of thousands of families yearning to see their dear ones enjoying the liberty and promised generosity of the great American nation." One could scarcely imagine George Washington issuing such a manifesto to the American colonies if he had been captured. There must be something wrong with the analogy between Aguinaldo and Washington and between the Tagals and our revolutionary fathers. It is to be hoped that some useful employment will be found for Aguinaldo now that he has been pacified. As an avowed friend of the United States, he will not, of course, be kept in confinement and there is said to be a certain evil genius whose business it is to find work for idle hands to do. Aguinaldo may not be a George Washington, any more than his foreign agent, Agoncillo, is a rival of Benjamin Franklin in diplomatic genius, but he is a man of energy and capacity, and the administration can well afford to forgive him for the trouble which he has caused and make him useful among his own people.

Progress in China. A prospect of renewed hostilities in China was presented by the threatened Franco-German expedition against Gen. Lui, in Shansi province, who has led his Chinese army on to neutral ground on the border of Chili province. It is reported that Gen. Lui has received an imperial order to avoid a conflict with the foreigners by retiring from his present position, and the expedition of the French and Germans will, therefore, probably be abandoned. The ministers are still discussing the question of indemnity about which there is no trustworthy news to be given, though one account says that $300,000,000 has been agreed upon as the total. It will hardly be as low as that, unless the insistence of the American representative is more potent than we imagine. The ministers of the Powers have commended Mr. Rockhill's suggestion, that in place of the Tsung Li Yamen a small board, to consist of one imperial prince, two ministers and two vice-ministers be organized to administer Chinese foreign affairs. The Chinese have an habitual preference for entrusting matters of great importance to a board or committee rather than to an individual. The Powers in guiding the reconstruction prefer to have the management of foreign affairs entrusted to a small department with one responsible head. This would make it impossible to shift responsibility for violations of international law from one person to another, as has been done in the case of last year's outbreaks. Minister Wu is said to be preparing a memorial to his government recommending a still more radical change in the conduct of foreign affairs—the establishment of the office of Foreign Secretary. Frederic Harrison, who lately made a visit to this country, says that the United States "comes out of the Chinese imbroglio with a cleaner record and a better reputation for diplomatic acumen than any other Power concerned." Perhaps it is a trifle premature to speak of coming out of the imbroglio as a completed act, but we are at least approaching the end and our distinguished British visitor's approbation is so far well merited.

The Cost of War. Modern military history shows few instances in which a nation on going to war has more widely miscalculated the cost than Great Britain did at the beginning of the South African campaign. The speech which Sir Michael Hicks-Beach made in Parliament last Thursday shows the serious condition to which the British treasury has been reduced. Beginning with an estimate that the war would cost not more than $50,000,000, there has been spent up to date $750,000,000, or twice the amount which the Crimean war cost England. And it is not yet done. Probably the figures will reach a round billion. It was a most depressing speech. The expenditure for the war has already created a large deficit. To provide for this and for the coming year, a policy is outlined which includes three points: An increase of the public debt, which has already been authorized by Parliament; a suspension of the sinking fund; and increased taxation. The latter includes an increase in the income tax from a shilling to fourteen pence on the pound, an import duty on sugar, molasses, and glucose, and an export duty on coal. There had been much speculation in beer, spirits, tobacco and tea in the expectation that an extra tax would be laid upon these also. But this was not done, and the speculators lost—about the only feature of the whole business from which the public mind derives any satisfaction. The levying of a tax on imported sugar is considered a serious break with England's time-honored policy of free trade, and the export duty on coal is contemplated with delight by American exporters, to whom it will give a corresponding advantage in the European market. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's candid recognition of the seriousness of the situation and his bold scheme for dealing with it has received much praise from both parties in England.

Commissary Frauds. Are we to have another army scandal, emanating from Manila, such as grew out of the army beef inquiry at the close of the Cuban war? Certainly it will not be as bad as that and probably not a matter of grave importance at all, except in so far as the discovery of fraud in the army, irrespective of its amount, shakes the public confidence in the service and thereby becomes an important matter. It seems quite evident that there have been frauds to greater or less degree in connection with the commissary department at Manila, but it will not be possible to say to what extent they have extended or who is implicated until the trials now in progress have been completed. One account stated that the government's losses were about $100,000, an amount which would almost certainly mean that there has been collusion by some of the higher officials. Later reports indicate that the amount involved is only about $4,000, a sum which subordinates could doubtless purloin without collusion at a commissary depot, which handles supplies to the value of $60,000 every month.

Sunday-school Reform. The Sunday-school is an agency for reform, but it needs reform itself in some respects. The International Sunday-school Committee, the organization of which nearly thirty years ago introduced system and order where before there had been confusion, and which has ever since maintained the system of uniform lessons, is now in session in New York City. More and more imperative of recent years have become the demands for a change of method which will not sacrifice the undoubted advantages of international and interdenominational agreement, but will introduce graded lessons and provide for more continuous courses of study. Two suggestions made by the Sunday-school Editorial Association have come before the International Committee: first, a separate course of lessons covering one year for beginners in Bible study of six years old and under; second, a two years' course of study that should be topical and historical for adult classes. It is suggested that these courses should be prepared by the present international committee. The suggestion is a good one. The present system of international lessons is fairly adapted to intermediate grades, but ill adapted to primary and adult classes. What is needed throughout the system is the introduction of a method which, instead of the study of detached chapters here and there, will give continuity and unity to the study of the Bible.

Amish Marriages. A group of peculiar religionists in Adams Co., Ind., has run afoul of the civil law as regards marriage. They are a simple and moral people, these Amish, who attend to their own business and keep out of trouble as a rule, but they have little sympathy with the civil government and pay but slight attention to the statutes. Happily a decent, moral life usually keeps one out of the clutches of the law, even if he knows and cares little about it, but there are some technicalities which have to be observed. The Amish look upon marriage licenses, for instance, as "godless instruments" and will have nothing to do with them. They consider marriage a purely religious matter with which the state has nothing to do. Prosecution is threatened if they persist in disregarding the legal requirements and the law will certainly take its course. It seems hard on the Amish, but there is no help for it. It illustrates the fact that, though the state disclaims jurisdiction in purely religious matters, it must still maintain the right to decide what matters are purely religious. It is impossible to draw a sharp line between things religious and things secular, and marriage is always on the border between the two, or in both. Witness the plea of the Mormons that the state has no right to prohibit polygamy because it is a religious tenet; the position of the Catholics that civil and Protestant marriages are not marriages at all because not performed under the sanction of the church; and now the plea of the Amish that the state has no right to require such a "godless instrument" as a county clerk's marriage license.

The Cuban Commission. The commissioners appointed by the Cuban Constitutional Convention, in conformity with the resolution adopted last week, have started promptly on their mission and will probably be in Washington before this reaches the reader. If they arrive before the President leaves on his western tour (April 29), they will be accorded every facility for conferring with him and with the officials of the War Department in regard to the interpretation which the administration puts upon the Platt resolution. It is said that Gen. Wood will probably be in Washington at the same time. Senator Platt has sent a letter to Cuba explaining his resolution and urging the acceptance of the terms which it proposes. He does not specifically answer the objections which have been made to the paragraphs authorizing armed intervention in certain cases, giving the United States supervision of Cuban treaties, and reserving the right to purchase coaling stations. His letter is rather a general disclaimer of any selfish motive. "Cuba needs a government of its own but needs help to maintain it. All the United States asks is an acknowledgment on the part of Cuba of the right to assist in maintaining that independence." This, we believe, is the fact, but how far the mere statement of it will go toward removing Cuban objection is another matter.

Disappointed "Indians." Mr. Wells, the new Mayor of St. Louis, has inflicted upon the notorious Democratic politician, Butler, and his "Indians," who were a large factor in carrying the recent election, a most painful surprise. He has refused to appoint one or two Butlerites who were scheduled for appointment, and, worse than that, in his very first message to the Council he recommended that the city make arrangements to care for its own garbage after September, when the present contract expires. As the present contract is held by Mr. Butler himself, who finds it a very good thing, this cannot be characterized as anything else than a cruel, cruel thrust. If this course is pursued further it will cost Mr. Wells his popularity with Butler and the "boys," but the Mayor will easily make it up by the increased respect of all good citizens. The question of greatest interest in the municipal campaign which has just closed was, which of the clean candidates, if elected, would be most successful after election in fighting off the gang which elected him. It looks just now as if Mr. Wells will be fairly successful in resisting the onslaughts of his friends. In answer to the charge that the election was not fairly conducted, Mr. Wells has offered to participate with Mr. Parker in an investigation. His proposition sounds rather too much like an election bet, but we believe that he meant it in good faith and would be glad to see the investigation undertaken. The forfeit, however, ought not to be a purse of $10,000, as Mr. Wells suggests, but the office.

Divorce Decisions. The United States Supreme Court has recently handed down decisions on three appealed divorce cases involving an important principle. In one case a man commenced suit for a divorce in North Dakota three days after he arrived in the state, his wife never having been there at all, and the divorce was granted. In another case a party residing in New York secured a decree of divorce from a Pennsylvania court. Both of these divorces the United States Supreme Court held, on appeal, to be invalid, and the principle was sustained that legal residence must be established in any state before a divorce can be secured under the laws of that state. This is by no means a new point, but it is well enough to have it brought into prominence again, since those states which have easy divorce laws are being more and more frequently resorted to by outsiders who seek release from their connubial bonds. What is really needed is to make marriage and divorce laws, as well as election laws, subjects of federal legislation. It might not remedy the divorce evil, but it would destroy some of its greatest abuses.

Russian Discontent. It is hard to form any trustworthy conception of the state of the public mind in a country so vast as Russia, but at present there are more signs than usual of discontent with the more odious features of absolutism. A petition to the Czar is being circulated asking him to grant a constitution, and 15,000 signatures have been obtained. It is reported that this proposition arouses great enthusiasm, but 15,000 signatures do not amount to much in an empire the size of Russia. Even little Finland with a total population of only 2,000,000 presented a petition to the Czar with more than ten times as many signatures as this which is being circulated in Russia, but it was returned unopened. All reform petitions addressed to the Czar should be carefully marked with the sender's name and address and the legend, "If not called for return in ten days." Count Tolstoi issued an address to the Czar on March 28, the full text of which has just been received. It contains a list of needed reforms and characterizes the present Russian government in plain and uncomplimentary terms. After reciting the disorders and discontent which are rife, he says: "It is very possible that this time the disturbances will be repressed, though it may also happen that the soldiers and police will perceive that what they are forced to do is the great crime of fratricide and refuse to obey, but even if the disturbances are quelled at present they cannot be stifled.

Brevities. A consolidation of the oil companies in Texas with a capitalization of about $50,000,000 is being projected. Texas has strict anti-trust laws, but they may take a more lenient view of a domestic trust.

Arrangements have been made at the request of the American Society in London by which Americans shall have a part in the Victoria Memorial Fund which is being raised. America will honor herself by contributing generously to this fund.

A Nebraska town recently elected a "Carrie Nation ticket" of local officers. Each candidate before the election pledged himself to use every effort to secure Mrs. Nation as the sole adviser of the town officers and to take no official act of importance without her consent.

It is reported that J. Pierpont Morgan has bought the Gainsborough portrait of the Duchess of Devonshire which was restored to its owner, having been stolen twenty-five years ago. It is said that Mr. Morgan's father was negotiating for the purchase of the picture when it was stolen.

A special board of appraisers at New York City has upheld Secretary Gage's decision in regard to countervailing duty on Russian sugar. The board agrees with the treasury department that in rebating the internal revenue tax on sugar which is exported, Russia virtually offers a bounty for the export of sugar.

A refuge for the homeless dogs of Paris is to be provided as the result of agitation in the New York Herald. The subscription list, which is already long, includes 1,000 francs from "A Sloppy Sentimentalist." The desperate condition of the Parisian canines arises from the fact that, while somewhat less numerous than those of Constantinople, they have no well-defined social status, no recognized functions with corresponding privileges and no right of permanent occupancy of the streets, as have the dogs of the Sultan's capital. The dogs of Constantinople are the city's scavengers and the gutters are their places of both business and residence. The Paris dog has nothing to do and no place to do it and he gets nothing for it but kicks. He needs a friend.

An Object Lesson in Municipal Politics.

The recent election in St. Louis, which determined the character of our city government for the next four years, teaches some lessons so clearly that they cannot fail to be understood, and so important that the whole country should profit by them. It is not in the interest of any particular party, but in the interest of better city government, that we point out a few of these lessons.

There was widespread dissatisfaction with the administration of the city's business for the past four years under Republican rule. It was believed that the city's revenues had been squandered and misappropriated, that its public institutions had been neglected and its streets permitted to be uncleaned and ill lighted. No one but the rankest partisan pretended to deny that the most lamentable incompetency and shameful dishonesty characterized the management of the city's business. Every good citizen was looking forward to the spring election to bring relief from existing conditions. For months before the election the matter was the common topic of discussion in private circles, at clubs, in ministers' meetings and in the daily papers. The question was, What it the best method of securing a competent and honest administration for our city during the next four years, including the time in which the great exposition in honor of the Louisiana Purchase is to be held? This last fact gave additional interest to the coming struggle.

Many of us, who are more interested in the welfare of the city than in the success of any party, felt that there ought to be a non-partisan movement by the honest, intelligent men of all parties to nominate and elect clean, capable men. Others, however, belonging to the respectable class, felt that we could do nothing without the party machine. Of course the entire brood of political boodlers and machine workers scouted the idea of a union movement to elect honest men. That would mean their political funerals. The party bosses on all sides opposed such a method. Republicans felt secure in their majority, and did not want to throw away any advantage for the party. Democrats relied on the rottenness of the existing administration to give them the victory.

Meanwhile the Ministerial Alliance of the city, seeing that the parties would run their regular party tickets, appointed a committee of five, afterwards increased to eight or ten, to select a committee of fifty, whose duty it would be to warn the parties that any unfit nominations would be exposed, and to examine closely the character and record of the men nominated and report any objectionable name to the voters. How thoroughly this committee did its work we are not prepared to say, but we doubt if its recommendations had any perceptible influence on the election. No public meetings were held and no public sentiment or sympathy was excited in behalf of its work. Besides the Republican and Democratic tickets the Public Ownership party put its ticket in the field, further complicating the main issue. All these parties nominated clean and capable men for mayor, but there was the usual number of men on the tickets for the City Council and House of Delegates of shady reputation, of known complicity with dishonest methods, and who are in politics solely for the unlawful spoils of office. On one of the party tickets, 24 out of the 26 men nominated for the House of Delegates were Roman Catholics. There is no bar to Roman Catholics' holding office in this country, and we only mention this remarkable preponderance to indicate some of the influences which controlled the party that nominated them.

In such a contest, with the parties thus aligned, what chance was there for the people to rebuke the corrupt city administration of the past four years, defeat the corrupt men on the ticket of the opposing party and select honest and capable men? Behind each of the two leading parties was a corrupt machine, and the new party championing public ownership had not sufficiently won the confidence of the people to be entrusted with the city's management. Honest citizens were placed between the devil and the deep sea. Some took one horn of the dilmma, or the trilemma, and others another, and all feel that they have been terribly gored. No ticket received a majority of the votes cast. The Democratic ticket received the plurality—by what means remains to be investigated—and are now in charge of the city government. Mr. Wells, the mayor, is believed to be both capable and honest. So, also, are some of the men associated with him; but it is generally understood that the House of Delegates is virtually in control of men who represent the worst element in the life of the city. We have no doubt this fact is lamented by honest Democrats, including Mr. Wells, as sincerely as by any other honest citizens. Why were such men elected?

The reason is obvious enough, and herein is the moral to be gathered from our city elections: The honest citizens divided into three political parties, and neither of the old parties felt that it would be safe for it to dispense with its corrupt machine, and the corrupt machines elected corrupt men. If during the next four years our city is to suffer shame and loss by the saloon-keeper who presides over the House of Delegates, and his gang of boodlers, who is to blame for it? Is it not, rather, a false principle that is to blame—the principle that honest, decent people, who have the welfare of the city at heart, should divide their votes among contending parties and co-operate with thugs and boodlers to win a party triumph, rather than unite their votes and influence to smash corrupt machines, defeat scoundrels and place the city's government in the hands of men of known integrity and capability? We are fully persuaded that no city will ever succeed in ridding itself of corrupt rings until its good citizens agree to co-operate, regardless of party lines, to secure the election of righteous men. As long as honest men divide on party lines in city government, thieves and robbers will hold the balance of power and will use it to enrich themselves at the expense of the people. The Review of Reviews for April, after speaking of several recent city elections, says there is a strong tendency now for good men in the cities to act together without regard to party lines. This is certainly a hopeful sign.

Herein, too, is a remedy for the inaction in politics on the part of Christian people, often complained of. Let the battle be made squarely against corrupt men and corrupt methods, and let the lines be drawn between those who stand for honesty and efficiency and those who practice or wink at official dishonesty or incompetency, and respectable people will feel that the stake at issue is worthy of their zealous efforts. But politicians are not going to lead off in this reform. The citizens must take the matter in their own hands, call public meetings, arouse public interest, educate the people, nominate and elect their ticket, and then the politicians and party organs will fall into line.

We say these things because they come strictly within the province of a religious journal. If anyone think differently his idea of religion and ours are very different. The Christian-Evangelist claims and exercises the right to plead for whatever makes for the public welfare.

Internal and External Authority.

The article of Professor McDiarmid, which we publish elsewhere, calls for a further word of explanation on the subject of authority in religion. The quotation which the Professor makes from our former editorial and which serves as a text for his article, was not designed to state "what the controversy is about," nor to define with precision the issue between those who speak of the authority as internal and those who regard it as external. Its purpose was simply to remove a very common misconception, namely, that those who emphasize the idea of internal authority thereby reject Christ or the truths of revelation. We would not care to affirm that all who think and speak of authority as internal accept the teaching of Christ or the truths of revelation. Many, we know, do discard Christ's teaching as possessing any special authority and have no room in their theory for any special revelation. It would be unfair, however, to urge this as a universal characteristic of those who lay emphasis upon the internal and spiritual nature of authority in religion.

Nor did we mean to deny that there is a difference between these two classes of thinkers, both of whom hold to the supremacy of Christ's authority and the fact of revelation. There is a difference in point of view—a difference in conception of the nature of authority, whether as light or as law—which has led to the misapprehension above stated, and which affects very materially our method of thinking and expressing ourselves on the subject. We have not at hand the article in The Outlook to which reference is made, and we are not sure that we read the article. But the quotation made from the article does not, we think, carry with it the implication which Professor McDiarmid seems to think, namely, that the "inward consciousness of God, inherent and essential in man's nature," is put over against the external authority of revelation. That man has a religious nature, capacity for God, is universally admitted. This moral nature in man, growing out of the fact of his having been created in the image of God, which causes this hungering and thirsting after God, and this unrest of the human soul without God—this is "inherent and essential in man's nature." In the absence of anything to the contrary from Dr. Abbott's article, we should say this was what he meant by the quotation given. This is what we referred to in our last article when we quoted Christ's words:

"If the light that is in you be darkness, how great is that darkness!" It is not conceivable that Dr. Abbott holds that the light of revelation which shone in the face of Jesus Christ, revealing God and human duty, is "inherent in human nature." It is rather the capacity to receive that light or truth and make it its own, so that it becomes an internal rule of life rather than an external and arbitrary law. But this presupposes an inner light—an inherent rational and moral capacity, capable of passing judgments on external revelations.

But we have no need to defend Dr. Abbott, and that was foreign to our purpose. The object of our article was to point out that no objective standard or rule of life, no authority wholly external to man, can ever make him free, in the Christian sense, or endow him with the power of life and growth. The truths of revelation, even the words of Christ, are available to salvation only as they are received by faith into the heart and mind, and the soul is enlightened and quickened by them. Otherwise Christ's sacrifice would have been unnecessary, as man might have been justified by law—an external rule of life.

The principle here stated is of universal application. Civilization is a thing essentially inward. The making of a republic does not consist of declaring a constitution like our own over people, regardless of their condition and development—their intelligence, their virtue, their self-control. No people can be free until they have the capacity for freedom. Our children are never really free and prepared to assume the duties and obligations of life until the external authority of the parent is exchanged for principles, purposes and desires which they have accepted and which have been begotten within them, it may be, largely by parental teaching. Children should soon reach an age when they do right because they love the right, and not because it is enjoined upon them by their parents. Christians ought certainly to have this internal rule. Is not this what Christ meant when he said: "And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free"?

Our contention was for two truths: First, that there is in man an original, inherent moral nature, the power to discern between good and evil, a power which approves when we do what we believe to be right, and reproves when we do that which we believe to be wrong, and that the gospel makes its appeal to this moral and rational nature, and that it is through this nature, with which men are endowed, that they are able to respond to the gospel message; second, that the real Christian is one who has received Christ and his teaching into his heart and is governed by Christ from within rather than from without. What then, it may be asked, is the issue? It seems to be very well expressed in Professor McDiarmid's language when he says: "Those who claim that the final and supreme authority in religion is external—in Jesus and his Word—and those who claim it is internal," —to which we would add, "in Jesus and his Word." This seems to us to express the issue, and it is one that arises, as we have stated, from a difference in point of view. If Prosessor McDiarmid believes that Jesus and his Word do not avail to make men free until they become internal forces working from within through the human conscience and understanding, there is no issue between us, though there may be a difference of emphasis. If, however, he holds that Christians are governed by Jesus and his Word as an external authority, which must be obeyed as a subject obeys his sovereign —which he probably does not—then there is an issue. That there are many who do take this wholly external view of authority and who are entirely legalistic in their conceptions of the gospel, we regret to be compelled to believe. It is against these that our article was intended. And our contention is certainly sanctioned by Paul who said, "Even though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know him so no more." It was not, "the law of Christ compels us," but rather, "the love of Christ constraineth us." Christ still reigned, but now on the throne of the heart.

Concerning Church Statistics.

Our jovial contemporary of the Windy City, The Interior, can be as bitter and unjust, when it tries, as the narrowest backwoods journal. Here is a specimen which we quote from the Literary Digest:

"As was to be expected, the denominations which keep no official records of membership have made large 'gains' since the census of 1890. It is strange how slowly religious people come to the conviction that it is as much a duty to tell the truth about their churches as about their stock. Our friends of the body which calls itself 'The Disciples' claim an increase of 74 per cent. in the past ten years, the absurdity of which is patent. The Disciples, who are in fact Baptists with extreme views regarding immersion and its relations to the salvation of the soul, flourish chiefly in the middle and border states; and their growth is largely made up by defections from other denominations, denunciations of other churches characterizing their preaching in many localities. Being intensely congregational in their views of polity, they are without any central, official body, so that their reports are subject to no strict supervision or rigid comparison. We have heard one of their best-known and most venerated leaders say in public assembly that when he reported his members he 'always included an estimate of those who would be members if a church were located so that they could conveniently attend it.' The 'growth' of such a body depends only upon the development of the imagination of its leaders."

There are several clear and distinct violations of the command, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor," in the foregoing screed, among which we mention the following:

1. The implied statement that the Disciples "keep no official records of membership." Each congregation keeps its roll of members in charge of a church clerk and subject to revision from time to time by the official board.

2. "Their growth is largely made up by defections from other denominations." This is absolutely false. Not ten per cent. of our increase, we venture to say, comes from other bodies. This charge smacks of the politician's cry before the election: "We've got the enemy now, if they don't buy us!"

3. "They are without any central, official body," etc. They have no "central, official body" to try heretics, as "our friends of the body which calls itself" Presbyterians have, but they do have a general Christian Missionary Society, under whose supervision statistics are collected and to which annual reports are submitted.

4. The statement from the "venerated leader," if ever made, was a broad jest and was never intended to be taken seriously. We challenge The Interior to test the truth of this by giving name of the party, that his testimony may be taken.

It is strange how slowly some religious people, especially religious editors, "come to the conviction that it is as much a duty to tell the truth" about their religious neighbors as about anything else.

The claim of 74 per cent. gain in ten years is "absurdity" to The Interior. But it has been more than twice that per cent. in St. Louis, where we happen to know the facts personally. We do not affirm the infallibility of our statistics. What we do claim is that an honest effort is made to get at the facts, and that they are probably as accurate as the average church statistics. The comment of The Interior reveals an animus that is not numbered among the Christian graces. As it favors revision, it should revise its statement at once.

Editor's Easy Chair.

The angels are represented in both the Old and the New Testaments as being deeply interested spectators of what is going on here in the world. From their coign of vantage they are enabled to see with a clearness and distinctness beyond human power the issues of the present life. It must be to them a matter of profound wonder and concern that we poor mortals halt and hesitate at the parting of the ways, where one path leads to honor and glory and the other to ruin and disgrace, as if it were a difficult thing to determine which course should be pursued! The rich young man with so many good qualities to recommend him, who came to Jesus and asked a profound question, and who by the answer was turned away from being a disciple of the Master—how he must have been pitied by the witnessing hosts above! What a radiant pathway of service lay before him if he had only said: "Master, all I have is thine to be used as thou wilt, only let me do thy will and advance thy kingdom!" Many a young man, and young woman, too, since that time has committed the same mistake—choosing the world rather than Christ. If angels rejoice over one sinner that repenteth, who can doubt but that they often weep over the mistakes and failures of men?

But deeper than the sorrow of the angels must have been that of the Master when the young man whom He loved turned his back upon Him and went away. Does not His heart even yet feel the pangs of sorrow over the sins of men, and over the faults and weaknesses of His church? Yes, the Christ who is "the same yesterday, to-day and forever," though enthroned in glory must still be grieved with the blindness and unbelief of men, even of His professed followers. That fact ought to be a strong incentive to deter us from evil doing in the hour of temptation, and to spur us on to noble action. One who would willingly add a pang of sorrow to the heart that was once broken with the weight of the world's woe, would surely be an ingrate of the worst type. Has He not grieved over the divisions of His church? What a mighty motive is this for unity and fraternity among His followers! How long will the church, the bride of Christ, permit its alienations and divisions to bring sorrow to Him who gave His life for it? The disciple who would strive to do whatsoever Christ would like to have him do must pray and work for the unity of believers, for if Christ had not desired such union He would not have prayed for it as a condition that the world might believe.

It often helps us to decide upon the wisdom of any course of action to try to think how we would regard it an hundred years hence, or a thousand years hence; in other words, how we would look back upon it from the other world. Sometimes men are kept back from doing a great and generous deed by some paltry consideration that at most can last but a little while, while the reasons for doing the deed are perpetual. Many a man would be helped in disposing of his fortune if he could act from the point of view which he will be sure to occupy in a very limited number of years. Most of the clouds that obscure the pathway of duty are earth-mists which the light of the world to come can readily dissolve. The deeds that are to live after us, and which we would have our friends remember when we are gone, will be those which have been prompted by motives which never cease to appeal to the human heart at its best. How little it matters what men say or think about our actions here, if only they be such as God approves and such as our own conscience approves! What we will wish an hundred years from now, we had done in this first year of the twentieth century, would be about the right thing for us to do. Apply that test to your plans and to your course of action and see if it does not tend to improvement.

The Disciples of Christ in Missouri stand confronted with a great opportunity and a great danger. The danger is that the opportunity will not be appreciated and improved. No wiser nor more far-reaching enterprise has ever been conceived by the brotherhood in this state than the location of the Bible College at the seat of the State University, where the best young people of the state are congregating every year, to influence their thought and life with the teaching of the Bible and with the uncorrupted gospel of Christ. Manifestly the religious body who does that will control the future in the state of Missouri. That opportunity is ours. We are on the ground. We have the prestige of being the first and, as yet, the only people to begin this work. And yet the opportunity of doing it is imperiled by the lack of a few thousand dollars. This seems almost incredible. If we allow this enterprise to fail for lack of the needed financial support, we shall never cease to regret it. Our children's children will look back with amazement at our blindness in failing to see the possibilities of such a work. We cannot believe that God will permit it to fail. He will put it into the hearts of a few of His servants to render the necessary assistance to prevent so great a calamity. But the time is short. Let us think well and act promptly, and may the future bring us no regrets for the action we shall take.

Work in the Home Field.

(Home Missionary Service.)

TEXT: Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh the harvest? behold, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields, that they are white already unto harvest.—John 4:35.

Our own hearts, our own homes, our own land, must witness the beginning of all acceptable service. Not in some far-away clime, in the midst of peril and difficulty, but right where God has placed you is the field of your activity. The world must be evangelized, "for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it," but we cannot take the whole world at once. While the dark continents are dotted with mission stations, our own land is the base of supplies, and piety and patriotism combine to make every Disciple an ardent home missionary.

Precept and Example.

Study again the gospels and the book of Acts and you will find both precept and example justifying the most enthusiastic work at home. The Savior never traveled abroad. He went first "to the lost sheep of the house of Israel," and to them first sent His apostles. After His resurrection the apostles were enjoined to begin preaching at Jerusalem. In what way can we improve on His method? He taught in the synagogues; His heart was touched with compassion for the shepherdless throngs; He wept over Jerusalem, the proud capital of His country; He yearned to gather the rebellious, blind children of Israel into the kingdom. So we should remember that if we would be loyal and obedient to the Master the home field must claim our constant attention and engage our most heroic effort. God forbid that we should be found lacking in Christian patriotism or intelligent obedience to our great Commander!

The Abundant Harvest.

What are the facts? Now in America the fields are white. The present moment is ever the moment of crisis. Ungathered grain will "lodge" and much of it be lost. There are millions of children unschooled in the gospel. Millions of foreigners have poured into this land with perverted notions of the gospel, and but little if any knowledge of Christ. Josiah Strong estimates that at least one-third of our population are foreign-born or children of foreign-born parents. Probably one-half the people never enter any church, either Protestant or Catholic; what a harvest! And while they are not gathered into our churches and Sunday-schools, they are gathered into saloons, beer-gardens and other places of vice. Every year a greater proportion of the population is found in the large cities, the moral character of which is reflected in extravagant, vicious, dishonest municipal government. What are we doing in St. Louis, in Chicago, in New York, in San Francisco, in Philadelphia? Most of these cities are scarcely aware of our presence. And while we are sleeping the enemy is busy sowing tares!

Refuge in Prayer.

The crisis is upon us; it is not four months till the harvest—it is now! "Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that He send forth laborers into His harvest" (Matt. 9:38). If our blessed Master felt the burden of responsibility till His soul was weighed down by it, and He could find relief only in prayer, much more should we. No Christian can look over the wasting fields, take account of the forces that are at war with Zion, note the indifference and inertia of the church, and not be bowed down with the spirit of prayer. We should pray for the workers already in the field. They are men and women who fear God and love souls. They are making heroic sacrifices to sound out the word of life. They struggle against great odds, and are sometimes sore pressed. Pray for them and assure them of your sympathy.

We should pray for the struggling churches. They are poor; they are feeble; they contend against misrepresentation and abuse, against indifference and sin. They are imposed upon by vagrant preachers who spoil the flock, and they are weakened by the presence in the community of unidentified, unemployed, unprofitable Disciples. And we should pray most earnestly for more laborers. What will become of the churches of the future without a capable, consecrated, trained ministry? We have provided but meagerly for their education. Secular callings that promise riches and honor are far more numerous than in the days of the fathers, and far more alluring. The commercialism of the age can be met only by deeper spirituality among the churches.

The brethren who are managing this business of home missions for us are entitled to our hearty sympathy and earnest prayers. Believing, as Disciples do, that denominationalism is a hindrance to evangelization, we must pray for the union of God's people.

Prayer.

We praise Thee, O God, for the manifold blessings of the past; for the fathers and their message; for the sturdy heroism of the host committed to one Master. And now grant, we beseech Thee, that wisdom and love may guide us. Spread the light. Increase the faith and multiply the number of the workers, and add daily to the churches those that are being saved, through Christ Jesus the Lord. Amen.

We believe the most practicable line of temperance work at present to be vigorous efforts to enforce existing laws relating to the liquor traffic. It seeems to us idle to clamor for more rigid laws while those we have on our statute books are openly disregarded with impunity. The best way to get more effective temperance laws and even prohibition is the faithful enforcement of all acts that restrain and limit the liquor traffic. It ought not to be difficult to concentrate the public sentiment of any community in favor of the enforcement of the law. We are satisfied that this has been too much neglected in the past. To plead for absolute prohibition while we neglect to close up the corner saloon which has forfeited its license by a violation of the law, is like pleading for an ideal Christian union while refusing to co-operate with our religious neighbors in any good work. Let temperance people become more practical in their methods of work and they will be more successful in reaching ultimate prohibition. There is no need of lowering the ideal standard, but there is urgent need of taking some practical steps in the direction of making the ideal the actual.

The Chum of Chuffy Waite

By BURRIS A. JENKINS

I. The Duel.

"Fire!" rang the order, the instant the handkerchief fell upon the shingle of the creek. Two shots that seemed one leaped from the smoking barrels of the shot-guns, but the two duelists stood unharmed.

"The deuce, Alphy," exclaimed Chuffy Waite, as he ran to the side of his chum. "You wouldn't 'a' missed a quail at this distance, and Buck Elmer—why, he's big as a house!"

"I don't know what's the matter, Chuffy. Thought I'd fill his shirt full," replied the pale youth. "I'm deuced glad I didn't kill him. Almost wish he'd 'a' killed me. I didn't want this fight, anyway."

"Brace up, man! He's insulted you, and you must wipe it out in blood!"

College young men in those days were like tinder to sparks. Slavery and abolition sat snarling at each other, watching for the place to grip. So often had the clashes come of late in that border college of West Virginia that the faculty had decreed the subject tabooed in all literary societies and public exhibitions.

One fiery abolitionist, in an address at a recent function, had broken the rule and his utterances were answered the following Sunday night by another student who had been asked to preach. As the latter left the church, lines of determined men awaited him, and it looked as though a miniature war would be precipitated. Out of this fracas had grown the duel now being fought on the backs of that quiet stream encircling the village in the hills.

The guns were being reloaded for a second shot, when the pale youth suspiciously demanded to see the cartridges.

"That's light for an ounce of buckshot," said he, weighing his own shell in his palm.

"Here's my man's—just the same weight," hastened "Judge" Storey, the origin of whose nickname is obvious.

"Here, Alphy," put in Chuffy Waite, "Who's second, and who's principal in this thing? You mind your end of the business, and I'll mind mine. I know what's in these cartridges." And a slight smile went over the faces of the group about the guns.

A. J. P. Barton, called Alphabet Barton, and then Alphy, slowly and suspiciously returned to his position.

"All ready? Fire!"

Again the guns roared. Barton, peering through the smoke, saw the form of Buck Elmer stretched lifeless on the pebbles; he saw the men tear the waistcoat open, saw red blotches upon the white shirt front, and a pallor over the usually ruddy face.

A crowd of students who had gathered upon the high bank of the stream opposite, now poured across the foot bridge, and angry mutterings arose from certain throats.

"This was not a real duel," they growled. "Too much politics in it. Foul play. Lynch him. Hang him. Bring a rope."

"Get away while there's time, Alphy," implored Chuffy, "cut through the willows, and over that field. I'll meet you in Logan's hollow, with horses."

"Not by a ——— sight," quietly remarked the boy, drawing up his tall, spare form, while his sad brown eyes almost filled with tears. "His blood isn't on my hands; I was forced into this thing; and now I hope they'll hang me."

Chuffy's friend watched them carrying the limp body over the stream into a neighboring house, and even followed at a distance. Soon the "Judge" came running to meet him saying,

"He isn't dead yet, Alphy, and wants to see you. He's in Roger's parlor on the couch. Dr. Cox is with him. Says he can't live long. Wants to shake with you."

"I'll go," returned the boy, and followed meekly.

The scene in the darkened room was touching beyond description. Friends and class-mates were these two men, with no personal ill-will, yet, severed by that dread Mason and Dixon's line, they fought for a principle, not for a hate.

"Good-bye, Alphy, I've nothing to forgive, and I bear you no malice."

"No, Buck," said Barton, with his soft, broad, Alabama voice, "there's nothing to forgive; I didn't want to kill you; I'd have fired in the air if it had been my own quarrel."

With that calm, serious, sincere manner that was always his, Barton took what he thought was his last long leave of Buck Elmer, of Kentucky. When he came forth again, it was to meet, with that same calm manner, the threats and menace of the mob.

On his way to his room, up several streets and down others, he noted a little group standing before the livery barn in animated conversation—a large familiar figure in the midst of them.

"What are they up to, Chuffy?"

"Give it up. Who's that in the middle?"

"It's—Why, by Jove!—looks like Buck! It's—Why, what the—It's Buck Elmer, or his ghost!" gasped Alphy.

A roar of laughter burst from the group, and Buck advanced with outstretched hand,

"Alphy, you're a brick! There's not another like you, South or North!"

It took a great deal of explaining to convince Alphy Barton of the empty cartridges, the cochineal dye on the shirt, the flour of death on the pallid face, and the feigned anger of the crowd. When he did see it, he laughed little—he seldom laughed—nor was he in the least embarrassed. As usual he was calm, serious, serene. His most apparent feeling was one of infinite relief that nothing worse than cochineal dye stained his hands.

Finally he turned to the keeper of the little hotel, and said,

"Uncle Isaac, have a good oyster supper for twelve to-night at 11 o'clock, and chalk it up against me. Buck, you select the twelve."

II. The Initiation.

A. J. P. Barton was good "frat material," but he was not recognized as such until the end of his first year in college. His quiet reserve, his serious studiousness, which never, however, placed him high in the rolls of scholarship, his calm placidity—these things, while attractive to men when they come to recognize a congenial nature behind, do not, as a rule, win their way to popularity in a day. Consequently it was far into Alphy's Freshman year before it was determined to take him into the leading Greek letter fraternity, of which Chuffy and "Judge" Storey were both members.

"Let's give him holy smoke, boys," said Chuffy. "No ordinary initiation will do for the dear old boy. He's so good a butt, and takes it all so seriously. We must make night hideous!"

"What can we do out of the regular line?" queried the "Judge." "We've tried all the old truck till it's worn out."

"We ought to have a word from Buck Elmer," replied Chuffy. "He oughtn't to be in Lambda's anyway. He belongs by right to us. Can't we get a suggestion of the unusual from him?"

"If we do, though, we might lose Alphy. The Lambdas might come a fine game on us and fake him."

"Never you fear," said Waite. "Don't I sleep with Alphy every night, and didn't I spike him for Epsilon long before you other fellows in the chapter saw his value?"

"I guess you're right," said the namesake of the great Justice. "He's safe to us; but if we let Buck in on the deal we'll have to make it a hoax throughout, and not an Epsilon affair at all."

"Well, why not? And we can't do without Buck, anyway, so let's get up a great game. Then we can give Alphy the real initiation later and call it the second degree."

Agreed on this, they went in search of Buck Elmer from Kentucky. That worthy gentleman stood six feet, weighed 190 pounds and had stumped his state many a time with the most glittering bundle of political sky-rockets that even that oratorical commonwealth had ever seen. He would have been ticketed by his community for a seat in Congress, and possibly greater things, except that he believed in abolition, and foolishly refused to change his mind. Buck was a great light in the literary organizations, being a member of the American Society and having carried its banner many a time over the fallen honors of its deadly foes, the Neotrophians. He spoke with grace and ease, his features seemed chiseled by some great Grecian; his form was Apollo-like. Strange to say, in ordinary conversation he stuttered, while on the platform his fluency was marvelous.

Buck was always fertile in suggestion for any prank. When he and Chuffy Waite laid their heads together the result was always startling. It was they who devised the duel on the shingly beach. On this occasion, these two, with the aiding and abetting of Judge Storey, laid schemes vastly more far-reaching than they thought.

On the following Friday night, six spring-wagons drew out of the village at about midnight, with the livery man's hearse in the midst of the procession. Kentucky horses, strong and spirited, drew these several vehicles.

In those days, many a son of a great southern planter kept quite a stud of fine horses in the little freshwater college town, and scoured the pike roads for miles around. The clatter of speedy hoofs was not an unknown sound to the ears of the farmers in all directions, and when the whirl and rattle of wheels came into the towns and cities of the Panhandle, the merchants would smile, with itching palms, and say, "There are the boys from Bethany."

Many a wild young rake, who at home could not be controlled, was bundled off to the hills at Bethany, in the hope that the founder and president of the college, in whom those who knew him had unbounded confidence as a wonder-worker, might make men of them. And, indeed, he often succeeded. But in the process, many a marvelous metamorphosis was passed, and many a dollar squandered.

When these young men, therefore, undertook an enterprise neither money, time nor energy was spared to carry it through to brilliant completion. This was the spirit and these the resources that enabled the confederacy to stand so firmly and fight so stubbornly against untold odds, until the world marveled. So, in the execution of that night's purpose, all appointments had lavishly been made.

Just before the toll-gate, at the turning of the West Liberty road, the procession paused and a familiar voice, in spite of vain attempts at disguise, sounded out from behind the black mask upon the midnight stillness.

"Unbar the g-g-gates of death!" Then in response to his own demand he himself opened the doors of the hearse. A young man, clad in a night shirt only, made a vain attempt to escape, but was ruthlessly thrust back by an arm like a bar of steel.

"The dead are refractory! Hither angels!" And two Satans armed with pitchforks and certain antiquated pistols with four barrels, like a miniature Gatling gun, called a "pepper box," came forward. The doors were once more opened, and six prisoners who had been sitting in the hearse with doubled legs, all in the same ghostly garb, came tumbling out into the dusty road.

"Fall in to pay t— t— toll!" commanded the majesty of the demons.

"You fool, Buck," drawled Alphy, in all seriousness. "The toll-keeper's asleep. The gate's open. What's the use?"

"The dead has not yet l— l— learned he is beyond the pale. The toll-keeper on the Styx brooks no sordid c— c— copper. Songs are his coin. Sing! Each and in chorus! Andrew Jackson Putnam Barton! Sing!"

Bravely Alphy paid his toll, accompanied by tin fog-horns inspired by four pairs of lusty lungs.

"Simeon P. Hopkins, sing!"

A tuneless wight did his noblest, and was duly applauded.

"Marshall Williams, sing!"

"Hang it, Buck, it's beastly cold!" protested Alphy.

"Whom does the ghost address? No s— s— such party is present to respond. Williams, sing!"

When each had done his devoir, the melee was demanded, and the very hills shook in their boots at the conglomerate chorus. The toll-keeper snored on, for it was an old story to him. Back into the hearse were thrust and doubled the mortal-cold limbs, and down the hill, across the old covered bridge, wound the cortege.

What tongue shall relate the work of that epoch-making night? The masonic lodge from whom the little hall in the village of West Liberty was rented for the occasion, told no tales except of broken panes and shivered doors, torn carpets and used-up chairs, for all which more than ample reimbursement was obtained. A farmer who had started for Wheeling before dawn with a load of wool, reported at police headquarters that he had seen six coffins in wagons, driven by masked men, filing down the Bethany pike. He had not ventured to interfere, for he saw shot-guns. A posse, sent out next day to investigate, found no traces. All they learned was that six students had come into town at seven A. M., in their night shirts and had stolen, observed of few, to their rooms. The posse went home laughing.

"Marshall," said Alphy, as the six neophytes sat about a smoky room, the following midnight, nursing sprains and bruises, "there's but one thing to do. We must hang together. No second degrees for any of us. We'll belong to no frats but our own. The Chi's they call us, and the Chi's we'll be. Many a good name has been bestowed in derision. Chi Zeta Chi. It's our name forever. Swear, brothers, to be true to Chi Zeta Chi!"

They leaped to their feet and swore an awful oath, washing it down with hard cider.

"Simeon Hopkins," said Alphy, as it began to dawn toward chapel hour, "I appoint you and myself to draft a constitution and bylaws. Williams, you and Percy Singleton shall be a committee on the propagation of our principles—as soon as we get our principles—in other colleges. And you, Chenault and Davidson, shall select new men, up to 20, to recruit our ranks."

So was born one of the greatest of American college fraternities.*

"Chuffy," said "Judge" Storey, on Commencement day of their senior year, "we were asses when we gave that mock initiation to Alphy. I swear it again, for the thousandth time. Why, hang it all, they've eight chapters already, and Alphy's president of the shebang."

"Yea, brother," returned Chuffy. "We lost a good man that night. When did we ever play a game on Alphy that downed him? He's so blamed harmless and lucky."

*It is a historical fact that one of the most flourishing Greek-letter fraternities in America was born at the college here spoken of; and the legend still hangs in the air of the place that it was founded by one of the older fraternities in just the fashion here described.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

That distinguished scholar and statesman, Senator Cushman K. Davis, is said to have spoken these words shortly before his death: "I know human history, and I know that in the first century something happened that destroyed the old world and gave birth to the new. The resurrection of Jesus would account for the change, and I do not know of any other adequate solution that has ever been proposed." Here is a fine expression of the principle of historical congruity. The results of Christianity through the centuries have been nothing less than colossal; such a movement must have an adequate cause.—The Advance.

Our Pioneers' Distinction Between Faith and Opinion.

By Addison Clark.

The writer, being a son of one of the pioneer preachers of Texas, gives the distinction between faith and opinion as he used to hear it made by his father and other old time preachers.

1. The lexical distinction was usually presented first and illustrated by familiar things. When the evidence is convincing, the result is faith; where there is no positive evidence, but the conclusion is rather conjectural, the result is opinion. I remember a favorite illustration of my father's with reference to the City of New York. When a boy, having heard nothing to the contrary, he supposed—was of the opinion—that the streets of New York were laid off regularly as the streets of other cities. Afterwards, having read the Knickerbocker's History of New York, by Washington Irving, he received the evidence that many of the streets were very crooked, being what were originally the cow trails of the Dutch people, who were the early settlers there. After this he believed that many of the streets were crooked as stated by Irving. That is, the evidence was sufficient to produce faith.

2. The next distinction might be called an ethical one. In matters of faith the conscience is concerned; a man cannot go contrary to his faith without violating conscience. As Paul says, "Many, by thrusting aside conscience, make shipwreck of faith." Not so with opinion; a man cannot properly be said to have conscientious convictions in matters of mere opinion. A man may yield his opinion to that of a majority of his brethren without any offense to his conscience, whereas, in matters of faith, he could not conscientiously do so, were the whole world against him. Through ignorance what really belongs in the realm of opinion may be placed in the realm of faith, and thus become a matter of conscience. Such was the case alluded to by Paul, where the weak brother through ignorance would defile his conscience by eating meat offered to idols. The brother who understood that such meat was not different from any other meat could eat it or let it alone; conscience had nothing to do with the matter in his case. This distinction is a very important one. Many persons act obstinately, refusing to yield to the wishes, judgment, opinions, of the majority of their fellows, claiming that they have conscientious scruples, where conscience is not involved in the matter at all, it being wholly in the realm of opinion and not of faith.

3. A third distinction made, and strongly insisted on by our pioneer preachers, was in matters of religious conduct. The oft-quoted aphorism, "In faith, unity; in opinion, liberty; in all things, charity," was made very prominent in the discussion of this question. It was shown that nearly all, if not all, the divisions among professed Christians arose from not observing the distinction between faith and opinion. A difference of opinion, it was contended should not have been a cause of division. It is faith in Christ that saves, not opinion as to his place in the Trinity. It is disbelief in him that condemns, not opinion about the non-existence of a personal devil.

The intolerance on the part of zealous and bigoted traditionalists, who elevate opinion to the dignity and importance of faith, has been the cause of much of the religious strife and division in the world.

Another prolific cause of the multiplicity of religious sects has been the building up of new religious parties on some new religious opinion which becomes of so much importance in the minds of its advocates that they dub it their faith and contend for it as strenuously as though the salvation of the world depended on it. "If a man have a dream, let him tell a dream; but he that has my word, let him speak my word plainly." So, if a man have an opinion, let him call it an opinion, and let others who do not agree with him keep hands off, and let peace prevail.

A very common sophistry of this day, as well as the days of our pioneers, is that of calling the defense of an opinion the defense of the truth—a species of sophistry commonly called "begging the question." I have read recently a long and labored editorial article in a religious journal, in which this sophistry runs through the entire article. It is the editor's opinion that what are called missionary societies ought not to be fostered by Christians; and, in the defense of his opinion, he calls his opinion the truth, and the contrary a departure from the truth. That is the question at issue and proof, not assumption, should be brought forward. Those who make opinions about missionary societies, Christian Endeavor societies and such like things, a cause of division among God's people, are factionists and do not distinguish between opinion and faith.

"In faith, unity; in opinion, liberty; in all things, charity."

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Clinton Lockhart, Professor of Semitic and Sacred Literature in Drake University, has published a book entitled "Principles of Interpretation," which it is a pleasure to commend. The book is from the press of The Christian Index Publishing Company, Des Moines, Ia. It contains about three hundred pages and sells for $1.25. Professor Lockhart knows what he desires to say and says it compactly and clearly. The laws of biblical interpretation are treated as a science. The trained scholar, thinker and teacher is in evidence on every page of this compact volume. The "Rules" submitted by which the meaning of Holy Scripture may be ascertained are fifty. Some of the "Axioms" submitted by Professor Lockhart are: "The true object of speech is the impartation of thought." "The true object of interpretation is to apprehend the exact thought of the author." "Language is a reliable medium of communication." "Usage determines the meaning of words." "Two writers do not independently express thought alike." "Every writer is influenced by his environment." "An author's purpose determines the character of his production." "Any writing is liable to modification in copying, translating and the gradual change of a living tongue," etc., etc. Following the "Axioms," fifteen in number, are the "Rules" to which reference has been made. The comments of the author are clear, crisp, full of common sense and pertinent. It is evident that Professor Lockhart gives us in this book a condensation of what he has learned and of what he gives to his students, along these lines, in the classroom. It is well that in this period of reviving interest in Bible study this book is given to the public. The last pages are devoted to suggestions as to the study of the Bible by books and the interpretation specifically of the Old Testament and the New Testament.

I have searched in vain for something about Jonah and the whale! One might almost infer what the Professor would say on this subject from what he says on Job, the song of songs and the sun standing still. On this incident I quote the following: "Many passages are to be understood in the light of the prevailing opinions when and where the author lived. Thus the command to the sun to 'stand still' and the statement, 'the sun stayed in the midst of heaven,' were based on the opinion at the time that the sun's movements produced the changes of day and night. If this is to be regarded as a historical and not a poetical account, the phenomenon was probably not due to a suspension of the sun's movements, but to an increased refraction of light by which the sun remained apparently above the horizon after sunset. The statement, 'the sun stayed in the midst of heaven,' took its form from the appearance and current opinion. The true nature of the case may not have been revealed to the writer."

Is Professor Lockhart a "higher critic"? Read his book and decide this question for yourself! Do you think you would recognize this peculiar specimen if you were to meet him in person or in a book? What is Professor Lockhart's position on the subject of biblical inspiration? The remark about the "form" of biblical statements having been taken "from the appearance and current opinion" frightens you—does it? Yes, and the "axiom" that "every writer is influenced by his environment." Do you doubt the correctness of this statement? If you desire to know the position of the author of "Principles of Interpretation" on the subject of biblical inspiration, or the inspiration of the writers of the Old and New Testaments, obtain a copy of the book and not only read but study it. Does he believe in the "inerrancy" of our Bible—the Bible as we have it? An "Axiom" quoted above is: "Any writing is liable to modification in copying, translating and the gradual change of a living tongue." This statement has the force of an "Axiom," has it not? If you cannot infer from this the position of the author on the "inerrancy" of Holy Scripture, again obtain a copy of his book and study it. Believe me, it is a good book.

"The Bibliotheca Sacra" has been, in my estimation, the standard quarterly review of the United States for a great many years, and this is still my conviction. I know of no similar publication equal to it. It almost grieved me, therefore, to see three or four pictures in the April number. The faces of the men given in this issue of the oldest of the American theological quarterlies are of men distinguished; but I cannot resist the impression that this new departure is a lowering of the standard slightly. I am so glad that Clinton Lockhart did not give us his picture in "Principles of Interpretation"!

Have you read "The Age of Faith," by Dr. Amory H. Bradford? This is not "An Age of Doubt," it is an age of faith. This is Dr. Bradford's contention, and he is correct. His book was exceedingly helpful to me and I believe the reading of it will do you good.

The fact is, ours is almost an age of credulity! Think of the vagaries, the shams, the humbugs, theological, religious (?), political and commercial, with which the people, multitudes of them, have been carried away within a comparatively few years. Spiritualism, during your lifetime and mine, has numbered its devotees by the million. It has not been so long a time since Mormonism arose. Its adherents are counted by the hundred thousand. The reading of the official history of "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," recently published, shows that Mormonism was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity. It thrives today on the credulity of the people. But little inferior to Mormonism, as a fraud and humbug, is Christian Science. There is, of course, a bit of truth underlying what is called Christian Science; but the founder of this—what shall I call it?—Mary Baker G. Eddy is not one whit behind Joe Smith in the fradulent character of the movement with which her name is identified. John Alexander Dowie, of Chicago, belongs to the same class. The career of Schlatter, an ignorant German shoe cobbler from Brooklyn, in Denver a few years ago, should be named in this connection. Thousands and tens of thousands of people in Denver and from all this Rocky Mountain region, came to Schlatter to be healed by his touch. I dare not go any farther in my enumeration of religious frauds and humbugs—I might tread on some one's toes.

The same credulity is seen in business. Do you recall any real estate booms in recent years? To name them would touch a sore place in the anatomy of some of the readers of the Christian-Evangelist. We are heading in the same direction again in some places. Look out!

One good result of the boom on the Pacific coast, a few years ago, is a bright book entitled, "Millionaires of a Day." The author's name, I think, is Van Dyke. It beats "David Harum," "Eben Holden" and "To Have and to Hold," in the way of interest, and it is said by those who were on the ground and saw the boom come and go that it is true to the life of that time.

Have you forgotten "the Franklin Syndicate" of Brooklyn, some months ago, in which a man named Miller was conspicuous? He and his "Syndicate" damned capitalists and told the dear people that if they would send their money to him he would pay them ten per cent. per week, 520 per cent. per year, and gullible men and women sent their money to this friend of the dear people, by the thousand. When the United States Government put its hand on Miller it caught from thirty to forty thousand dollars on their way to his capacious pockets.

This is not an age of doubt; it is an age of faith. In some of its manifestations it may be characterized by the word credulity.

Concerning political vagaries and humbugs I dare not now say what is in my mind. In a few years it will be safe to do so; but not now.

Do not fail to read "The Age of Faith." It will do you good.

Letter From The Philippines

By LESLIE N. COLLINS,

Comp. B, 6th U. S. Infantry.

I have just returned from a Filipino funeral. I thought an account of how funerals are conducted in this strange country might prove interesting to you. They treat the dead very differently here from what they do in the United States. The funeral that I attended was held in the Catholic church. They are always held in the church provided the stricken family have a few ready "pesos" to pay the "padre." The Roman Catholic rule here is very severe touching all such matters. To a liberal-minded American it seems little short of downright usurpation and tyranny, if not systematic robbery. Catholicism here in the Philippines is nothing like it is in the United States. It is probably here just what it would be in the United States if it had the same power there it has here, for in every country where it is the dominant religion the same usurpation, tyranny and extortions are practiced. It is not to be wondered at that the intelligent Filipinos hate with an inveterate hatred the domineering, usurping and scoundrelly friars, who make it their business to systematically rob these weak-minded and superstitious people. It is an outrage, and our government should put a stop to it. Here the poor deluded natives bow down to the Virgin Mary, not as a beautiful character who once lived here upon the earth, and was the mother of our Lord, but rather as a heathen falls before his idol. The God they really worship is the "padre." To their untutored mind, he is the great I am, and it is astonishing the liberty he takes, the power he commands, and the influence he exerts over their weak minds, so full of superstition. He bleeds their pocketbooks like the shrewd Mormon elder extorts fees. They demand a fee for everything and on every occasion. When a child is born the doting parents are compelled to pay tribute to his holiness (?) even though the attending physician must go unpaid. When a Filipino sees fit to take unto himself a wife he must "tip" the "padre," not, however, as the minister of the gospel in our country is paid for his services, but in a very different way, and for no other reason than that the "padre" must at all times and on all occasions be remunerated.

If a Filipino dies the family must again drop dollars into the "padre's" pocket, and that too in proportion to their wealth. It costs the rich more to die here than it does the poor. And if they neglect or refuse to attend to this matter, they are denied a proper burial, and the "padre" tells the family that the soul of the deceased will go to the bad place. Down with such an outrage in the name of religion! Catholicism is one of the blighting, withering, damning curses of these fair islands. Perhaps it would be more proper to say perverted and maladministered Catholicism is the curse of this country. This trading on the souls and bodies of men and women, this making merchandise of the ceremonies of religion for the purpose of gain, is an outrage in the name of religion that should be stopped immediately. When a Filipino dies friends of the family or of the deceased place the body in a plain wooden box, the fashion of which is sometimes like the old style coffins of a hundred years ago. Six pall bearers carry the lifeless burden to the door of the church. Should the sorrowing family or friends be "shy" of "pesos" with which to pay the "padre," the body is not carried into the church at all, but immediately taken to the dead room, where a few short prayers are offered for the dead, very few, and very short at that. If it is an only son or a beloved daughter, or a loving mother, or a tender, indulgent father, it is all the same. The mourners seldom attend the obsequies at the church or dead room. They remain at home and wail and weep in true Oriental fashion. This wailing for the dead seems to have been borrowed from the Chinese.

To an American it seems like a mere prefunctory performance, a heartless and insincere affectation devoid of any real sorrow or genuine grief. God forgive me if I judge these simple-minded natives wrongfully; but I can't help believing that a good deal of their sorrow is feigned or artificial, and their copious tears seem to me to fall as crocodile tears. At least this is the way it impresses me. I have lived all of my life in God's country, in a land of civilization and under the instructions of a pure religion, and I have noticed that the deepest sorrow is always silent. Deep rivers make no noise as they flow on in their channels, but the rippling, babbling brook goes chattering over its shallow, pebbly bed with a confusion of sounds. After the prayer at the church, the body is carried by the six pall bearers to the native cemetery where, if the family or friends can pay vault or tomb rent, the body is placed within a vault or tomb, and the door securely fastened, the key being kept by the "padre"; but if the family are poor and have no money to pay for the rent of a vault or tomb, the body is taken out of the coffin and tumbled carelessly into a grave and buried in loose earth, to molder back to dust. Such is a Catholic burial in the Philippines. In the name of God this inhuman practice should be stopped by the United States authority. It is an insult to the dead and an outrage to the living. If the body is buried in a vault, as soon as the family or friends of the deceased cease to pay rent the body is taken out of the vault by order of his holiness, (?) the "padre," and carelessly dumped on to the bone-pile. The bone-pile is a ghastly sight, and they are found in every burial place in the Philippines. I have a little Filipino skull which was taken from one of these bone-piles, which I purpose to keep as a relic, and when I get home I shall exhibit it as proof of the truthfulness of the statements contained in this letter. When I write you again I will tell you of the funerals and burials of the rich and aristocratic. This is a specimen of the civilization and religion of the Philippines. But I prophesy that a great change for the better in the commercial, social, and religions condition of these islands is near at hand. The mightiest and most progressive nation on the earth is in power here now, and that means the early emancipation of this people from the thralldom of priest-craft and the tyranny of superstition. May God hasten the day when the scales shall fall from the eyes of this blinded people and they shall awaken to the light and liberty of a free government and an advanced civilization.

New York Letter.

By S. T. Willis.

Prince Kropotkin, the celebrated Russian reformer, has been giving a number of lectures in New York, one of which, delivered before a great audience at the Grand Central Palace a few days ago, discussed the question of "Anarchism: Its Philosophy and Ideal." The Prince claimed that the philosophy of the twentieth century would be that of anarchism, and that the tendency of the great movements of this century would differ radically from those in the early part of the last one hundred years.

Then all great movements looked toward the increase of the power of state; but now the tendency of the times is divided; one great current moves on toward the enthronement of the individual with plutocratic power, the other is seen in the struggling of the masses of men for their right to live. We have on all sides beautiful cities, magnificent palaces and specimens of architecture created through the labor of the masses, yet they have no part in the enjoyment of these things. One hundred years ago a lifetime was needed for the amassing of a fortune moderate in proportion, but now men may become immensely rich in a few years. By what right, said he, does any man presume to say that he owns this line of railway, and that manufacturing industry? Do not the laboring clases make these properties—a large portion of their values? What would they be worth without the skill and the muscle of the sons of toil? The very men who make the larger part of the values of these properties are oppressed and ground down by the men to whom the state has granted titles of ownership. He then drew a vivid picture of the palaces and the royal families of Europe, and in contrast, the "mud huts" of the masses which, he declared, were not fit for dogs to live in. Of course there are two sides to this great question of the hour and both should be dispassionately studied by all classes of men. Nothing will so help in the solution of these problems as the principles of righteousness laid down in the gospel of Christ. Let us make more of Christian Sociology.

The question of child training, though very old, is ever new, and a wise discussion of it is always in order. "Let the child alone" was the burden of a bright and suggestive paper read a few days ago by Mrs. W. D. Munson before the Froebel Society of Brooklyn. She said the incessant petting and attention by mothers cultivate caprice in the infant which if let alone would spend happy hours lying on its back kicking strength into its muscles and thinking its own thoughts. Then as soon as it begins to walk the system of repression begins. She said the parent should not always be saying, Don't! Don't! Don't! to the child. Direct the little one's energies and help it to do those things which its God-given nature impels. Let its wonderful sayings and doings alone too. Constantly telling of the child's amusing and winning ways is the best way to develop that self-consciousness whose absence is the child's greatest charm and virtue. She also insisted upon the unwisdom of arousing the child's curiosity by bringing it into touch with evil things. Boys, she said, should not be taken to prisons and through the slums and haunts of vice in order to warn them against sin and its consequences, for such a course will likely arouse a curiosity that is unhealthy, and a morbid interest in these evil things. But, on the other hand, fill the child's mind and heart with all the good and pure and wholesome things possible, and he will find no room for depraved ideas. This advice is not only Froebelian but it is also in accord with common sense and with the wisdom of God's word—"Shun the very appearance of evil."

The question of "Productive Churches" is being discussed with lively interest by many prominent ministers and others in the metropolitan district just now. One of New York's great dailies started the agitation of the question by writing a vigorous editorial in which the suggestion was made that churches should so construct their buildings as to make them produce handsome revenues through the week. This could be done by building a large auditorium on the street floor, and above construct first class apartments to be reached by means of an elevator. The rents would help very largely in the payment of the expenses of the church. Dr. McArthur has indorsed the plan and says he has advocated virtually the same thing in the Baptist city mission board. It will help solve the financial problem of the down-town church, it will also materially assist the small, poor up-town church to build and carry its mortgage. Dr. Edward Judson of the Judson Memorial Baptist Church on Washington Square is doing practically this same thing. That church has a large apartment house known as "The Judson" which is a part of the church building and the income from which is a great help in sustaining the work of the church. He says the plan has worked well as operated by them. Dr. Silverman of the Temple Emanu-El (Jewish) advocated the building of school rooms, libraries, etc., above the auditorium of the church, to be reached by means of an elevator. Dr. Parkhurst (Presbyterian) and Dr. Morgan Dix (Episcopal) express themselves as opposed to the idea. Dr. Parkhurst thinks such a blending of the secular and religious in the house of worship will tend to destroy the religious sentiment which is necessary, and which should be kept sacred and inviolate. He says if religion is kept alive it must have its consecrated places set apart from all civil and secular purposes, for a combining or a blending of the world and the church means the destruction of the church. Dr. Dix, of Old Trinity, says a church building could not be consecrated if much or any of it were devoted to secular uses. Though Trinity Church is a great landlord, yet it keeps a distinction between its property devoted to religious purposes and that used for business. But the idea is growing in New York that it is wise to endow many churches in order to assure their continued existence. The Madison Square Presbyterian Church has recently come into the possession of a $200,000 endowment fund, and the Madison Avenue Presbyterian has just sold its present site for $375,000 and will move up-town, build anew, and endow itself. Many good people think that the Church of Christ should not be endowed except with power from on high—that the gospel should win its way in each generation and not have to rely upon the gifts of the preceding generations for support.

The Methodist Conferences in the New York District have developed some interesting questions, one of which is of great interest generally. It is this, shall Christian Scientists be recognized? At the N. Y. East Conference, the Rev. S. E. Simonsen, of the Norwegian Bethelship, Brooklyn, presented a request that he be allowed to withdraw from the M. E. Church and that his credentials be returned to him. Much discussion followed, some members claiming that if his credentials were returned it would be a practical recognition of the Christian Scientists. A vote was finally taken by which they accepted his resignation but refused him his credentials. Dr. J. M. Buckley, hearing of this, rode all night to reach the conference in time to discuss the question and if possible reverse the decision. He had the question reopened, the rules suspended that he might speak and then proceeded to discuss the question vigorously. After censuring the presiding elder for allowing Mr. Simonsen to continue in his pulpit after he had embraced the belief of the Christian Scientists, Dr. Buckley then said the action of the conference had practically endorsed the position of the Christian Scientists, and had made Mr. Simonsen even more dangerous than he would be without it. Dr. Buckley said that Christian Science denies every doctrine, including morality, that the Methodist Church stands for; and by the conference endorsing his character and his career made Mr. Simonsen more valuable to this new propaganda than he could possibly be, were it not for this endorsement. After making three ringing speeches Dr. Buckley prevailed upon the conference to rescind its vote for endorsement by 170 to 5. Thus Christian Science was condemned by a strong vote, which will be felt no doubt throughout the country.

The new church building being erected by the Newark Church of the Disciples, will be dedicated to Christ on Lord's Day afternoon, May 5, if the present plans can be carried out. That vigorous congregation of twenty-five is doing excellent service. They have raised $1,200 among themselves and hope to dedicate the chapel on that day free of debt. The chapel, exclusive of furniture, will cost about $1,700. Other congregations should help them so that they may go into their modest, neat little chapel without any debt on their house. It is a promising work in the midst of a growing section of a great city. Money put into the cause in Newark will be wisely spent.

For Indigestion
Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. Gregory Doyle, Syracuse, N. Y., says: "I have frequently prescribed it in cases of indigestion and nervous prostration, and find the result so satisfactory that I shall continue it."

Ecclesiasticism and Missions.

By A. M. Chamberlain.

We have been strenuous in opposing "ecclesiasticism." We have been earnest champions of personal salvation by way of felt personal responsibility. Our appeal to the court of reason has not been vain. Unquestionably, some judgment has been rendered in our favor. We have won adherents to "extreme Protestantism." Our numbers show phenomenal increase. Reasonably may the world demand that a movement which meets such response shall be aggressive in heralding its truth, in conferring its blessings. Yet, the firmest friend of "return to apostolic practice and precedent" cannot but grieve over the lack of real missionary spirit in the rank and file of church membership. Perhaps we view the activities of the early church through the glamour of persecution and martyrdom. It may be that the distance has its inevitable enchantment. None the less is our conception of enthusiastic devotion a laudable ideal. Though it be true that Paul and Apollos and Cephas and Aquila and Priscilla, Timothy, Titus and Onesiphorus are exceptions in the records of that early age, not according to the rule of that day's practice, still are we right in looking to them as types of "Apostolic Christianity." Every return to the past as inspiration for the future must be an ideal return or it is bondage unto death. We are right to lose sight of the mediocrities, the apostasies, the treacheries, and to fix vision on loyalty, devotion and perseverance. It is right to picture to ourselves a glorious age, a united church, its units thrilling with unselfish zeal for the world's redemption, enthusiastic in effort to stifle sin and to save sinners, but will it do harm if we acknowledge humbly that to this goal we have not attained?

One of the most efficient missionary organizations which the world has ever seen has been the Society of Jesus. It is a rigid ecclesiasticism, nay, an ecclesiasticism within an ecclesiasticism. The point to be noted is that, to the extent of its ideals, it succeeded. It is well enough to argue that its ideals were vicious, that it is infinitely better to seek the personal enlistment in righteousness of the "free spirit," but our argument avails little if the "free spirit" be not really enlisted, if, instead of the open ecclesiasticism of the Jesuit body we are content with a quasi-ecclesiasticism as far as missionary zeal and activity are concerned.

The fact must be patent to the observant mind that we have not yet grown to be a missionary people. Our phenomenal increase is to be credited to the providence of God and the devotion of a few, rather than to the inspired zeal of the great army. We conduct missions but we have not learned to feel missions. Secretaries plead, pastors exhort, some of them, and people give, but largely under sense of compulsion. This is bond-servitude indeed, labor performed under the lash. To what extent we are given thereto, the pastors of our churches know, if the rank and file of membership do not. A missionary activity and interest which is manifest only in response to strenuous appeal from above is not the ideal kind. The condition creates its "ecclesiasticism," a limited ecclesiasticism, it may be claimed and one fraught with no particular danger, but still, far from the highest type of Christian life. The secretaries urge the pastors and the pastors urge the membership and finally one-fourth of the membership in one-third of the churches feebly respond with reluctant offerings. There is surely little that is "Apostolic" in this. It is "ecclesiasticism" indeed; yea, the ecclesiasticism of the spirit by which prophets call recreant peoples to duty. Duty—sense of duty—that is the thing lacking.

When the appeal goes out on the first of May it should come simply as a reminder to souls inspired with a missionary patriotism. May God haste the day. A missionary patriotism—and why not? What a country is ours! What promise of glorious destiny! But on conditions, is it not so? On condition that it lead the world in things spiritual as well as in things material; that it hold, enlarging within it, the leaven of righteousness, the salt that saves. On condition that it find the forgotten secret of a united and aggressive church, united in name and in spirit, aggressive, not in championing philosophic fancy or details of creed and ritual, but in propagating righteousness, in succoring the oppressed, in proclaiming the present salvation that is in the life of Christ Jesus.

And consider: without such force somewhere the world will not become subject to the Master. Let us not deceive ourselves. The measure of our national righteousness is not sufficient for the world's needs. The proclamation of the gospel in dark corners is weakened and made of small effect by the low ideals of life and the disorganized church at home. Here is our first duty. Nowhere else does Christian work—real Christian work—count for so much. America is to-day a possible symbol of world-conquering righteousness. A possible symbol, not an actual. Here is the potency of progress, of a world-ideal of life, but it is potency only. The promise of free development, of "return to Christ," of the building up of real righteousness, civic and individual, may all fall to the ground. And danger is within us, within US—not in the body politic—in US who wear Christ's name and claim to do his will. "If the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted?" In what degree selfishness stifles response to the call for help in saving America for Christ, in that degree are we found wanting as a people; in that degree is the nation's promise of glorious destiny eclipsed; in that degree is the redemption of the world deferred. This is God's call to YOU. Here you touch the great problem of world-redemption. It is the drum beat of destiny—God's bugle call to battle. To your tents, O Israel! Let the zeal of the kingdom replace the time-service of "ecclesiasticism." Alliance, O.

What Most Interests Me Now

By J. S. LAMAR

VIII. The Serpent in The Garden.

In the third chapter of Genesis we have the story of the serpent and his conversation with Mother Eve. It is a beautiful story—admirable in form and exquisite in simplicity. Some people are disposed to ridicule and repudiate it. But it should be remembered in this connection that some people are very shallow. Besides, they may have special reasons for wanting to get rid of it and for discrediting the Holy Book in which it occurs. For myself, I believe it. I believe it was divinely inspired; that it shows an insight into human nature—a perfect knowledge of the springs of human conduct—that could have come from no other source but the All-wise Maker of man. I am glad, therefore, that a story which has lived through the ages, which has been read with wondering interest and pleasure by the children of all historic time, and with profound meditation and profit by the wisest, loftiest, holiest men—is not likely to be put out of the Book, nor out of the respect and confidence of mankind, by the flippant sneers of self-sufficing, superficial and arrogant skeptics.

But they say, forsooth, it is impossible to believe that snake actually talked and maintained an argument with the woman! I think it very probable that they are right: certainly I do not believe it myself. And yet I would not discredit nor alter a line nor a word of that story. I believe that both in form and substance, just as it is recorded, it is the very best possible—a divine formulation of deepest truth. In the same way the destructive critics may satisfy themselves, and perhaps I shall not disagree with them, that there was no such person as the Good Samaritan, and no such occurrence as that reported in the tenth chapter of Luke. True, it is historical in form and has verisimilitude in circumstance; but then there are considerations which make it improbable as an actual fact. But what boots it? In any case it is the truth, admirably and beautifully expressed, and in a form most wisely and happily fitted to contain and to impart, to illuminate and to preserve, to transmit and to vivify, the most important and vital of all truth. No man who appreciates this highest truth will be disturbed by the question, whether the story that embodies and illustrates it is really or only quasi historical. In either case it is true—it is divinely true.

So we receive without hesitation that "gospel within the gospel"—the story of the Prodigal Son—with all its instruction, its encouragement and its comfort, while we rejoice at the brighter glory which it enables us to see in the face of Him whom we address as "Our Father which art in heaven"—and all this without knowing or caring whether its outward framework is fact or fancy.

Perhaps if we look below the surface of that Eden story we may find something more than a "talking snake"—something reasonable, credible and important. At any rate, I shall offer my humble contribution to this result by setting forth with perfect freedom and candor the view which I have been enabled to take of the whole subject.

In the first place, it is necessary for us to remember that man is constitutionally different from all other beings known or conceived of by us, whether in the heavens above or the earth beneath. In the one region we are given to understand that there are countless hosts of spirits—i. e., individual beings whose nature is pure spirit, and whose tendency, therefore, is Godward; in the other are innumerable animals—creatures made of earth, and with limitations that confine them to the earth—limitations which they can neither pass nor desire to pass; with earthly natures which find all their good in the earth and, consequently, their tendency is earthward. Now, man alone has this remarkable peculiarity: that he is the only creature so far as we know in the whole universe to whom both these natures were given—in whom they are both combined, or, so to say, interfused into one individual being. We may, as divinely taught, speak of them in terms of space, calling the spiritual the higher, and the animal the lower nature, but as I have said, these are qualitative and not special distinctions, for both are mysteriously and inexplicably united and commingled. Yet they are perfectly distinguishable in thought, while in some unaccountable way they touch and influence each other. These commonplaces are well known, and I am not giving them out as novelties, but only that the reader may recall them to his mind.

Now it must have been a problem of deepest interest to all created intelligences, what will be the practical result of this intimate conjunction and intermingling of two natures whose respective tendencies are not simply divergent but positively opposite and antagonistic?

It was so ordered that very soon the struggle began. In some way, we know not what, God had made known his will to the two newly-made creatures respecting the fruit of a certain tree in the garden: they must not eat of it, under penalty of death. Of course their spiritual nature freely and, as it were, instinctively acquiesced in this prohibition—there was no thought of disobeying it. The prohibitory law was spiritual—emanating from the divine Spirit; and hence their own spiritual natures, whose inherent tendency was Godward, would naturally and lovingly respond to it. But the animal, carnal part of their being, having the opposite tendency, was not subject to this spiritual law, neither indeed can it ever be—save as it is subjected by the spirit of man, with which alone it has any special community or any intimate vital relations. As a matter of course the conflict must come—the struggle must be over the observance or non-observance of this divine prohibition. And so right there, in full view of that forbidden fruit, the dreadful contest is precipitated. On the one side we see appetite, lust, illicit ambition, insinuating doubts as to the divine integrity and goodness; on the other, the well-remembered word and authority of God, weakly attempting for a little while to arrest the swelling tide of desire by mere argument. Thus by pausing, dallying, looking, the woman concedes it to be an open question—the gates of her otherwise impregnable Troy are unbarred—the mighty foe enters to conquer, to desolate and to destroy—and all is lost.

But does the reader realize that all this struggle is internal and out of sight? If so, it is enough. He sees, as I do, that the serpent is in the low, beastly, subtle, silent, winding, creeping, deceptive, guileful animal nature in man. He is in the garden of my heart and of yours. Let us beware of him. In the presence of any disagreeable duty or any forbidden gratification, he whispers within us the same plausible arguments, craftily insinuates the same doubts, and speaks the same guileful and deluding words. Verily the Eden occurrence was not exceptional, it was but typical of myriads of cases substantially like it.

I think that Paul must have understood the story very much as I have represented it. He speaks of the flesh lusting against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh, and of the two as being contrary the one to the other (Gal. 5:17); of "another law in my members warring against the law of my mind and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members" (Rom. 7:23). James also teaches that each man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own lust and enticed. My view in any event is not far removed from "the analogy of the faith." It is true that I may not have exhibited the "snake" quite as distinctly as the reader has possibly conceived it in his imagination. In some old illustrated Bibles he may have seen the snake wound around a tree with its head thrust forward, while the woman, attired in the prevailing fashion of her time, stands before him, and seems to be drinking in his words of eloquence! But perhaps what I have said may induce the reader to reperuse the story as written, and in that he will see no serpent. Eve saw none. She only heard him and spoke to him; and we may easily understand it as meaning inner voices, which in that invisible region are equivalent to conscious impressions, feelings or thoughts.

We should not be surprised to find this first story of human conduct—this introduction to all human history—told in symbolic and pictorial words. Written primarily for the Oriental mind—for serious, thoughtful, earnest men—to whom symbols and pictures were a sort of native language, or rather, a transparent glass, through which they could clearly see, as we cannot, into the depths of the invisible, into truths that were veiled in mystery, and into the hidden springs of the outward and phenomenal—no wonder, therefore, that this story has been admired and prized by the loftiest minds and the wisest hearts of the world—admired for its unadorned and simple beauty, and prized for its profound and important truth.

The Minister's Responsibility.

By A. B. Phillips.

The day set apart for the home offering approaches and brings with it a personal resposibility to every pastor. It is no longer a question of Bible texts, or a search for wise methods of co-operation. We now know the Father's will on this subject, and the machinery of this society has been tried and was not found wanting. It narrows down to a question of absolute duty on one side and imperative need on the other. The pastor holds the key to the situation. The success or failure of the collection may rest in a large degree with him. The results of the campaign will be measured from his enlarged vision, courage and industry, or his narrowness, indolence and cowardice. He stands as mediator between strong churches, able to give, and weak churches, worthy to receive. If he neglects the weak he will abuse the strong. If the pastor does not take the collection, who will? If he forgets the day, who can be expected to remember it? A great man used to say: "As the leader is so will the followers be." "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again," is a law of the spiritual kingdom. Those who are most liberal abroad are most prosperous at home. The preacher who puts missions in the background, puts his own salary in cold storage. Let the pastor, with love in his heart, declare the whole counsel of God and open the understanding of the people and they will open their purses. Those who are determined to save are compelled to lose. God's cause prospers only when the kingdom of heaven goes into the hands of a receiver.

Home Missions.

By R. Moffett.

Several years ago, when at Louisville, I saw on the river several old mud scows and one or two derricks, and a number of men who were dropping, one by one, large stones into the river. They seemed to be wasting precious time. Later I saw a few piers rising above the water, and some months later a strong and beautiful bridge spanning the river, over which were passing passenger coaches and long and heavy freight trains. Everybody praised the bridge and called it a beautiful and an enduring structure. And yet that bridge rests on invisible foundations, skillfully laid deep down in the river bed, without which the bridge would have been impossible. So, also, that which makes character and success possible in life is the deep-laid, and often the invisible and unlauded foundation. We rejoice in the success of foreign missions. Nothing calls forth more eloquent expressions of joy and praise than the power and success of the gospel of Christ in heathen lands. The raven changed to a dove, the lion to a lamb, the desert blossoming as a rose, the eyes of the blind made to see, the ears of the deaf made to hear, the tongue of the dumb made to sing. This is the prophetic vision which is being fulfilled in all the dark lands of the world. By the touching of but the hem of the Lord's garment the nations are being healed. But, humanly speaking, the foundation of all this success has been laid by home missionaries, who, many times at their own charges, and nearly always meagerly supported, have gone to the schoolhouses and to the humble church buildings of the common people and preached the gospel, made disciples, organized churches, and taught the children of God the "all things" commanded by the great king. From these churches have come the missionaries in foreign lands, and the offerings which sustain them there in their earnest and arduous labors. Wipe out the churches which have been planted by self-sacrificing missionary effort at home, and we would have no missionaries abroad. It follows that, if we would increase the number of missionaries abroad, we must multiply the sources of supply by increasing the number of churches and missionaries at home. Moreover, if we would establish institutions of learning and fit them to do the best work we must increase the number of people who take an interest in their invaluable work. In fact home missionary work is the foundation of the best success in everything that ministers to prosperity—temporal and spiritual—at home and abroad.

I am glad to note a growing interest and a corresponding liberality in this department of Christian work. We have little reason to complain in view of our history and the many other things necessarily claiming attention; but there is no good reason why the Disciples cannot multiply the offerings of last year by two. Our country is in an era of great temporal prosperity, and Christian people have been made partakers of it. Put it on the plane of gratitude, we ought to feel like making a large thank-offering. Put it on the plane of Christian stewardship, we ought to be faithful in accounting for the treasures the Lord has placed in our hands. Put it on the plane of loyalty to the king, we ought to seek first the kingdom of God. Put it on the plane of love, we ought to give the most precious treasures for his sake, who gave his precious life for us.

Cleveland, O.

Our Work in This Country.

By Wm. Bayard Craig.

The statistics of church growth show our people still far in the lead in the percentage of increase.

Do we grasp the meaning of this fact—that "Our Plea" is so adapted to this country, and this generation, that we are making the most rapid growth of any religious body among the people of the United States—the leaders of the world? If this fact does not stimulate us to our best endeavors, we are unworthy supporters of a plea so divinely powerful.

Our prominence in the matter of growth is certain to make us the focus of national interest. We will be scanned and studied as never before. We are not ready for national inspection with our chief co-operative undertaking—the work of the American Missionary Society—so far behind her opportunities. We cannot be expected to develop great enthusiasm in the foreign work while Judæa and Samaria are neglected. Who is to look after New Mexico, Arizona, Wyoming, the Dakotas, etc., with the Home Board crippled by smaller offerings than is meet for its great work? I plead for a condition of things that will be a prophecy and a promise of larger victories.

If the brotherhood will think for just one moment how great a work we have undertaken to do in Chicago, Buffalo, Galveston, San Francisco and such points, through the agency of the Home Board, they will immediately, by a rallying of the wise lovers of our movement, make ready for a big, generous May collection that will be the new day for the American Christian Missionary Society.

Des Moines, Ia.

Those with whom the feeling of religion is only occasional have it most when the awful or grand breaks out of the common; the meek who inherit the earth find the God of the whole world more evidently present, and in the commonest things. That which is best He gives most plentifully. Hence the great fullness of ordinary nature.—George MacDonald.

Current Literature.

The New Epoch For Faith, by George A. Gordon, minister of the Old South Church, Boston, is characterized by the vigor and breadth of thought which mark the previous works of this bold thinker. The occasion of the present volume was the invitation to deliver a course of lectures before the Lowell Institute in Boston, in the course of which about half the matter in the present volume was prepared. Beginning with the chapter on "Things Assumed" among which are "the being of God, the moral order of the world, the worth of history, the immortality of man and the social life beyond time," he makes these the background against which his present work is to be judged. The two greatest discoveries of the modern world, according to our author, are the "idea of a universe and that of a humanity," and he calls attention to the fact that both of these had a religious origin. Long before Newton had discovered the law of gravitation, Moses had said, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." This means a universe under the control of one supreme mind who is the Creator. In like manner we are indebted to the Bible and particularly to the New Testament for the true idea of man. The author holds that the brief account of man's fall in Genesis does not sufficiently account for the condition of the world and the slow progress humanity has made from a lower to a higher life. In his view this explanation is to be found only in the fact that man has come up from the lower orders of life, and has made his way slowly out of the animal into the spiritual life, and that it is the presence in man of the animal nature that holds him back in the race of life.

It is when our author comes to deal with the problem of sin that he evinces his chief weakness as a writer on religious themes. This was disclosed in a former volume. He gives it up as an insoluble problem, how sin got into the world. Apparently Dr. Gordon fails to understand the nature of the human will with which God endowed man when he made him in his own image. That sin is the abuse of moral freedom, growing out of this fact, he does not apprehend, or at least he is unable to harmonize it with the ethical perfection of God. He accepts the fact of sin and the fact of God's perfection and leaves the two facts unharmonized. In spite of this fault, however, there is much in the book that is stimulating to faith and that reveals spiritual insight into the problems of our time. He takes an optimistic view of human progress and believes that, while the nineteenth century has been occupied largely with increase in the knowledge of the material world, to the detriment of Christian progress, the twentieth century will witness the Christian use of the knowledge accumulated in the previous centuries and will make wonderful strides forward.

He does not fail to pay his respects to Calvinism, between which and atheism he sees little to choose. The chapter on "The Return to Faith" shows how the revolt against naturalism and agnosticism has already begun, and that higher criticism and evolution, once regarded as enemies, have been subjugated and made the servants of Christian faith. One would hardly be expected to endorse all the author says, but he is a dull reader who will not find much in the volume to quicken his thought and strengthen his faith. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

Among the writers of literary reminiscences, James T. Fields occupies a unique position. He is the bookseller and publisher who made of his trade not only the means of getting money, but an instrument of culture and a stepping-stone to an intimate friendship with the great writers of the century. Col. Higginson's reminiscences are those of a man who was himself a candidate for literary honors and Mr. Howells' "Retrospect of American Authorship" paints the picture for the most part from the point of view of a younger contemporary, but Mr. Fields writes as one who, while not of the guild of authors, yet had every facility for knowing them. What a privilege it must have been to the writers who flourished when the old Corner Book Store was in its prime to have such a kindly and appreciative spirit as the mediating priest between their genius and the patronage of the fickle public.

His book, Yesterdays with Authors, is too genial and conversational to be open to criticism. Its chapters deal respectively with Thackeray, Hawthorne, Dickens, Wordsworth, Miss Mitford and Barry Cornwall. Thackeray is depicted as an effervescent individual who, when he learned that the seats were all sold for his first American lecture, was so frankly delighted that he celebrated the event by riding from his hotel to the hall with his legs dangling out of the carriage window—being presumably quite sober at the time. Dickens was a man of like temperament, though somewhat less extravagant in his exhibitions of it. Wordsworth, in his old age, received young Fields at his home at Rydal Mount not as a publisher but as a friendly visitor. And Hawthorne, usually depicted as a grave and melancholy man, seems to have been thoroughly affable and approachable to Fields. One suspects that this cordial geniality which the old publisher found in all his friends must have been in large part a reflection from his own disposition. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

In his Rulers of the South, F. Marion Crawford has followed out substantially the same scheme which he employed to such noticeably good advantage in "Ave Roma Immortalis." One might call it, for lack of a better classification, descriptive history. It is narrative for the most part, but narrative always set off by a more elaborately painted background of geographical and topographical description than one finds in any ordinary history.

The title of the volume is indescriptive, for it deals with a very limited portion of southern Europe, namely, Sicily, Malta and the toe of the Italian boot. Moreover it deals not alone with the rulers but with the peoples of these lands. The change of rulers, however, has had a very intimate connection with the progress of civilization, in Sicily for example, which had been under the rule successively of Phoenicians, Greeks, Romans, Byzantines, Arabs, Normans, Germans, French and Spanish before it became a part of the united kingdom of Italy. In reviewing Mr. Crawford's "Via Crucis" we remarked that if he could ever write a history of the Middle Ages, it would be better worth reading than many of the works of the professed historians. Perhaps this is as near as he will ever come to the performance of that task and it ought to meet with favor at the hands of that large circle of readers who do not care to tackle pure history yet want something more robust than the historical novel. (Macmillan Co., 2 Vols.)

It is a charming, as well as instructive, little essay which Mr. Brander Matthews has written on The Philosophy of the Short Story. Perhaps it is wise and appropriate to treat the short story in a short book and the author certainly succeeds in saying a great many things in a few small pages. But the subject is not a small one. The predominance of the short story in periodical literature is one of the overwhelming facts of our present literary environment. It is well to have clearly pointed out the fact that the short story is not a condensed novel, or a sketch or an outline, that it is not anything hasty or easy or undeveloped, but that it is a distinct type of literature with a place of its own and a type which cannot be brought to perfection with less ability or diligence than is required for the writing of a 500 page novel. Short story competitions have become so common and the competitors in them so numerous, that it is quite clear that the idea is popularly cherished that a short story is something which any one can write in an idle hour. It would be much to the advantage of these competitors for literary honor through the short story if they would study this treatise by Mr. Matthews, and it would be a boon to those whose duty it is to read the stories. We may some time have a short story prize contest ourselves and we cherish the hope that those who participate will study the short story either in this book or in some other which covers the same ground before they attempt to write one.

Chew Food.

Chewing Preserves the Teeth and helps Digestion.

The finest specimens of teeth are seen in animals and human beings who chew the food thoroughly.

Dentists agree that teeth must be used to properly preserve them and therefore they urge people to chew their food thoroughly, but the nervous, hurried manner of eating is altogether too common among people and when fed on soft mushes they are liable to swallow the food without chewing.

Dyspepsia and bad teeth are the result if this practice is continued. True, one can eat soft food without detriment if the necessity of chewing is remembered. Grape-Nuts food is so crisp and brittle and withal so pleasant to the taste that the user can not forget to chew and thus the teeth get the necessary use and the glands of the gums are made to give the juices that nature intends shall be mixed with the food before it enters the stomach. A New York doctor says many New Yorkers put a little sugar on oatmeal and then cover with Grape-Nuts, and this method compels the chewing necessary to digest the oatmeal.

Grape-Nuts food is pre-digested and also helps in digestion of other food. The doctor's plan might do for a variety, but Grape-Nuts and cream alone are considered ideal by hundreds of thousands of brainy people.

There are other reasons why those who eat Grape-Nuts look nourished and well fed. The food is made of parts of the field grains which nature makes use of in rebuilding brain and nerve centers. Proof will follow use.

Our Budget.

—The duty of the hour always has precedence over all other duties.

—The duty of the hour at present is preparation for the home mission offering.

—Let us work while it is called spring, for the summer cometh when church members take to the mountains and the sea-side.

—Let us see to it that education keeps pace with evangelization. What doth it profit us to make converts unless we train them in the knowledge of the Lord and in methods of Christian work?

—Christianity demands to-day, more than ever before, trained minds as well as renewed hearts. It must lay under contribution science, art, literature and all the knowledges of the world, to carry forward its conquests to universal victory.

—Never were men of wealth facing the problem of the wisest distribution of their wealth so seriously as they are to-day. How best to invest it so as to help their fellowmen to help themselves is the great question. It is not surprising that so many of them are turning their wealth into educational channels, believing that to be the best way to stimulate men to self-help and to the helping of others.

—Nothing is more beautiful than the growing spirit of fraternity among Christian people of different religious bodies who are being drawn closer together continually by the cohesive power of Christian love and by the growing consciousness of the world's need of Christian co-operation. This spirit of fraternity must precede, and form an integral part of, any union that meets the demands of New Testament teaching or of the world's needs.

—The Christian Ministers' Meeting on last Monday was addressed by E. E. Barclay, superintendent of the Anti-saloon League of this district. The four departments of the work he described to be agitation, legislation, law enforcement and financial. The work is omnipartisan and interdenominational. Mr. Barclay pointed out the good work that has been accomplished elsewhere and is now being done in this city. Mr. Seibert, the present excise commissioner, is doing what he can to close up the wine-rooms, of which many have already been closed, and to revoke the license of such saloons as violate the law. He asks the hearty co-operation of the ministers and their congregations with the Anti-saloon League and all officers who are seeking to enforce the law. A committee was appointed to investigate the work of the excise commissioner and to report same to the next meeting.

—The Quincy Herald of the 12th inst., referring to the close of the meeting by H. A. Northcutt in that city, says that it has been "the most successful series of meetings that the Christian Church has had for a period of fifteen years. He wastes no time in discussing intricate theological problems or quibbling over denominational differences, but is a humble and conscientious Christian who has spent four weeks in our city urging his hearers to espouse the cause of the meek and lowly Nazarene, and 96 persons have responded to his appeals. . . . These meetings have resulted in the infusion of new life into the Christian Church. A large number of young men and young women have been drawn into the active work of the church, and with them they bring energy and ambition as well as an outside influence that cannot be measured, besides the former membership has been aroused to activity. The organization worshiping at 9th and Broadway, as well as its offspring, the Christian Union chapel, starts out with bright hopes for a new era of progress and enlarged possibilities for good works in the religious sphere." This is a merited as well as an accurate description of the kind of work done by Brother Northcutt. We congratulate the church and community on this splendid triumph in religious work.

—S. J. Vance, of Carthage, Mo., would like to correspond with some church needing his services as pastor. He wishes to locate in a town where there are good schools. Has had ten years' experience as pastor of the city churches.

—The Christian Endeavor local union at Hutchinson, Kan., organized a law-enforcement movement recently and has elected a non-partisan Christian citizenship ticket, defeating both the old parties. There is a more excellent way of smashing the saloon in Kansas, and this is it.

—Dr. B. B. Tyler has been in New York City attending the meeting of the International Lesson Committee. His work with the South Broadway Church in Denver, we learn from outside sources, is proving remarkably successful. The attendance is large and the church is making excellent headway in cutting down its indebtedness.

—The comparative statement of receipts of the Home Missionary Society for March, 1900 and 1901 shows a decrease in the number of churches, aid societies and individuals contributing, but an increase of $6,925.94 in the total amount contributed. The gain is due chiefly to the gift of a permanent fund of $5,000 and to a large increase in the amount of bequests.

—Bro. N. Montgomery, of Grandview, Tex., has an admirably practical turn of mind. He writes: "After reading the report of the Congress at Lexington, I am more interested than ever in building up and fully sustaining not only a Bible Chair at our state universities, but a well-equipped Bible College with a faculty of broad-minded men with liberal views. Push the endowment of the Bible College of Missouri."

—The convention of the Southeast Iowa District will be held at Sigourney, Ia., April 29 to May 2. We regret that space does not permit the publication of the entire program, which is a long and attractive one. A special feature is the large number of brief addresses, which will be delivered by some of the strongest men in that district. Among the well-known names on the program we notice those of J. P. McKnight, F. L. Moffett, C. C. Davis, C. F. Sanderson, N. G. Brown and G. L. Brokaw, and these are but a few among many which might be mentioned with equal appropriateness.

—In speaking of the work of Prof. C. E. Millard, the singer, who uses the stereopticon to present pictures conveying the thoughts and sentiments which he expresses also in song, E. A. Cantrell says: "One thing I have observed, our Episcopal and Catholic friends, who make more of the æsthetic element of religion than other religious bodies do, attend largely and make up an appreciative audience. As a soloist and leader of song Prof. Millard has few equals, but the unique feature of his work is the employment of the beautiful to emphasize the good and the true."

—A Southern Student Conference, representing the college Y. M. C. A.'s of the south, will be held in Asheville, N. C., June 21-30. It will be similar to the conferences held annually at Northfield, Mass., Lake Geneva, Wis., and Pacific Grove, Cal., for the students adjacent to those places. Its purpose will be the discussion of missionary interests, Bible study and Christian work and the development of the devotional spirit, all with reference to the special needs and aptitudes of college students. The mornings will be devoted to work and the afternoons to recreation. It is expected that every college in the south will be represented. For further information address Mr. H. P. Anderson, Asheville, N. C.

—L. S. Cupp, pastor of the church at Huntsville, Mo., preached for the Compton Heights congregation in this city on Lord's day, the 14th, and attended our ministerial meeting in the morning. The church at Huntsville would do well to fasten their hold on their preacher or they are liable to lose him.

—Ashley S. Johnson, President of the School of Evangelists, Kimberlin Heights, Tenn., announces that he will send one dozen copies of his book, "The Great Controversy," to any address for $1. Mr. Johnson says that 80,000 copies of the book have been printed and that it has brought the School of the Evangelists $17,000.

—The movement for the organization of a new congregation at Springfield, Ill., has now taken definite form. On April 14, J. E. Lynn, pastor of the present church, called for subscriptions for the purchase of a lot and the erection of a building for a new church in the west end of the city. In response to this appeal $11,000 was pledged and a lot will be bought at once and a building committee appointed. The entire congregation is enthusiastic over this new movement. Brother Lynn, who had previously expected to close his work at Springfield May 1, has now agreed to remain. This is an admirable illustration of the way new congregations in a city should be started—with the hearty approval and financial support of the old congregations, and especially without strife or jealousy.

—To dispose of a persistent rumor that he has resigned the presidency of Hiram College, Pres. Zollars makes the following statement: "At a meeting of the board of trustees of Hiram College in March, a leave of absence was granted to me for one year to give me some needed rest and to enable me to pursue certain special lines of study. I am located at present in Evanston, a suburb of Chicago, preaching for the little church on Lord's day and pursuing my work in Northwestern University. I am studying psychology by the laboratory method, philosophy of religion, psychology of religion and sociology. I am expecting to do some work with Prof. Graham Taylor in Sociology in the Chicago Commons and will probably do some summer work at the University of Chicago. My work at Hiram is being temporarily provided for and I shall return at the end of my vacation, I trust, with renewed vigor and strength. There is no thought of my giving up the presidency of Hiram College." President Zollars can rest assured that if such a thought is not in his mind, it is certainly not in the mind of any one else. His retirement from that post would be a calamity to us all.

—The Ministerial Institute of the state of Kansas has just closed the most successful institute ever held in its history, at Herington, Kan. The attendance was large from abroad, and the local attendance crowded the houses in which the institute met. Two changes were made in order to secure a house large enough for the sessions. The papers read and addresses delivered by the Kansas ministers ranked among the best. All were on living, practical issues and created more than ordinary interest. The discussions were hearty and general, and showed a high degree of intelligence. The chief feature on the program was six lectures delivered by Prof. Herbert L. Willett, of Chicago. The Kansas ministers, and in fact the whole town, were delighted with the work of Bro. Willett. He generally spoke from one hour to one hour and a half, holding the closest attention. He is always pleasant in his delivery and his lectures are highly instructive. He covered an immense amount of ground, and of course those present were correspondingly benefited by these lectures. We must, however, leave a full report to another's pen, who promised to give us a full report.—G. A. H.

—Receipts for foreign missions for six days ending April 12 were $4,694.79, a gain of $276.73 over the corresponding time in 1900.

—The Bible-school at Holden, Mo., where H. F. Burns is pastor, made an Easter offering of $18 for the Orphans' Home.

—J. M. Bovee is located permanently at his old home at Mozier, Ill., and will be glad to preach for churches within fifty or sixty miles of that point.

—Ground was broken on April 15 for the new church at Shelbyville, Ind. It will cost $20,000, will be built of Bedford limestone and will be completed by Jan. 1, 1902.

—Dr. W. T. Moore will begin a course of lectures at the church at Troy, Mo., April 22. G. F. Assiter, the pastor at that place, has one Sunday in the month unoccupied.

—A musician who can play the pipe organ and teach music can find a good opening at Findlay, O. A member of the church preferred. Address A. M. Growden, stating salary expected.

—Albert Schwartz has closed his work of two years and a half at Lomax, Ill. The church has prospered under his ministry and commends him as an efficient and faithful pastor.

—S. G. Clay, of Boise, Ida., would like to have all members of the Christian Church in that state to write to him giving their address. We trust those of our readers who live in that state will comply with this request.

—The annual convention of the Third District of Illinois will be held at Galesburg April 30 to May 2. We notice in the excellent program four lectures by Prof. H. L. Willett. D. E. Hughes is president of the district and S. H. Zendt, secretary.

—The Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, is said to be out of debt, with money in the bank and in the best financial condition for fifty years. W. W. Sniff, the pastor, is president of our own ministerial association and of the city ministers' association.

—The Southwest Iowa District Convention will be held at Creston, May 6-9. Addresses will be delivered by A. M. Haggard, C. C. Smith, J. M. Rudy, Sumner T. Martin and others. W. B. Crewdson is president and Edgar Price secretary of the district.

—The following is the itinerary of J. O. Davis who is canvassing the Missouri churches for Home Missions: Smithville, April 22; Grayson, 23; Edgerton, 24; Camden Point, 25; Gower, 26; Forest City, 27; Oregon, 28, A. M.; Bigelow, 28, P M.; Craig, 29; Mound City, 30; Burlington Junction, May 1; Barnard, 2; Savannah, 3; Union Star, 4; Albany, 5, A. M.; King City, 5, P. M.; Maysville, 6; Gallatin, 7; Trenton, 8; Milan, 9; Kirksville, 10; Macon, 11; Paris, 12, A. M.; Palmyra, 12, P. M.; New London, 13; Bowling Green, 14; Mexico, 15.

—The American Christian Missionary Society presents the following comparative statement of receipts from October 1, 1900, to April 15, 1901:

	1900	1901	Gain
From Churches	$ 1,846.61	$ 1,946.87	$ 100.26

Loss x

Our friends will note that we have gained $27,513.48 over the corresponding period of last year. If the May offerings shall be generally and generously observed, we shall have great hopes of reaching the $100,000 for the year. Twenty-six thousand dollars of this gain is in permanent fund, annuity and special funds, not available for general work. If we are to enlarge our work the gain must come through the May offering.

—Dr. W. T. Moore spent a day or two in the city last week, en route to Troy, Mo., where he is delivering a series of his lecture-sermons for the church there, of which Bro. Assiter is pastor.

—A card received announces the marriage, Feb. 25 last, of Miss Bessie Bolding Farrar to Niels Madsen, at Deoghur, Baidyanath, Bengal, India. At home, Pendra Road, Central Provinces, India, after March 1. Thousands of Miss Bessie's friends will breathe a benediction on her and her husband, and bid them Godspeed in their work in India.

—One side of a card used in the evangelistic meetings of Charles Reign Scoville, contains the following:

We, the Disciples of Christ,
Wear no name but Christ,
Have no priest but Christ,
Accept no creed but Christ,
Submit to no authority but Christ's,
Ask you to believe on Christ,
Ask you to repent towards Christ,
Ask you to confess Christ,
Ask you to be baptized into Christ,
Ask you to walk with Christ,
Ask you to live for Christ,
Plead for unity in Christ.

Christ is our all and in all.

That seems to be a very reasonable and a very scriptural sort of evangelism. Why shouldn't it succeed?

A Visit to Sedalia.

I have recently had much pleasure in a visit to Sedalia. I preached for the church there on Lord's day morning and evening, and then lectured on Wednesday evening. I have always had a special liking for the people of that city, and espeeially for the brethren in that church. They are an earnest, active, intelligent band, and are capable of doing great things for the Master's cause if they choose to put forth their whole strength.

Just now they are very much concerned about the resignation of Brother Melvin Putnam, who has been their pastor for a little over two years. I found that he was very much beloved by his people, and there was real, sincere regret expressed by the members of the church on acconnt of his resignation. This regret is forcibly expressed in a letter addressed to him by the officers of the church and signed by the entire board. The following extract will indicate the feeling of the board and is, I believe, very largely, if not entirely, the feeling of the whole community:

"In accepting your resignation, which you recently tendered, we cannot refrain from saying to you that we deeply regret that conditions for which you are in no wise responsible, and the existence of which we deplore, have caused you to desire to sever your relations with us as our preacher and pastor. We want to say to you, and to the brotherhood, and to the world, that we recognize in you a man of marked ability, of strictest purity and integrity of life and character, a man of deep religious consecration and zeal, and, above all, a man of high dignity and moral courage—a man without shams and without pretense. Let us assure you that you bear with you, wherever you go, the fullest confidence and the highest esteem and love of this official board. We endorse you and commend you both for your work and your personal worth."

Brother Putnam is still a young man, being 31 years of age. He has already achieved decided success as an evangelist and pastor in other states. He has not been long in Missouri, but we cannot afford to lose him, and I wish to express the hope that he will soon find a place where his usefulness will be commensurate with his ability to labor in the cause of the Master.

The brethren at Sedalia ought to have a very strong man, and it is hoped that such a man will be secured without much delay. The church is one of the most desirable in the state in many respects, and under a wise and efficient leadership it ought to be made a great power for good.

Kidney and Bladder Troubles Promptly Cured.

A Sample Sent FREE by Mail.

Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the wonderful new discovery in medical science, fulfills every wish in promptly curing kidney, bladder and uric acid troubles, rheumatism and pain in the back. It corrects inability to hold water and scalding pain in passing it, or bad effects following the use of liquor, wine or beer, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to go often during the day and to get up many times during the night. The mild and the extraordinary effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases.

Swamp-Root is not recommended for everything, but if you have kidney, liver, bladder or uric acid trouble you will find it just the remedy you need.

If you need a medicine you should have the best. Sold by druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes. You may have a sample bottle of this wonderful new discovery and a book that tells all about it and its great cures, both sent absolutely free by mail. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co , Binghamton, N. Y. When writing, mention that you read this generous offer in the Christian-Evangelist.

A Letter From Jeu Hawk.

I have not yet opened my office here as I intended when I wrote you last. The main reason is on account of lack of means. I have taken the family to the country, and Mrs. Jeu and children are still there. During my last stay in the country with my family we have done great good for the Master. Mrs. Jeu is often requested to go to talk to different families about Jesus Christ in our town. Our children sing Christian hymns for the people, and I am sure our two children are a great help to spread the gospel in our town. We never meet any opposition in our town and the people are pleased to hear us talking to them about Christ. Our little girl, Macy, has even talked to the older people that it is wrong to worship idols and they all feel so happy that even a little child six years old who knows that idols are nothing. We are doing the best we know how to advance the cause of Christ while at home. But I am sorry to inform you that we will soon be obliged to plead for help. I thought I might be able to make our own living at home, but so far what little medicine I brought home has been almost exhausted and I receive very little compensation. I have a splendid opportunity to do the work of Christ while here, but I am afraid our limited means will not hold out. Are there any brethren and sisters that know us in America who want to assist us to advance the cause of Christ? Everything is quiet in Quong Tong province. I have never heard of anything said against Christianity since my arrival. This means a great deal to the cause of Christ. We all are well at present and contented with our lot so far. I hope our friends in America will help us.

Correspondence.

Washington (D. C.) Letter.

The tenth anniversary of the Ninth Street Church of this city, celebrated on Easter Sunday, was a happy occasion. There were elaborate decorations, special music and a sermon from Neh. 4:6, "So we built the wall; for the people had a mind to work." A thanksgiving offering of over $200 was made to the church debt and a boy confessed Christ. The history of this church affords a striking object lesson of the possibilities for growth in our eastern cities.

In the closing years of the last decade several members of the Vermont Avenue Church began to agitate the formation of a new congregation in the eastern section of the city. A canvass was made and while 60 Disciples were found, few were willing to leave the mother church and the amount subscribed for the work was only $12 a week. However, a chapel was built and on April 5, 1891, was set apart to the service of God. At the end of six months the congregation numbered 245 and the chapel was too small. The addition of a gallery afforded only temporary relief. In 1898 the chapel was torn down and the foundation laid for a house of worship, which cost with furnishings $29,440. In ten years 737 persons have been received by baptism and the total number enrolled is 1,215. The highest number received in one year was 323, the lowest, 53. There have been 61 additions the past six months. The church now numbers 841, not counting 89 who have been retired to the inactive list. The first Sunday we had 85 present at Sunday-school; last Lord's day the secretary counted 466 in the classes. The school has raised a total of $5,590 of which $1,108 was for missions. There have been 443 additions to the church from the school. The home department numbers just 100. The whole amount raised by the congregation for all purposes is $50,970. During the first two years of his pastorate the minister married 11 couples, the last two years, 79 couples. When he began his work there were less than 50 families to look after; now the church has a constituency of at least 2,000 souls.

Our three Endeavor Societies have over 200 members. C. B. Titus, the first president of the senior organization, is now a missionary in Lu Cheo Fu. The juniors for several years united with the Vermont Avenue Junior Society in supporting an orphan girl. The news has just come that on Christmas day this orphan girl, Su Kwari, was married at the orphanage in Damoh and this was the first Christian wedding ever celebrated in that place. This happy couple has gone to housekeeping and will now support themselves and the gospel.

The C. W. B. M. raised $427 in ten years and gained 11 new members recently. The Ladies' Aid Society raised $4,147 and in six years made and sold 2,130 aprons besides other work. The pastor, who has served this congregation since its organization, was unanimously called to continue his ministry and was granted a substantial increase in salary.

The Ninth Street Church is the result of an expenditure of less than $5,000 of missionary funds. The receipts of the American Christian Missionary Society should be increased to such an extent that it might invest $1,000 a year for five years in every great city on the Atlantic coast. It would not be long then until we should have a cordon of strong churches girting the section where now we are weakest.

The prosperity of our churches here during the past year has been due in some measure to the valuable accessions from the clerical force at the census office. Director Merriam seems to have been especially fortunate in the men and women called to his assistance to tabulate the census. The enumerators, however were not always of such a high order of intelligence, and the young ladies who manipulate the punching machines are sometimes sorely puzzled when making up the schedules. The occupations of the citizens were given and if these happened not to be on the printed lists they were to be punched "O. T.," meaning other things, or "N. G.," which stood for "Not Gainful." An Indiana enumerator recorded the occupation of a fellow-citizen as "drunkard." The young lady clerk here promptly punched that "N. G."

Another clerk possibly was not so accurate when she put the same letters over certain residents of Chicago who were enrolled as "crooks," "pick-pockets," "gamblers;" though likely in the long run these occupations also are not gainful.

The occupation of a Georgian was given as "odd jobs." The clerk had no trouble in assigning this to the column, "other things." An enterprising Ohio enumerator cornered the hobos enroute through his territory and enrolled each as "tramp; not gainful." The Republican clerk must have smiled broadly when he came to the name of a Jersey man who gave his occupation as "Democratic stump speaker" and assigned him to the "Not Gainful" column. "Does housework," "Minds baby," appear among the occupations but their assignment is not mentioned. A Kentucky woman whose husband was entered as idler, gave her occupation as "washing and wishing." The puncher who came across this entry remarked that it meant the wife was washing to support her twelve children and lazy husband and wishing he would go to work.

The Baltimore News says that in 1900 the educational donations of this country amounted to $34,932,644, but only about $1,000,000 of this vast amount was given to the schools, white and colored, of the south, and very little of this money came from the north. The News adds: "The educational needs of the south are so pressing, the conditions now prevailing so susceptible of improvement, that we are confident an intelligent and earnest representation of the situation would induce a generous response from philanthropists, regardless of geographical lines."

Unfortunately for us, and not wholly our fault, the largest proportion of the illiterate class is with us, and we are doing all in our power to educate them, but the task is too heavy, and generous hearted capital from other sections should come to our rescue.

The church at Ennis has repaired the house and made it "good as new." Dr. Buckner, the pastor, is being assisted in a meeting by J. H. O. Smith and John Brower.

The program of our state convention at Waco, June 5-10, has appeared and it is a good one. It evidently was prepared with an eye to business. It deals solely with missionary questions, and does not confine itself to Texas missions, but provides for the secretaries of all our general work. Get ready to attend.

W. C. Dimmit, of Benjamin, returns to Sherman, his old home. Much of his useful life was spent there, and it is well that his closing years shall be among a people who know and love him so well.

The University of Texas is rapidly becoming one of the great schools of the land. The enrollment, the largest in her history, has just reached one thousand. The writer is to spend a week talking to the students before a great while. J. W. Lowber, our Austin pastor, has a strong hold on the school.

The oil interests of Beaumont are attracting the attention of the whole country. A number of new "gushers" have been brought in and excitement is at fever heat. A great number of oil companies have been organized and the Standard Oil Company, the most gigantic trust of the land, has sent a deputation to look over the field. Just what the future will be no one will dare venture a prediction, but all agree that it will be something wonderful.

Rev. J. Gilmore Smith, moderator of the Trinity Presbytery, in a recent sermon before that body made a most zealous defense of the Westminster Confession of Faith. If his claims for it are just, it is strange that any one should think it needs revision. Here are some of his utterances: "To lay aside the confession of faith is to surrender the Bible;" "Jesus Christ taught Calvinism and lived Calvinism, and to change Calvinism is to do away with Jesus and the Bible;" "To a Presbyterian the confession of faith is none other than the inspired word of God." He seems to think that those who are clamoring for revision in the main are men who have "worked" themselves into the church, restless spirits, bent on mischief. Dr. Herrick Johnson seems especially objectionable to him. He says Johnson has said, "Across our confession could justly be written, 'the gospel for the elect only.'" At this he becomes ferociously excited and exclaims that "the statement is as far from the truth as heaven is from hell." But the confession will be revised all the same.

Wilson and Huston, who recently held a great meeting in Dayton, O., with almost 500 additions, are assisting G. B. Ranshaw, of San Antonio, in a series of revival services, and we are expecting a mighty victory for the Lord.

The tragic death of D. W. Pritchett at Van Alstyne, April 9, is one of the saddest things which I have ever known. Bro. Pritchett was one of the best known and most loved men in the state. His long residence here, and his successful work both with voice and pen, had gathered about him a host of ardent friends. The whole church mourns the loss of one of her strongest and purest men, and we all tender the broken-hearted wife our deepest sympathy.

Time Was Up.

It Was Quit Coffee or Die.

When a woman is brought to the edge of the grave by poisoning from the drinking of ordinary coffee day by day, and is then made a well woman by leaving it off, her experience is worth something to others that are poisoned in various ways from the same habit.

Mrs. Jeannette B. Brown, 100 Minor St., New Haven, Conn., says: "Four years ago my life hung on a very slender thread with liver, kidney and heart trouble, and a very severe form of rheumatism. I was confined to bed with hands, wrists, feet and ankles so badly swollen that they bore no resemblance to parts of the human body. I had frequent sinking spells from heart weakness when I was thought to be dying and sometimes thought to be dead. My doctor, one of the directors of the State Hospital, a very successful man in his profession, told me to stop drinking coffee and use Postum Food Coffee, as he said coffee was the primary cause of my trouble.

I took his advice at once and discontinued medicines. Slowly the swelling disappeared, and the rheumatism left me, the sinking spells became less frequent, and I got out of bed and around the house. I was completely cured but it required some time.

For the past three years I have been a perfectly strong, healthy woman, sleep well, with good appetite, good color, active and energetic.

It is a great pleasure to testify to Postum that has made me a well woman again. I have many friends here and in other parts of the state who are using Postum Food Coffee regularly, and I know to their very great benefit.

Literary Errors.

The time has come for a great people like the Disciples of Christ to present to the world a literature in keeping with their great plea and the position they occupy among the religious forces of our time. We have produced some books of considerable literary merit. Others of our books, while not worthy of special mention because of literary excellence, are passable and because of their subject matter are good, valuable and creditable works. In regard to our periodicals, however, we are not making the progress in literary attainments which we ought to make. A few of our papers thus viewed are creditable. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will compare favorably with any religious journal of our country. It is a credit to our brotherhood and we call the attention of our most cultured religious neighbors to it with commendable pride not only because of the subject matter it presents, but because of its literary ability, notably in the editorial work.

We are humiliated, however, in reading many of our religious papers in observing the very poor literary work in evidence, frequently in their editorials and more often in contributions and correspondence. This ought not to be so. No man should attempt editorial work among the Disciples of Christ to-day unless he is at least reasonably well qualified educationally to do this work. Again: if every one who so desires is to be heard in the columns of our papers, all such correspondence should be carefully edited. As a sample, we call attention to a few items sent to a paper a few weeks ago by a preacher in which the personal pronoun "I" appeared fourteen times in about one-third of a column. In last week's issue of one of our papers, claiming a large circulation, a noted evangelist in a sketch of a little less than two columns uses the personal pronoun I eighty-four times.

These are samples of the many errors offensive to the host of readers who have some education. Many preachers write as they preach, but for the sake of the cause and "for the good of the order" let us have editors who are able and willing to edit all the matter they permit to appear in the papers they issue.

In conclusion may we ask, is it not about time for our people to have more direct influence in the control of our religious press? If it is not thought prudent to extend their influence to cover all our literature local and otherwise, is it not well to clothe with official dignity influential organs or withhold such recognition as is deemed best according to merit and have the readers thus understand the brotherhood is not responsible for errors of non-official organs? Why not have an editorial board or literary board as well as missionary, educational and benevolent boards? Is this a proper field for expansion? Is it as proper and important to have a competent editor for one or more of our great religious papers as it is to have a worthy missionary represent us in Japan or China or in any state or city in America? If the selection and guidance of one needs a board why not the other?

ANDREW SCOTT.

Butler, Mo.

[We heartily agree with Bro. Scott that irregularities of spelling, grammar and diction should be banished from our journalism and that a good literary style is essential to the effective statement of religious truths. The over-abundant use of the personal pronoun of the first person, singular number, indicates, however, a defect more serious than the mere lack of literary skill. Egotism may find expression in Addisonian English but its lineaments are not concealed by any cloak of pure diction. Give us rather bad grammar and modesty. There is no virtue in bad grammar, though, and little excuse for it. It would not be a bad idea for correspondents to read over what they have written before they send it, and see that the verbs agree with their subjects in number and that pronominal objects are in the objective case and a few little things like that.

We do not believe that our general newspapers can be successfully conducted as official organs, but we do believe, as we have been saying lately, that our missionary boards, representing the whole of our national co-operative work, ought to have one first-class official publication to serve as the organ for all of these enterprises.—EDITOR.]

Concerning the Supreme Authority.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—In an editorial in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of April 11, on "The Seat of Authority," are found these words: "It should be added, however, that those who speak of the authority of religion as internal rather than external do not thereby intend to disparage the authority of Christ or the Bible, but rather to emphasize the idea that it is only as Christ and the truths of revelation are enthroned in the heart that they really become a controlling force over the lives of men."

After having your attention specially called to the point, do you still think that this is what the controversy is about? If it can be made clear that those who insist that the final and supreme authority in religion is internal and not external simply means "that it is only as Christ and the truths of revelation are enthroned in the heart that they really become a controlling force over the lives of men," then the bone of contention is removed and the discussion must end. This being what they mean there is no point of difference. The most evangelical of the evangelicals believe the same. Your explanation, if true, makes it clear that the dispute is about nothing; and that Dr. Abbott and those who agree with him have not had "a find" of any sort. They are simply repeating the old story in language that does themselves great injustice.

But is there not ground for believing that your interpretation does not interpret? Dr. Abbott thinks there is an issue, and one "clearly joined." Here are his words in The Outlook, December 29: "This much is certain, that the issue is clearly joined between those who base religion on an external authority in Church or Book, and those who base it upon the inward consciousness of God inherent and essential in man's nature, though both evoked by and interpreted through the Church and the Book." Here "the external authority in the Book" is put in contrast with "the inward consciousness of God inherent and essential in man's nature." It is thus that the "issue is clearly joined." You obliterate this issue by your explanation, at least it so appears to me. You will kindly notice that this "inward consciousness of God" is not "Christ and the truths of revelation in the heart," as you make it appear, but it is something "inherent and essential in man's nature," something very different from Christ and revelation in the heart. Will you not in the light of these criticisms reconsider this subject and in another editorial tell us whether or not there is any real issue joined between those who claim that the final and supreme authority in religion is external—in Jesus and his word—and those who claim it is internal—"in the inward consciousness of God inherent and essential in man's nature." I do not think you can continue to reduce this issue to zero, as in your editorial of April 11. There certainly is a clear-cut issue. It is so understood by both sides to the controversy. And it is so in fact, if any trust can be put in human language. H. MCDIARMID.

"A New Woman."

Disease makes many a woman prematurely old. Dark-rimmed eyes, hollow cheeks and wasted form are accompanied by listlessness and loss of ambition. Home duties are a weariness, and social pleasures have no attraction.

One of the commonest expressions of women cured by Doctor Pierce's Favorite Prescription is this: "It has made a new woman of me." There's a world of meaning in the words. It means the sparkle brought back to the eyes; the complexion tinted with the rosy hue of healthy blood; the form rounded out anew in graceful curves; the whole body radiant with health.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription makes weak women strong and sick women well. It dries debilitating drains, heals inflammation and ulceration and cures female weakness. It makes new women of those prematurely aged by disease.

"Dr. Pierce's medicines are the best I have ever used," writes Mrs. C. Nelson, of Chemawa, Marion Co., Oregon. "My health was badly run down when I consulted him by letter. My limbs were cold and my head hurt me continually. I was so nervous that the least thing would startle me almost into convulsions. I had palpitation of the heart so bad that I could scarcely walk sometimes. I felt utterly discouraged, but two bottles of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription and one of 'Golden Medical Discovery' made a new woman out of me."

The Scoville Meetings In Des Moines

Although I am about to report probably the greatest series of protracted meetings ever held among the Disciples, I trust the reader will excuse me from occupying my space with glowing descriptions of the victory, and permit me to relate those features of it which may inspire and guide other efforts which other men and churches may make in the future. Respecting the results I may say simply that in four weeks at the Central Church 306 were added, and in 49 days at the University Place Church 573 persons were added, while in five days at the East Side Church there have been 45 additions to date. It is not possible at this moment to state exactly how many of these were already Disciples taking local membership, but I am very confident that these have been less than one-fifth of the entire number. This fact is sufficient in itself to show how deeply the meetings took hold of the several communities in which they were held. The number of additions to the University Place

Chas. Reign Scoville, Evangelist.

Church is probably greater than that of any other meeting with one congregation ever held among our people. Now the chief question which I think will concern all readers is, How was all this done? My answer is that I estimate that the success centered in two main features, the organization and the preaching.

I. The Organization of forces.

1. First of all these churches were well organized for regular work before the meetings began, and naturally much of the work was already done by home laborers. No man knows till such a harvest season what steady work in the pulpit, Bible-school, Endeavor and prayer-meetings will accomplish toward the salvation of souls. In these meetings we know of 215 who came into the church out of one Bible-school. Let faithful workers take courage, and wait for results with due patience.

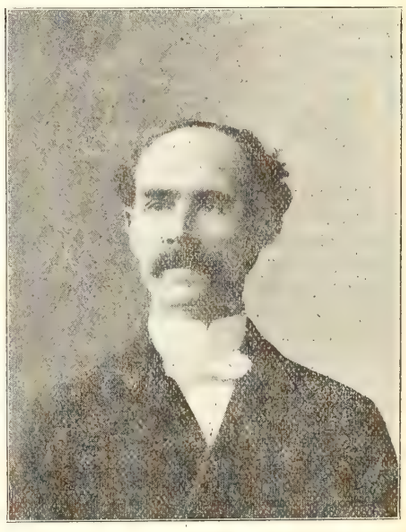
2. New work was well distributed among committees for visiting, advertising, ushering, singing, gathering finance, conducting prayer-meetings, etc. The evangelist had instructions for the appointment and duties of these committees printed in pamphlet form and distributed to the heads of committees a week before the meeting began. The heads formed an executive committee whom the evangelist met weekly or on call, so as to control the whole movement.

3. Day meetings for the church for prayer and exhortation were dynamos of spiritual force. On Tuesdays about three hours were spent in a continuous preaching service by visiting or resident ministers. Prayer meetings daily were also held in a room at the college for students. The evangelist did no preaching in daytime except on Sundays.

4. The meetings were thoroughly and constantly advertised. Large placards were placed on the front of street-cars; large cards, with portraits of pastor and evangelist and a cut of the church building with an announcement of the meetings, were put up in the front windows of all Christian homes and stores so that they silently presented the invitation a hundred times a day to the passer on the streets. Small cards, 2,500 at a time, were distributed either by committees at the front door of every house in the community or at the front door of the church to the people as they passed out. Different cards were prepared two or three times a week, announcing different special meetings or themes. They told of a men's meeting, a women's meeting, a mothers' meeting, or a children's meeting. They foretold sermons on Christian Union, Work of the Holy Spirit, What Shall I do to Be Saved? The Divine Name, etc. They did not carry a week's program. The special meetings broke the monotony of the series, awakened new interest, and often touched vital points in human experience and need.

5. The pastor, the evangelist, and probably a hundred workers spent every hour possible in talking with some friend about his religious duty and the value of immediate obedience. People thronged the pastor's study at set hours for consultation. No person in the community escaped a kind, personal invitation and heart to heart appeal. No person was unduly urged, or yielded without due deliberation and perfect freedom of decision. This universal effort began the very first day of the meeting, and closed not till the last person was out of the church the last night. Many made confession after adjournment on many different occasions. With all this cooperation there was never a jar or discord among the workers, or an adverse criticism by any member concerning any plan, duty, or deed.

II. The Character of the Preaching.



1. In substance it was the plain, pure, simple gospel of Christ with the least possible admixture of philosophy, theory, personality, or rhetorical display.

2. The style was intensely earnest, direct to the souls of men lost in sin, warm with a tender love, and pervaded with unwavering faith in God, in the gospel, and in the Scriptures.

3. The interest was maintained by the impression that the truth is most precious to every hearer, and that no person can afford to miss any part of it; by a wealth of apt and forcible illustrations; by frequent sallies of wit or humor, which were dignified and to the point; and by numerous and beautiful quotations from poets, prose writers, statesmen, reformers, and many other classes, most of all from the Bible.

4. The burden of every thought was an exhortation to immediate surrender to Christ. Exhortations appeared all through the sermons, and a strong and often touching appeal was made at the close of every discourse. Rarely was an invitation given without additions during the first stanza of the song. After the second stanza, while the audience remained standing, another short exhortation was given, and so again and again till all the stanzas were sung, and the choruses were repeated over and over after each stanza. Often another song was announced and its stanzas alternated with exhortation. During all this time the whole audience remained standing. Rarely, the pastor gave an exhortation with the people seated, and it was followed by another song. The appeals of the evangelist were so numerous, varied and strong, so interwoven with quotation and illustration that one could only wonder whether the supply of this material were exhaustless and whether any soul could possibly resist its power.

5. Perseverance was one secret of success. The evangelist permits no weak-kneed elder at the close of the second or third week to suggest that "perhaps the meetin' would better stop now before the interest goes down." He knows that the meeting will not stop nor the interest go down. Everybody expects the fifth week to be better than the fourth and the seventh more fruitful than any that preceded it. But this perseverance has another form. The preacher is not afraid to present the same great fundamental truths over and over with endless variation of expression; nor is he afraid to repeat for the fiftieth time some striking aphorism that carries an arrow of conviction in it, whether it be a quotation from a prophet, a poet or a sage, till every child in the community repeats it at home, at school and upon the street. The soul of ever hearer echoes and re-echoes these burning calls to duty.

I. N. McCash,

PASTOR OF UNIVERSITY PLACE CHURCH DES MOINES.

6. One thing more. All these trying labors, with many very crucial scenes and emergencies, do not ever call out any irregularities, cranky ideas, plans or expressions from the evangelist. He is pleasant as sunshine, prudent as a spy, harmless as a dove. He does not deal in slang to reach the common people. He does not descend to low methods to catch low auditors. With him every man may now be an uncrowned king, every woman a prospective queen, every child a future nobleman. All things are said and done for Christ's sake, all honor at all times given to the Lord. Every allusion to the pastor enthrones him more securely in the favor of his people, and prepares him and the church to move right on after the meeting without a struggle, without a disappointment. In every respect the people are made ready to do greater things, nobler things and more things than they did or could do before the meeting. The meeting leaves no convert out in the cold, no bitterness to scatter the flock, no impractical ideas to be overcome or outgrown, but leaves all in the love, the faith and the service of the one true God and His Son Jesus Christ. Clinton Lockhart.

Ohio Convention at Akron.

Ohio's hosts will gather in May this year at Akron, the "rubber" city. This is not news, but something concerning the High St. Church, where the sessions of the convention will be held, may be of interest. The pastor is J. G. Slayter who has now served the church just one year. There is a forward movement in every department. During the past month there have been additions each Lord's day. So far this year 72 have been added. The Christian Endeavor Society is planning to double its membership. Unless we hear from Bro. Taubman, of Portsmouth, to the contrary, we are going to claim the largest Sunday-school among the Disciples in the state. The average attendance for the past three Sundays was 614; for the month of March it was 572. 700 by May 5th is the watchword. In one year's time the pastor has built up a class of 150.

But what will be of most interest, especially to those who are intimately connected with church finances, will be the fact that in the High St. Church will be found a body who carry on the Lord's work without the aid of revenue from suppers, entertainments, fish fries, grab bags, and other seductive schemes. Four years ago the congregation decided that the church should be supported by its members out of their own pockets. Succeeding years have proved the wisdom of this decision. With the application of business principles church finances have ceased to be such a bugbear as formerly worried the deacons. All bills are paid promptly and a balance in the treasury. In addition to this we went beyond our apportionment for foreign missions this year. By January 1st, 1902, the debt on the church will be removed.

So when you come to the High St. Church you come to one progressing in every department and in the forefront in all good work. In conjunction with the other three churches in the city we are preparing to royally entertain all visitors to Ohio's Tip Top Convention in Ohio's Tip Top city.

Kentucky News Letter.

The regular minister, H. C. Bowen, recently closed a successful meeting with the church at Augusta.

At a recent meeting of the members of the First Church of Richmond, the East End Church which was established as a mission several years ago was formally recognized as a separate, distinct body, and granted rights and privileges of its own. About 30 members of the parent church took membership with the new organization. J. M. Bailey was selected pastor for the ensuing year, and we feel sure that under his guidance it will prosper and grow strong. He is now in the midst of a successful meeting with home forces.

W. W. Williamson, who has labored successfully as minister of the East Union Church, Nicholas county, recently accepted a call to Bluefield, W. Va., where he has begun work under favorable auspices. H. M. Polsgrove, of Lexington, has succeeded him at East Union.

R. M. Talbert, minister at Doniphan, Mo., recently made a short visit to his parents at Moorefield. We rejoice at his success in Missouri.

The State Christian Endeavor Convention, which was to have been held at Cynthiana in May, has been abandoned, and no state convention will be held this year. The reason for the change is that the international convention will be held in Cincinnati in July and so many Endeavorers will attend that meeting, it was thought many would on this account forego the pleasure of attending the state convention.

A branch of the Zion Christian Catholic Church, of which John Alexander Dowie is at the head, will soon be founded at Danville.

Prof. G. P. Coler, of Ann Arbor, Mich., is now in this state holding Bible institutes. He has visited the churches at Mt. Sterling and Louisville (First Church) and is now in the midst of an institute at Maysville. He is delivering a series of lectures in the afternoon on the Gospels, and at night on the Pentateuch. These meetings will no doubt be of lasting benefit to the churches in which they are held. We regret that he cannot remain in the state longer.

E. L. Powell, of Louisville, is announced for a protracted meeting at Fulton in June.

A Christian Endeavor Society has recently been organized at Lancaster with over 50 members enrolled. The work here, under the faithful ministry of A. R. Moore, continues to prosper.

The recent meeting at Murray, held by the regular minister, S. F. Fowler, was the best in the history of the church. Nearly 100 were added to the membership. Meetings were in progress at the same time in the other congregations of the town.

H. Pierce Atkins, who has done such excellent work at Harrodsburg for the past three years, left last week for Richmond, Va., where he recently accepted a call to the East End Church of that city. His congregation at Harrodsburg were loath to give him up. As yet, no successor to him has been chosen.

The eighth C. W. B. M. district, composed of the counties of Bath, Bourbon, Clark, Harrison, Montgomery and Nicholas, held a very interesting meeting at Paris last week. A number of excellent addresses were made. C. C. Smith, of Cincinnati, closed the convention with a strong address at the night service.

George Darsie, of Frankfort, is now preaching a series of Sunday night sermons on "Christian Athletics." His first sermon was on "Standing," and his second on "Walking."

H. B. Smith, of Ashland, has been in a short meeting with the Little Rock Church, Bourbon county. The Ashland meeting, in which he was assisted by H. T. Cree, of Maysville, closed with 19 additions.

Beginning on Sunday, April 21, Prof. H. L. Willett, of Chicago University, will give a course of biblical lectures on "The Beginnings of Christianity," at Danville. He recently gave a series at Richmond, which were very highly complimented by the secular press of that city.

The convention of Grant county churches held recently in Williamstown was well attended and quite a success. Among the speakers were F. M. Rains, of Cincinnati; J. W. Maddux, of Ironton, O.; H. W. Elliott, Ward Russell, W. L. Buchanan, T. S. Buckingham and T. J. Golightly. These annual county meetings are productive of much good.

J. M. Rash, of Winchester, recently closed a meeting at Bowen, Powell county, which resulted in 25 additions.

The visit of Rev. F. B. Meyer, of London, to this country seems to have already resulted in widespread interest among the centers of religious influence. The distinguished preacher was entertained for several days last week in Louisville, and was greeted with somewhat of an ovation.

W. R. Lloyd, of Youngstown, O., will assist Geo. W. Nutter in a meeting a Millersburg, beginning on Sunday, April 21.

The new church building at Cynthiana is nearing completion. When completed it will be one of the most beautiful in the state. It will probably be dedicated next month. J. J. Haley is the beloved minister.

Definite plans have materialized for the erection of the Y. M. C. A. building in Lexington at a cost of $75,000. This building has been greatly needed for a number of years.

BABY WANTS

nothing but steady continuous care with regular food and sleep; he wants no variety —nothing but rest and food, good air, soft water, and gentle friction.

His dainty pink skin responds with the glow of health.

When the least bit off, as babies are occasionally, use Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil.

We'll send you a little to try, if you like.
SCOTT & BOWNE, 409 Pearl street, New York.

John B. Jones has resigned at Sadieville and Mill Creek to accept a call to the church at Bellevue-Dayton, where he began work on April 7. We wish him godspeed in his new field.

H. H. Lloyd, of Bardstown, recently aided W. F. Rogers in a meeting with the church at Lebanon Junction, which resulted in 25 additions.

The annual Kentucky Intercollegiate Oratorical Contest was held in Lexington on th 12th inst., and the medal was awarded to Mr. Clark Tandy, who represented the Kentucky State College, Lexington, and who spoke on "The Reign of Law." Kentucky University was not represented, having recently withdrawn from this association.

The missionary offering of the First Church, Louisville, was taken on April 7, and amounted to $2,045. It is needless to say both preacher and congregation are very happy. GEO. W. KEMPER.

Midway, Ky.

Advertising the May Offering.

1. Make regular and careful announcements, beginning at least four meetings before the offering. Vary the manner of these announcements from time to time, making each one present a different motive, or a different aspect of the need.

2. If a parish paper is published, fill it with announcements, printed in display type.

3. Circulate the printed matter furnished by the home society, putting it into every home in the church, and into the hands of every member.

4. The two or three sermons bearing on the duty, the demand, etc., and on the grace of giving, will also serve to advertise the offering.

5. Get the members to talking about the offering. Find out what the church did last year, and the year previous, and get the congregation to decide what amount they should contribute this year.

6. Make a careful canvass of the whole church for offerings. See that every member receives an envelope. The solicitation for a definite amount from each member will be the best possible advertisement of the offering. FRANK G. TYRRELL,

Mt. Cabanne Christian Church, St. Louis.

Stockholders' Meeting.

The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Standard Adding Machine Company, for the election of seven (7) directors, will be held at the office of the Company, 3341 Franklin Avenue, St. Louis, Missouri, Tuesday, May 7, 1901. Polls open from 9 A. M. to 12 noon. F. M. CALL, Pres.

JOHN Q. MCCANNE, Sec'y.

Evangelistic.

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

Fort Smith, April 21.—One hundred and eleven to date. Twenty-six to-day. Continuing. Go to Bedford, Ind., next.—MARTIN EASTON EDMONDS.

CALIFORNIA.

Alameda, Cal., Apr. 14.—Since J. W. Ingram has had charge of the Christian Church at Alameda, California, 23 souls have been added to the church. The attendance at Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor society has been more than doubled. During this time Bro. Ingram was confined to his bed two weeks by heart failure.—X.

FLORIDA.

Jacksonville, Apr. 14.—Two more additions to the Adams Street Christian Church, Jacksonville, Fla., to day; one by confession and one by letter, making five accessions this week. The foundation for our new church building starts this week. Our meeting at Quitman, Ga., commences next Lord's day, our third meeting for that church.—T. H. BLENUS.

ILLINOIS.

Cairo, April 15.—Our meeting at this place continues with increasing interest, and there have been 25 additions up to date. The attention is good, and we hope for several more additions in the next few days. The meeting will continue through this week, and then I will go to Wyatt, W. Va., where I begin a meeting on April 27. Churches needing my services in revivals or debates may address me at Lexington, Ky., my headquarters.—JAMES W. ZACHARY.

Cairo, April 22.—J. W. Zachary, of Lexington, Ky., began a meeting in Cairo, Ill., March 23, and closed April 21. There were 12 immersions, and 18 united with the congregation. Taking into account the circumstances this was as great a success as ten times that number under different conditions. The church has been built up, strengthened and placed before the city in a more favorable light than ever before. It regards the meeting as a grand success.—CLARK BRADEN.

Cameron, April 22.—Two additions yesterday. They come at nearly every meeting; 59 since I came here. In response to my statement about a place wanting a preacher there came a flood of letters. Those who enclosed stamps will get a reply, but it will take a little time.—O. D. MAPLE.

Decatur, April 22.—We had one addition yesterday at the Christian Tabernacle. We have increased the attendance at the Sunday-school to 200. The Tabernacle orchestra, one of the best in the city, plays for the Sunday-school and the church services. Bro. Geo. W. Jones is the leader of our chorus choir and of the orchestra.—J. C. COGGINS.

Fairfield, April 15.—Meeting reported last week from Jeffersonville closed Tuesday, April 9. I preached five sermons with 20 additions. The church there gave me a call for half time. But I have not accepted it yet. Bro. D. Logan has been their pastor for the last year.—LEW D. HILL.

Kankakee, April 14.—Three added to-day.—W. D. DEWEESE.

Kankakee, April 21.—One young man reclaimed to-day.—W. D. DEWEESE.

Landes, April 14.—E. E. Boyer, of Hutsonville, has just closed a two weeks' meeting at Landes with great results. The meetings were held in the school-house. Opposition was strong, but the gospel of Christ triumphed, and 17 were added to the congregation at this place; 14 by confession. There is great need of evangelistic work throughout Crawford county. Who will come to the rescue?—MRS. MINNIE BANDY.

Normal, April 16.—Three confessions Lord's day.—E. B. BARNES.

Quincy.—We have just closed a short meeting with the church in Quincy, Ill., which resulted in 104 additions. About 80 of them by confession and baptism.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Kirksville, Mo., April 13.

Rockford.—The church established two years ago at Rockford, Ill., proves the wisdom of investing missionary money in the centers of population. On April 14 they dedicated a stone church located in the center of the city, seating 300 or 400 people. Bro. Idleman, of Dixon, was present and won the hearts of the people by his presentation of the truth. At the morning service six united with the church, making 23 at the regular services of the last six months. In the evening the pastor, O. F. Jordan, dedicated the church to God's service in behalf of the people. The church is harmonious and enthusiastic.—O. F. JORDAN.

Shelbyville, April 16.—Just returned from Tower Hill where I baptized six more, including a Methodist preacher and his wife. They are splendid people, sick over divisions and desirous to help answer the Lord's Prayer. Bro. Clark Miller will in all probability preach for the church here a part of the time.—WM. DRUMMET.

Short, April 15.—I am in a meeting here seven days old; three confessions during this meeting. Will continue one week more. Churches that are weak financially and desire a meeting write to me at 7217 S. Broadway, St. Louis, Mo.—M. L. SORNBORGER, evangelist.

Sullivan, April 22.—The First Christian Church of this city has taken on new life under the leadership of Bro. Edwin E. Curry, who began his pastorate here last fall. Many additions to the church from the Sunday-school. Prayer-meetings are growing in attendance and interest. C. W. B. M. recently organized with 18 members. All departments of work are enjoying steady and healthy growth.—JOHN W. PATTERSON, elder.

Thomson, April 15.—Three added since my last report; two from Baptists and one reclaimed.—C. C. CARPENTER.

Watseka, April 22.—One confession and baptism last evening. Over $35 raised by our Sunday-school for the Orphans' Home. Am preaching a series of sermons to young men.—B. S. FERRALL.

INDIANA.

Montezuma, April 18.—The writer just closed an 8 days' meeting at this place which resulted in a complete restoration of the church which had been in confusion for some time, all hearts being once more united, the church being placed upon a solid basis, and seven added. The last night after preaching there was an after-meeting held in which it was decided by a unanimous vote to employ the writer for one-half time. New resolutions were passed and there are brighter prospects than ever. I would like to engage the other half time with neighboring churches. Address me at Montezuma, Ind. Yours for Christ.—W. H. ANDERSON.

Rensselaer, Ind., April 13.—We begin a meeting here April 15, to be held by I. N. Grisso. Two confessions last Sunday evening.—A. L. WARD.

Wabash, April 18.—After the dedication of the new house of worship at Irondale, O., I remained a few nights and preached to large audiences. The immediate results were six happy converts confessed and obeyed their Lord. Other engagements prevented me from protracting the meeting.—L. L. CARPENTER.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Chickasha, April 15.—After evangelizing four months in Oklahoma with 200 additions, I accepted the pastorate of the church at Chickasha, I. T., for six months which covers the time of the Kiowa opening. Have been here three Lord's days and had 13 additions—8 additions yesterday. The house is overcrowded each Sunday evening.—JOHN A. STEVENS.

South McAlester.—One George M. Fortune, at one time one among the greatest Baptist preachers of Texas, and a long time the popular pastor of the First Baptist Church of Paris, Texas, united with the Christian church here yesterday. The Baptists could not stand his attack on Calvinism. He is one among our brainiest lawyers here, just in the prime of life, and will do much valuable service for the Master yet; two more additions yesterday. Additions at almost every service.—J. C. HOWELL.

IOWA.

Cincinnati, April 22.—Bro. R. A. Copple, who has been in Iowa for the past year or two attending Drake University and preaching at different points, closed a three weeks' meeting here last night with 11 additions to the church. The church has been greatly strengthened. Bro. Copple leaves to-morrow for his home at Eugene, Ore. The church here is now without a preacher, but is desirous of employing one as soon as possible for full time. Parties interested may address J. W. Ellis or the writer.—J. H. MAY.

Lehigh, April 16.—Our recent meeting has closed. We had 22 confessions; one by letter; 13 reclaimed. We had large audiences and good interest through meeting. Our work has been built up wonderfully. Pray for us here. Yours in His name.—JOSIE COOPER.

Lehigh, April 18.—The most successful meeting we have had in this church for many years has just closed. It was conducted by Bro. B. F. Hall. There were 35 additions to the church in the short meeting of 18 days. This was a glorious result for Lehigh, for it is a very difficult field in which to labor. Bro. Hall, however, was a suitable man for the work. We have him employed for half time since October last, but the church has now secured him for full time. He found us in a very feeble condition, and we cannot give him too much credit for the good work he has accomplished.—MRS. INDIANA LONGSTAFF.

Marshalltown, April 8.—Our protracted meeting here of five weeks, in which we were assisted by Evangelist W. E. Harlow, with Sister Murphy as leader of song, closed the 7th inst., with 60 added to the church. All were pleased with the manner in which the meeting was conducted.—N. M. IRVIN.

Minburn, April 15.—We began a meeting in this place a little over two weeks ago, with 45 additions to date. We hear nothing but meeting on the streets. Methodists are giving up their creeds and sprinkling, and confessing Christ and being baptized.—UPDIKE AND WEBB.

KANSAS.

Caldwell, Apr. 12.—A splendid revival meeting conducted by Sister Clara H. Hazelrigg, of Topeka, has just closed with 55 additions to the church, 40 to the Sunday-school, 25 to the Christian Endeavor and 13 to the Junior society. The church has been indeed revived and is once more in a fine condition for the Master's work, all of us feeling greatly benefited by Mrs. Hazelrigg's stay here.—E. M. UNSELL.

Chanute, Apr. 13.—Bro. T. A. Hedges has been with us in a two weeks' meeting, and just as people were getting interested we had to close on account of a smallpox scare. Some of the schools had to close. We regretted very much having to close as Bro. Hedges was doing us lasting good. Bro. Hedges will do any church lasting good. His preaching is above the average. There were six confessions, one the last night. This is one of the most difficult fields in the state, but the church is growing.—W. T. ADAMS.

Chanute, April 20.—There have been eight additions here in the last two weeks; seven by confession and baptism and one reclaimed. Others have assured me that they intend to come in and unite with us soon. Our Sunday-school is fine.—W. T. ADAMS.

Chanute, April 20.—There were two additions here last Sunday; one confession and one reclaimed.—W. T. ADAMS.

Ft. Scott, Apr. 13 —On account of smallpox at Norton, Kan., I will not go there for a few days. Will assist our pastor here for a week or two at the close of the union revival by Williams and Alexander.—V. E. RIDENOUR.

Great Bend.—We have our church finished and have been occupying it for three weeks. Have had 22 additions at regular services in the past six weeks.—J. N. MCCONNELL.

Lawrence, Apr. 15.—We had one addition at Salisbury, Missouri, on the fourth Sunday in March. We took the March offering during the month and gave $12 to heathen missions. During the year of my ministry we gave $11.60 to state Bible-school work, for state missions, $10, for home missions $3, to the C. W. B. M. $17.60. We had a number of additions, mostly at regular services. Our Bible-school grew, prayer-meetings and Sunday services were well attended. I regret very much to leave this growing work, but declining health makes it necessary to go west. At my last service the M. E. and Presbyterian pastors dismissed their services and attended ours and gave us many assurances of their good will. On the last Sunday in March we ordained to the gospel ministry Bro. A. C. Yocum, a godly, enthusiastic, able man in the prime of life. Bro. Yocum has served as school teacher and lawyer and in the church work, and now seeks larger usefulness for Christ. He believes in the power as well as in the form of godliness. May his tribe increase and may he become a soul-winner. God bless his work!—K. W. WHITE.

Leavenworth, Apr. 18.—Two additions since last report; one Apr. 7 and one Apr. 14. The writer will deliver the oration on Decoration Day at Elk City, Kan.—S. W. NAY.

Yates Center, April 22.—Nineteen additions in eight days.—R. A. THOMPSON.

MISSOURI.

Carrollton, April 19.—Meeting 10 days old; 20 additions.—R. A. OMER, evangelist; E. H. KELLAR, pastor.

Doniphan, April 17.—Closed a meeting last week at Mill Springs, Mo. There were only seven added, but the church was greatly revived. They had not done anything for years. I organized them and raised funds to repair church house and for pastor, and started them to work for the Master. I also held a meeting since last report at Taskee, Mo., and started them to work to build a church house.—M. H. WOOD, evangelist.

Elvins, April 17.—I am in a meeting at this place; 18 added last night; 20 up to date. This is a town of 1,500 and it is the first work ever done here. I organized the congregation last night and they are proceeding to raise money to build a nice church house. This is a prosperous mining country. There are 10,000 people in this valley inside of five miles square and not a Christian church except the one here.—M. H. WOOD, evangelist.

Kansas City, April 22.—West Side Church, 15 days, 36 added. B. M. Easter, pastor.—R. L. MCHATTON, evangelist.

Kirksville, April 15.—Had six additions to the church here yesterday.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

La Belle, April 22.—Four additions at our regular services yesterday; two by letter and two by confession. Bible-school is flourishing.—J. H. COIL.

Platte City, April 22.—Three confessions last Lord's day—three young ladies from Gaylord Institute. This is my fifth year here. The church is prospering.—E. B. REDD.

Salem, April 15.—House full, good interest and Pastor Davidson is a hustler. Just received a letter from Pres. D. C. Brown, of Centralia Business College, Illinois. "The church here was revived as never before."—HILL AND WILLIAMSON.

Springfield, April 15.—Just closed a good meeting at Everton. Organized congregation with 23 members; $450 raised for new house. Work will begin this week. I go next to Linn Creek to help them finish their house.—JOSEPH GAYLOR.

Springfield, April 16.—Two confessions Sunday at the First Church. Commenced my second year as pastor of this church April 1. During last year there were 65 additions and all missionary days observed.—E. W BOWERS.

NEBRASKA.

Ansley, Apr. 17.—One confession at regular service Sunday morning and audiences best since in Ansley.—JESSE R. TEAGARDEN, pastor.

Cozad, Apr. 8.—Two additions by letter yesterday. On the 4th of March we raised $12.50 for foreign missions.—E. L. POSTON.

Deweese, April 22.—Three additions yesterday; one at Ox Bow last Lord's day. Fine audience and interest both morning and evening.—E. W. YOCUM.

Odell, Apr. 15.—The outlook here is brighter than it has been for years. Bro. Thompson is doing good work for us. Five added yesterday.—O. L. PRICE, clerk.

Salem, April 18.—Five baptisms Wednesday evening at prayer-meeting, three of whom made the confession during the revival, and two, a man 72 years old and his granddaughter 16, made the confession Easter Sunday. Everything prosperous.—W. A. MORRISON.

NEW YORK.

Rochester.—The work is moving with enthusiasm. We have received about 30 since the first of the year at the regular services, nearly all by baptism. Sincerely.—STEPHEN J. COREY.

OHIO.

Dayton, April 15.—Two added yesterday. There have been additions here every week since the Wilson and Huston meeting closed in February.—I. J. CAHILL.

Martin's Ferry.—Just closed a three weeks' meeting with 38 added. Bro. Tylock is pastor here and at Smithfield.—G. H. SIMS.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Perkins, April 13.—We have just closed a two weeks' meeting at Olivet (a Congregational church); seven confessed and were baptized. We will organize in that neighborhood soon.—J. W. GARNER.

ONTARIO.

Bowmanville, April 15.—I helped in a meeting at Cecil Street Church, Toronto, in March, 15 additions, and at Wychwood, a suburb of Toronto, in February, with nine additions. All things moving on pleasantly here.—B. H. HAYDEN.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Williamsport, April 15.—We had four confessions here yesterday. This makes nine confessions since the close of our meeting three weeks ago.—C. A. BRADY.

Sharon, April 15.—Our apportionment for foreign missions is raised. The missionary spirit is growing here. We expect Bro. W. F. Cowden on April 30th, in interest of May offering. Work is in a hopeful condition.—C. C. WAITE, pastor.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Orangeburg, April 18.—Ten added here since last report; two by letter, four from the Baptists, one from the Presbyterians, three from the world.—M. B. INGLE.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Tyndall.—The church here was organized last October as the result of a meeting held by G. W. Elliott. A tabernacle cost $1,500 was dedicated Dec. 30. Since then there have been 19 additions, 15 by baptism. Bro. Elliott held a four weeks' meeting at Wagner and organized another church, numbering 18. We have a Sunday-school with an enrollment of 92, the writer being superintendent, and a Y. P. S. C. E. of 50 members. We raised over $20 for foreign missions.—C. W. REYNOLDS.

TEXAS.

San Antonio, April 14.—Wilson and Huston meeting one week old. Moved to grand opera house to-night. House packed and shall continue in opera house indefinitely. Additions to date 37; 31 to-day.—JAY E. ADAMS.

UTAH.

Salt Lake City, April 16.—Three added by letter here Sunday.—W. H. BAGBY.

April's Return.

A flush is on the woodland,
A song is in the hedge;
The meadow wan is fair again,
For April keeps her pledge.

A thrill with every heartbeat,
A rapture touched with sighs;
New lustre on the soul of Life,
Tears in my happy eyes.

The Wisdom of Reuben.

By Morton H. Pemberton.

[From an Unpublished Lecture.]

Some mothers think more about their daughters' heels than their heads. I went once to see a mother about sending her daughter away to college. She lived in a small town and felt too big for her town. She said, "Yes, I am going to send daughter off to college. There is no society here. It is so dreadfully dull for young people. The young men all work. My husband hates so much to have us live here in this small place, but then, you know, his business is here. But daughter will go away to school—to some finishing school. She has finished grammar, arithmetic and geography. We want her now to take a finishing course in music and elocution and painting and dancing."

"Daughter is very bright. I have kept her at home and tried to instill my own ideas into her, but now we think it would be better to send her away from home for a while, where she will learn to rely upon herself. We want to get her ready to visit Paris. She has been studying French this summer, and we want her now to take French for a few months, so she can say French phrases and feel at home in Paris."

Boys, how would you like to have such stock in your wife's pedigree? If I were to be born again, and nature offered me such a woman for a mother, I would insist on being born an orphan.

I tell you, it is a grand thing to have a true woman for a mother. Give me the mother who wants her children educated because it will help them to be men and women. Give me the mother who is not ashamed of her husband's employment, and the community in which she lives, and who teaches her children that life is but one grand opportunity to work with God for the uplifting of man. Give me the mother who gathers her little ones about her knee at evening time and teaches them to say, "Now I lay me down to sleep," and "Our Father who art in heaven." Give me the mother who teaches her boy that he owes to the world a righteous and a useful life, and that the people are waiting for him to pay it. Give me the mother who teaches her daughter that she can obtain no higher title or position in this world than wife of a citizen born and reared under the grandest flag that ever waved upon the breezes of heaven. Give me the mother who teaches her children "that the world is a college, that events are teachers, that happiness is the graduating point, and that character is the diploma God gives to man."

I am asked to say a few words about love.

Well, girls, there are a great many things about love that can't be said. But I believe in love—I've got a big conception of love.

Love quickens the imagination, stimulates the muscles of the arms, and makes lazy young people wake up and take exercise. Love makes the young boy wash his face and brush his hair, and it makes the young girl put her complexion on straight. It lengthens skirts, and puts away knee-pants. It keeps up the price of quicksilver and glass.

This early period is love's awakening. And, don't you know, I believe the best time to love is the first time. Then everything is so tender and delicious and new. Young lovers are so gentle. A boy feeling the first flame of love is so kind that he would not even disturb the comfort of a sleepy kitten by the fireside. It is like being born again—only this time you have teeth.

Young lovers are in a new heaven and everything seems made for a new purpose. The earth was made to run buggies over, and to sprout trees to hang hammocks on. The moon was made to shine for two. The stars were made to make—not so much light. The day was made for the evening's outing. Dish-washing and wood-splitting are relics of the past. All things physical and commonplace are fretting. But it is the happy time and we have all been there.

Love makes the young girl leave a Brussels carpet in her father's house and walk on a rag carpet—or no carpet at all. Love makes a man work in the sunshine, and it makes him walk in the rain. Love makes the dignified Professor, LL. D., Ph. D., lay aside his book and say, "tum to papa."

We are often asked, how can a girl tell when a man really loves her? I will tell you. If he is a country boy and rides a mule four or five miles every Sunday for six months, and sits for several hours at a time, without telling you that he loves you, it is a pretty good sign that he likes you. But if he is a town or student sport, and strolls by every two or three weeks, with cane in hand and cigarette alight, and joins you in the hammock on a bright summer evening, when the moon is sprinkling its soothing light through the leaves of the trees,—you had better look out. That fellow's love is not more than arm-length.

Before we leave this subject of boys and girls, let us ask, why is it that young men are not as good and pure as young ladies? Because society is more particular about clothes and money than it is about character and morals. Because a young man can go one hour to the saloon and drink his intoxicating beverage, and go the next hour and drink at the punch-bowl of the finest parlor in town. Because too many society girls will let a young man who goes one evening with unchaste women, go the next evening with them.

Eats Clothes

If your washing medium does that, what matters its cheapness or its working power? Is it safe? That's the first thing. Some imitations of PEARLINE are not safe. They eat the clothes, slowly, but surely. Don't experiment. You are sure of PEARLINE; stick to it; it is standard, tested, proved, by years of use and millions of women. 638

Let women be as jealous of the conduct and character of men as men are of the conduct and character of women, and men will be better. Let women demand that men shall come nearer to the high standard which men have erected, and by which they measure and judge women, and they will have purer sweethearts and truer husbands.

Young man, the "wild oats" theory has been exploded. The man who sows his wild oats will be ashamed of his crop. A man cannot afford to do anything to-day that he will regret to-morrow. Do not sprinkle dark spots upon the white garment of your soul, thinking that at some future time, by some magic touch, it can be made white again.

Remember that the one important thing in life is character. Character is the only thing we can take to the other side with us. As the great scientist Humboldt says, "The earth, religion, property, books, are nothing but the scaffolding with which to build a man. Earth holds up no fruit to her Master but the finished man."

His Fifteen Claims.

Outside the gates of an English college there stood an old soldier, who earned a living from the charity of the passers-by. The more effectively to excite their generosity, he bore upon his breast a placard with this moving appeal: "Battles, four; wounds five; children six; total, fifteen."

Fifteen such claims to sympathy were truly irresistible.

"I do not believe," said the scientific mother, "in telling a child ghost stories to frighten him when he is naughty. When Clifford is naughty I explain the germ theory to him and have him look through a microscope at bacteria. It frightens him terribly, and at the same time inculcates scientific knowledge."—Detroit Journal.

A Translation.

Man grows to likeness of the things he loves,
And doth himself take on the image of Whatever gods he worships.
Though our prayers
May not bring down the blessings that we seek.
There flows in through them to the opened soul
A something of the essence and the strength
Of whate'er power we ask them. Though our words
May break in meaning on no sentient ear,
If but they rise above our bended heads
They lift the soul up with them, and we find,
If not the one we fondly sought, perhaps,
A far diviner answer to our faith.

The Little Rosebud.

By Alice May Douglas.

There was a bit of crape on the door of the large brick house, and Mrs. Beman in the little brown house across the street was the first to notice it.

"Miss Stokes must have gone," said Mrs. Beman with a sigh, as she put the irons upon the stove, for it was Tuesday.

"Miss Stokes," repeated the younger woman to whom the remark was addressed, "O yes, she's the one who sent you the rose, isn't she, mother?"

"The very one, and a heap o' comfort it has been to me too. There, I believe I've got all the irons on. I'll put the polisher on, long's I've got some of Katy's white dresses to do up."

"You have them to do up," laughed Maud, "but unless I'm very much mistaken, I'm the one to do up the dresses of my own little girlie, even if I am company."

"Not when her grandma's round," retorted Mrs. Beman in a voice that dismissed all further controversy. "But I cannot help thinking of poor Miss Stokes. But I don't suppose we ought to wish her back. She's gone to heaven, if any one ever did. I'd like to have seen her afore she went and to have thanked her for that little rose. 'Twan't the rose I minded so much as to think that she, she a rich man's daughter, should ha' sent it to a poor widow like me."

"That was a little thing for her to do, mother," observed Maud, as she stepped to the window to view the crape.

"I don't think it is a little thing, Maud Jenks, for a woman with all her money to think on the likes of me, and I 'preciated it, I did."

Mrs. Beman pushed back her gray hair which was falling over her low forehead, then she wiped the tears from her eyes and took out the ironing board so that it would be all ready for those dear little white dresses. She blamed herself a little for having been so downcast over Miss Stokes' death when she had looked forward with so much pleasure to the "doing up" of Katy's pretty clothes. She had not ironed any little dresses since Maud herslf was a little girl, oh so long ago, and she almost feared she had about forgotten how to go about the task, yet she would trust it to no one else—not even to Maud, for was not Katy her first, her only, grandchild and who but a grandmother could do them up as they should be?

Maud went into the sitting room and took up her crochet work, now and then stopping to give Katy advice in regard to the doll's cloak the little one was making. The door was open into the kitchen and she could hear her mother talking to herself, a habit she had acquired by reason of being so much alone.

"I do wish I had a flower to send to the poor dear," said Mrs. Beman. "She was always a-sending me flowers, the dear soul, and ice cream and other good things from their parties, but I have never, never, never had a rose, and that is an old fashioned one, even if she did give it to me."

On hearing these words Katy left her doll and sewing in the corner where she had been sitting upon the floor and crept to the window, where stood the rose. It was in a tin can, for the pot in which it had been given had been long since broken. It was a small plant and full of buds, one of which was of quite a size. They would doubtless open on the morrow. At least its petals—a red, close bordering a magenta—promised as much.

"I think the rose is pretty, grandma," cried Katy, holding her chubby hand as near as she dared to the bud, which was not very near for she had been warned many times against blighting buds by touching them.

"It is nothing but a cheap rose, dearie" called back Mrs. Beman. "It is one somebody way up in the country sent Miss Stokes. They don't keep plants over there on account of the gas or steam or something or other, so she sent it over to me, but I like it just as well as if it was yaller and had come from the hothouse, because she sent it."

"A cheap flower," repeated the child, looking admiringly at the bud. "What makes it cheap? What makes other flowers not cheap? Is a flower that God makes cheap?"

But the child had no more time for such thoughts for her grandmother now called out, "Just watch for the paper boy, dearie. I will get the News and see when Miss Stokes' funeral is to be. It is lucky that rich folks and poor folks have one thing in common and that is the newspaper."

The irons were now hot and Mrs. Beman began work upon those dainty gowns. She had been looking forward to this hour ever since Maud had written that she and Katy were coming for a week. She had not minded at all when the little girl had soiled her frocks, for the more there were soiled the more there would be to wash and iron. Little had the fond grandmother thought that this hour would be saddened in so unexpected a way. She had not even heard until the night before that Miss Stokes was sick. "But after all, it is a comfort to have something to take up my mind and to keep me busy at this time," she said to herself as she nervously smoothed out a tiny ruffle before putting the iron to it.

"Here he is, grandma, I'll knock on the window to him!" called a shrill little voice from the sitting room.

While Maud went to the door for a paper, Mrs. Beman had hunted up her glasses. She now "let the irons heat" while she searched over the pages of the great sheet until she had found the deaths. "Here it is, Maud," she said, "To-morrow P. M. at three o'clock. 'P. M.'—that means afternoon, don't it?"

Without waiting for an answer Mrs. Beman buried her face in the paper and through the sobs that emerged therefrom, Maud knew how deeply her mother was affected by the death of the young lady.

An absorbing chapter of inside political history, telling of the secret magnanimity that marked the behavior of two open enemies at a great crisis in their lives.

She wished to speak a word of comfort but finally concluded that it would be wiser to say nothing. Little Kate drew up close to her grandmother, tenderly stroked her soft white hair, pressed a silent kiss upon the brow, but spoke no word. Then she returned to her place by the tiny rose bush.

"And I shall never see Miss Stokes again, not even see her sweet cold face in death," Mrs. Beman suddenly broke out. "But if I only had a flower to send the poor dear—just one—just one! Then her folks would laugh at my sending just one and I couldn't afford to buy a whole dozen as others do."

"But they will have enough roses, even if you don't send one," ventured Maud.

"It isn't that, dear. It isn't that. It is because I loved the dear girl so much. It is to comfort myself and not them. They don't need any of my sympathy. But she was always so kind to me. Many a morning she was down at her window when I was at this one and she would always have a smile and bow for me and it is not many smiles and bows the rich have for the poor, it isn't. I would send my own little rosebud, but the rest of the Stokes would just poke fun at it. They're so stuck up."

"One who would laugh at a kindness, no matter how humble it is, never deserves another," ventured Maud. "At least that is what I say."

Nothing more was said on the subject. Maud returned to her fancy work. Mrs. Beman decided that the irons were hot nough to continue their honored job,—

Katy went back to her corner and whispered something to her doll, something which must have been very pleasant if one could judge by the bright look on her pale face.

The next morning Katy was awake very early. She crept out of her little bed in the room next to the one occupied by her mother and grandmother, and in her bare feet stealthily slipped down the back stairs. The night before she had left the sitting-room door ajar so that she could glide into this room without being heard. She now ran on tiptoe up to the window and looked at the rose. The first sunbeam of the day had touched it and had partially opened the bud. "Just what I wanted," she said to herself, her eyes sparkling with pleasure. "You darling rose, you are just beautiful. Just right to take to Miss Stokes and I will take you there,—yes, I will, for that is where you belong. I will do anything for my grandma. Just see how hard she worked to do up my dresses and she lets me wear a white one here all the time and that is what I cannot do at home."

Then the wee girlie slipped back to bed and to sleep and did not awaken again until her grandma—no, no, I mean her mother, called her, for what grandma would ever dream of such a thing as waking her grandchild!

Nothing was said during breakfast about Miss Stokes' death, nor while the two women were doing up the work. Katy was worried during all the time for fear her purpose would be discovered and Mrs. Beman on seeing her so quiet declared that she must be sick, and consequently she brought out a piece of her pound cake and opened a jar of preserves—excellent food for invalids—and to such treatment the little girl did not object in the least.

"P'raps I'll feel better if I go and take a walk," ventured the young schemer after a while.

"As likely as not," acquiesced the grandmother, "and here's a penny for you to spend at the store round the corner. Don't go any farther than that—will you, dear?"

"O no," answered Katy, "and I will go out of the front door, long's I'm company."

Both mother and grandmother laughed at this bright speech. As for Katy, she went to the window to see in which direction to go to reach the corner, and while there she took up a pair of scissors she had previously placed near, cut off the rosebud, hid it in the bosom of her dress which came up to meet her guimpe and went through the front door on to the street.

Katy did not go to the store, however. The cent lay all forgotten in the pocket of her dress. She went directly to the front door of the stately house. She pressed the bell button with all courage and was all ready with her speech when a servant opened to her.

"I came to see Miss Stokes' mother," she said.

"But Mrs. Stokes is in great trouble and cannot see anyone," replied the servant.

"But I have brought her some comfort and can't go 'way 'thout seeing her," persisted the child.

"Well, you may step in and I will see what she says."

So Katy stepped into the beautiful large hall and entertained herself in looking at its pictures and statuary, while the servant bore her errand to the mistress of the mansion.

In a few moments the servant came back saying, "Mrs. Stokes says for you to go right into the library. She is so broken up over her trouble that I'm thinking she imagines it will take her mind off of it a moment by seeing you, but you had better not stay very long, I'm thinking."

So Katy was shown to the library and left there in the presence of a tall woman whose eyes were very red from much crying and whose beautiful black hair was somewhat out of order, giving one the impression that she had been laying her head against the arm of the large chair she was occupying.

"And whose little girl may this be?" asked the lady, kindly,

"I'm grandma's girl. Grandma lives in the little brown house across the road," answered Katy, her eyes open in wonderment at the number of books about the room.

"And won't you be seated, my dear?"

"I must go right back. Grandma did not know that I was coming and here's the rosebud." With these words the child took the rosebud from her dress and handed it to Mrs. Stokes.

"So this is what you meant by bringing me comfort, is it?" queried the woman. "I thank you very much."

"It is my grandma you ought to thank," replied Katy. "She's been crying ever since she saw the crape on the door. She loved your girl and she wanted to send her something. She hadn't money to buy a lot of roses, and if she had she'd rather have sent this for—for—why, you see Miss Stokes gave her a plant that this came from and grandma was so pleased because your girl thought of her. She was afraid you'd—you'd—well, that you'd think funny if she sent you just this little bud, but she wanted to send you something so much that I cut the bud off and brought it without her knowing it, or mamma either, and I think the bud is kind of pretty, don't you? Just a little kind of."

"It is very pretty and it was so sweet of you to bring it to me," answered Mrs. Stokes, stooping to kiss the little face.

"How glad grandma will be when I tell her you was pleased with the bud," said Katy in a cheery voice. "She must have loved your girl ever so lots and she cried 'cause she could never see her again, 'not even her sweet cold face in death,' that is the way she said it."

"Tell your grandmother that I am more pleased with her flower than with any I have received and they have been ever so many."

"I expect they have," said Katy innocently. "I've seen lots of bundles go to your house."

"And tell her," continued Mrs. Stokes, "that if she will come over a little before the funeral, I will myself show her the sweet face of my darling."

Katy simply nodded her head in assent, and remembering the servant's warning, made her way out of the house.

Her grandmother and mother were greatly surprised, but not in the least offended when she told them of her errand across the street.

Mrs. Beman, taking her grandchild with her, went as requested to the house of mourning, a little before the time for the services. As the mother led the way to the white casket in which lay the fair form which had so recently parted company with its pure soul, Mrs. Beman noticed the rosebud in the marble hand. So intense was her feeling that she trembled like an aspen before the winds of fall. After looking for a few moments in silence at the quiet cold face before her, she pointed to the rosebud and said, "So you was pleased with it, after all."

"More so than with any other remembrance. That is why I let it be the last flower to be held by that dear hand that when warm held so many. These other beautiful pinks and roses were grown by strangers, although sent her by friends—but your remembrance was not that—it had been grown and loved by yourself. You were thinking of my precious Celia constantly as you watched it grow. I have chosen for her hand just the one she would have chosen, could she speak."

"Yes, just the one," acquiesced Mrs. Beman.

College Orators Seldom Get Over It.

Very few young men recover from the experience of winning a state contest. There are exceptions but there has to be something intervene to save the winner from future obscurity. He is usually filled with self-complacency that he never recovers. To get beat in a state contest usually has beneficial effect on a young man. Bryan got second place in an Illinois contest. The winner's name is lost to fame. Dr. William Alford Quayle got second place in the state contest in Kansas in 1885. The winner at last accounts was teaching school at $35 a month while two great cities, Indianapolis and Kansas City, were struggling to get Quayle as their preacher and men talk of him, although young, as good timber for bishop. The winner of the state contest in Kansas in 1891 was one of the easiest winners the state ever had. Since then he has amounted to nothing, until within the last year, when he seems to have rsalized that he must be up and doing unless he wants to see failure written over his life's work. There is a southern Kansas lawyer who won the state contest in the latter 80's and has been giving sections of his speech every opportunity he has had since. That is one of the secrets of the failure of these men. They concluded that the oration they won on was the ne plus ultra of oratorical composition and they are content to chew the cud of past achievement. The man who got beat felt that he would have to do better. He set himself about getting up new orations while the other was working off his chef-d'œuvre whenever opportunity offered. That is why Quayle is one of the greatest orators of the American pulpit while his successful rival is no bigger to-day than he was fifteen years ago.

There is another thing about these college orations. The standard is not of the kind that men in real life admire. No speaker who has ever amounted to anything has been without idiosyncrasies that would have caused some elocution judge to mark him down on delivery. The same sort of delivery that men like in a speaker would be considered atrociously faulty in a contest. The standard is artificial and arbitrary. There is a certain polish about the delivery that wins these contests but for the rough and tumble experiences of the orator in real life the training that a contest gives is of very little service.—Missouri Herald.

Presence of Mind.

There have been many picturesque stories of hold-ups in Chicago, but none that shows quite so much presence of mind as the tale told by George Ade in his little book, "Doc' Horne." In the book it forms one of the hero's largest and least reliable romances, and it may not be generally known that it is derived, nevertheless, from a real experience.

Mr. Ade has walked the streets of Chicago at all hours of the day and night and has become so familiar with many types of character that he is really equal to any emergency. But he never proved it so effectually as on this particular occasion. He was returning home through deserted streets at an early hour of the morning, when he suddenly became conscious that he was being followed by two disreputable figures. He understood at once that his turn had come, and it came at an unpleasant moment—one of those rare moments when the journalist was liberally supplied with money. He had an instant to set his wits to work, for the thugs were half a block away, and he managed in that time to transfer his roll of bills to a stamped envelope which he carried in his pocket. Then he looked for a pencil to address the letter, but to his consternation found that he had none.

Turning sharply upon his pursuers, when they were still fifty feet away, he disarmed them by asking, with much courtesy, for a pencil. Somewhat disconcerted, one of the men fished one out of his pocket and handed it to Mr. Ade, who rapidly wrote his own address upon the envelope as they stood under the lamp-post, and put the letter, sealed and addressed, into the mail-box. Then he looked his assailants in the eye and told them what he had done. Sheepish as they were under his implied accusation and the helplessness of their defeat, they were not without appreciation of his readiness and nerve. "Say, but you're a good 'un!" was the admiring tribute of the taller of the two.—The Standard (Bap).

"As for the clergy, they're a pretty poor lot," said a grumbling layman. "Yes," returned the bishop, "some of them are poor indeed. But consider the stock from which they come! You see we have to make them out of laymen."

"Miss Bink is such a cultured girl." "Why do you say that?" "She can be so rude in the politest way you ever saw."

PETE.

XV.—Linda May's Party.

Nothing particular happened Thursday, so let's get to Friday at once, for I am anxious to go to Linda May's party; maybe they'll have bananas. We can get our lessons Saturday. So come on and let's put on our prettiest dresses and our newest shoes and stockings, and get out our Sunday hats and hatpins and our mothers' perfumery-bottles, and get our hair out of the papers in which it has been imprisoned all day long. Pretty near ready? Goodness! What if we're late! Here comes Linda May to take Madge to the party; Madge is going to help her entertain. Madge says she'd rather go with Linda May than with Arthur Pendleton, anyway! My! isn't Linda May dressed up! And Madge! They don't look like everyday girls, now. Well, look at Pete! What's the matter with her? Sure enough, her mother won't let her go. There stands Pete in her old apron and school-dress, just as if there were no parties in the world. "Wish you could go," says Madge. Pete wipes away a tear and then begins to whistle. "I got to be punished," she says with a grin. "But I'll go as far as the front gate." So all three go to the front gate, when what does Pete see but Letitia Pendleton, dressed up in a delightful blue silk that looks extremely grown-up. "I'll go with you," says Letitia to Linda May and Madge.

"Oh, Letitia!" wailed Pete, as she hung on the gate. "Oh, you told me a STO-O-RY!" "Whaddi tell you?" said Letitia, buttoning her lavender glove. She couldn't help feeling immeasurably superior to Pete just then, because Pete's dress looked so common in the general display. "You said your mamma wasn't going to let you go to the party. And now you're just dressed to kill!" "Well," said Letitia, "I just set in to-day and begged and begged papa, till at last he said to mamma she'd better let that child go. So good-by, Pete." "You're such an awful good begger," said Pete, "spose you come in and try it on my mamma!" "No," said Letitia, "I can't move women. If it was a man I'd try. I think you ought to be glad I'm getting to go, Pete, even if you can't go." "Well, I ain't glad. I haf to stay tome and you ought to haf to stay tome." But come on, and let's leave Pete sulking on her gate. We are going to the party. Here we are. The girls are all in the parlor, sitting on chairs, afraid to spoil their ruffles. They feel strange and noble in their new dresses, and they talk in soft foreign voices. Listen at the whooping out in the yard! They are our male guests. As soon as the boys arrive they stop in the yard and begin to "wrastle" and chase each other. They are trying to get up enough courage to go in where the girls are. "Why don't those boys come in the house?" says Linda May. "Do they think I invited them to visit aunt Dollie's blue grass?" "Let's go out and see what they're doing," says Letitia. So some of the girls go out in the yard. The boys, seeing them, become quite delirious in their scuffling, hoping thus to attract attention. Legs and arms mingle in a bewildering panorama. "Oh, boys, come on in the house," remonstrates Letitia. "This ain't any fun for us." "Let's go in," says Freckle Ridgeway, one of the boldest of boys. "I'll back you up," shouts Ned Tompkins, using a loud voice to keep up his courage. The boys pause in their wrestling, and make a bold break for the house, rush into the parlor, perch on chairs, and giggle. Now we have 'em all housed together. "The first game we're to play," says Linda May, "is my birthday game." "How you play it?" pipes up Jim Pimlins, who immediately becomes embarrassed, and pinches Freckle, who returns the pinch. "Let's play something we know already how to play," says Freckle; "something with kissing in it." "Aw! aw! aw!" groan the boys. "I'll kiss you, Freckle," says Ned, "if that's what you want." Ned starts toward Freckle. "Now boys," remonstrates Letitia. "Now, Miss Prim!" says Ned. "No," says Linda May "you must play my birthday game first. You know I'm twelve years old. Well, you all sit in a row along the wall—" "Come on, and get in a row," says Ned. "Here, Jim Pimlins, you ain't in a row." "You leave me alone, Freckle Ridgeway, I'm listening to the boss. Go on, Linda May."

"Well, the game is, each person has to tell something that there are only twelve of, and that are generally mentioned together." "That's too deep for me," says Ned, "you Chalky Martin, you quit stickin' me with that pin." ("Ain't those boys dreadful!" murmurs Letitia.) "I'll illustrate what I mean," says Linda May, who is standing in the middle of the floor. "Yes," says Ned, "give us some pictures." "Suppose the number was Seven. Well, you could say Days of the Week; or The Seven Wise Men of Greece, or Seven Wonders of the World, or—or some other seven. Well, this game you take Twelve and do the same with it. Now come on. I'll begin at this end; and if you can't think of a Twelve, you pay a forfeit." "Is there any kissing in it?" persisted Freckle. "I wouldn't play kissing games," said Linda May. "Why Linda May Dudley!" piped up Chalky Martin, "when you was at Letitia's party, didn't you get kissed in King William was King James's son? I wonder what your aunt Dollie would have said!" "I wasn't kissed!" retorted Linda May. "You was!" cried Chalky. "I kissed you, myself!" "And I seen it done," testified Freckle; "Oh, come on, let's begin!" "Well, I'm first in the row," said Madge, "and I'm glad of it, for I've thought of a Twelve, and I want to say it before anybody else does. It's the Twelve Commandments." At this there was a roar. "It ain't fair!" "They wasn't but Ten Commandments." "They wasn't no Twelve Commandments!" She caught her breath, and paid her forfeit. Next came Letitia who said "Twelve months in the year." Jim thought of "Twelve tribes of Israel." Ned said "Twelve labors of Hercules." Another remembered "Twelve signs of the Zodiac." At first Freckle couldn't think of a twelve, so Linda May began counting on him. But she hadn't got up to "twelve" when he shouted "Linda May!" Chalky said, "Twelve apostles." Then it was Arthur Pendleton's time. Arthur, who had been very quiet all evening, couldn't think of a Twelve. He was unhappy, because Madge was "mad at him." He had never seen Madge look so beautiful, and when he remembered that he had refused to "bring her," he felt like slipping back home to brood. So he had to pay a forfeit, for the very next one said "Twelve Cæsars!" When the game was over, Linda May held something over Arthur's head and said, "Heavy, heavy hangs over YOUR poor head." "Finer Superfine?" said Arthur. "Superfine." "Well," said Arthur, "she has to eat supper by my side; I mean if you're going to have supper." "I won't do it!" cried Madge. "He knew that was my handkerchief." "I didn't!" said Arthur. "Would I a-said for her to sit by me fide known it was her. Not much! I don't want her to sit by me. I'll let her off." "You can't!" cried the children. "That ain't fair. You've got to eat by her and she's got to eat by you." "Well, he'll get sick of it," said Madge; "I'll never say 'Boo' to him! Let's go out doors and play. I'm tired of the house." "Maybe we haven't got time before supper," said the cautious Jim Pimlins. "To bed, to bed, said Sleepy Head!" chanted Ned; "and Jim Pimlins is the third line of that poetry." "Oh, they's plenty time," said Linda May, "come, and we'll play Silence in the Courtyard." "Surely," said Freckle as they poured out of the house, "surely you kiss in that game?"

A GOOD DEAL OF NONSENSE

About "Blood Purifiers" and "Tonics."

Every drop of blood, every bone, nerve and tissue in the body can be renewed in but one way, and this is, from wholesome food properly digested. There is no other way and the idea that a medicine in itself can purify the blood or supply new tissues and strong nerves is ridiculous and on a par with the folderol that dyspepsia or indigestion is a germ disease or that other fallacy, that a weak stomach which refuses to digest food can be made to do so by irritating and inflaming the bowels by pills and cathartics.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets cure indigestion, sour stomach, gas and bloating after meals because they furnish the digestive principles which weak stomachs lack, and unless the deficiency of pepsin and diastase is supplied it is useless to attempt to cure stomach trouble by the use of "tonics," "pills" and "cathartics" which have absolutely no digestive power, and their only effect is to give a temporary stimulation.

One grain of the active principle in Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will digest 3,000 grains of meat, eggs and similar foods and experiments have shown that they will do this in a glass bottle at proper temperature, but of course are more effective in the stomach.

There is probably no remedy so universally used as Stuart's Tablets because it is not only the sick and ailing, but well people who use them at every meal to insure perfect digestion and assimilation of the food.

People who enjoy fair health take Stuart's Tablets as regularly as they take their meals, because they want to keep well. Prevention is always better than cure, and Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets do both; they prevent indigestion and they remove it where it exists. The regular use of one or two of them after meals will demonstrate their merit and efficiency better than any other argument.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and, therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address,

Jesus and Peter.*

Twice had Jesus appeared to his disciples during the eight days following his resurrection from the dead. Several times had he showed himself to individuals. Even doubting Thomas was now convinced, and shared with the others their jubilant and hopeful spirit. It may seem strange, at first thought, that the Master revealed himself thus, at intervals only, and did not rather resume the close comradeship of the former days. But he would have his followers understand that the old life of humiliation and sacrifice was forever ended. His mission to the world was fulfilled and he would no longer tread the broad ways wherein the sinful multitude had once seen and heard and rejected him. Besides, he would accustom his disciples to his absence, which was soon to lay the burden of a great responsibilty upon their shoulders. Hence he granted to them these few and brief interviews, which, by the memory of those which were past, and the anticipation of others that might be enjoyed, flooded their souls with the new light of the gospel, and exalted them to the mountain heights of expectation. "With every dawn these rugged men, grown gentle and dreamy, hushed to awe, trembling with expectancy, awoke to say, Will he come today? At nightfall they asked one of another; Have you seen him? Have you?"

At the time of Jesus' resurrection, he had declared that he would meet with his disciples again in Galilee. His several appearances on the first day, together with the continuance of the Passover feast, which always lasted a full week, sufficed to keep them in Jerusalem until the second Lord's day, at which time he met with the full company of the apostles, in the sacred upper room. Perhaps he then repeated his promise to meet them in beloved Galilee. At any rate, they very soon after made their way home again, and waited for his coming. The blue waters of the familiar lake invited them to their old calling, which has ever had a charm for all who try to live near to nature's heart. At the suggestion of Peter, they put out in their boat, and fish all night without success. Returning at the first faint sign of dawn, they see standing on the beach the dim outline of a form. In kindly accents they hear the question, "Children, have ye any meat?" Answering in the negative, they are directed by the stranger to drop their net on the right side of the boat, which they do, and find it immediately filled with fishes. John, whose loving heart had perhaps half guessed the truth already, said to Peter, "It is the Lord." Impulsive Peter, girding his coat about him, sprang into the water, and swam the hundred yards to the shore. The others followed, and shared with the Master the humble meal of bread and fish he had provided for them. While they were seated around the fire eating, the conversation in our lesson occurred.

"Simon, son of Jonas, or John, lovest thou me more than these?" Peter was startled and confused. The name Jesus called him by was the old one, which he seldom heard since his Master had named him Peter, the "Rockman." But his wavering and cowardly conduct had belied his title, and he felt with shame that Jesus was thinking of his downfall in the high priest's palace. The very question of the Master cut him to the heart. "Lovest thou me more than these?" Had he not claimed to do so? Though all men should deny thee, yet will I never deny thee, he had boldly affirmed, and then had straightway, with oaths and curses, rejected his Lord. Poor Peter! Bitter is the cup he must drink, but his own hand had prepared it, and it was not well that he should ever forget the end of his foolish presumption. How humble is his answer, "Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee!" But no invidious contrast will he now make between himself and others. Conscious of his weakness, he is likewise conscious of his love, and appeals boldly to the heart of his gracious Lord for confirmation of his declaration. "Feed my lambs," is the gentle reply of Jesus. Accept this lowly mission and learn by ministering to the least of my children that the highest glory is that of unselfish service.

Presently the same question falls from the Master's lips, and again Peter meekly responds, "Thou knowest that I love thee." "Tend my sheep," is the added injunction of the Great Shepherd. Be a faithful under shepherd, and guide as well as feed your flock. A third time the Savior asks, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" The apostle was grieved with this repeated questioning of his love, and the Savior meant that he should be. He had thrice repudiated his Lord, and at a time when he needed friends as never before. He must be forever cured of the cowardice which should make its repetition possible. Possibly, too, it was a kindness to him to give him opportunity to thrice confess his love. In any event, the grief he felt at Jesus' questioning could be but slight in comparison with that which his Master felt, when he had said, "I do not know the man!" The penitent apostle could only answer, "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." Again the sweet command was given, "Feed my sheep." This command Peter never forgot nor disobeyed.

But the dear Lord never wounds, but that he follows it with healing. He had rebuked the apostle for his faithlessness, in a manner he could never forget. He would now honor him before all his comrades, so that this scene of penitence would not be cast in the face of Peter in after years. So Jesus tells the apostels that in his old age he shall glorify God by giving his life a willing offering for the faith he had just professed. This prophecy had been fulfilled when John wrote his gospel, for Peter had, many years before this, been crucified in Rome, his zeal being manifest, as well as his humility, by his request that he be crucified head downward, since he was not worthy to be crucified as was his Master. How grateful to the heart of Peter must have been these gracious words from his Lord, and what the firm purpose in his soul to prove himself worthy of them.

Turning as though he would go away, Jesus said to Peter, "Follow me." He instantly obeyed, but had taken only a step until he looked at the beloved disciple, John, and asked Jesus what he had for him to do. The reply is a rebuke to that spirit which is ever more anxious to see the duties of others done than our own. "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou me!" To every man his own task. The neglect of another will be no excuse for ourselves. To his own master each man standeth or falleth. From these words of Jesus there had arisen in the early church a tradition that John should not die till the Lord returned. But he himself says, in the words that follow our lesson, that no such promise was implied in the words of the Master. Yet in a true sense he did not die till he had seen the Lord. All the rest of the apostles had gone to their final reward, it is probable, when Jesus did appear in glory to this aged apostle, in the island of Patmos, where he was suffering banishment as a servant and preacher of Jesus Christ. In this sense he did tarry till his Master came. But not till added years had crowned his head with their white diadem of glory did the Master finally come to take to himself the last of his faithful and obedient messengers. The closing words of the vision of Patmos may well have been the dying prayer of every apostolic saint, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus!"

TOPIC FOR MAY 5.

Decision of Character.

(Rev. 3:14-16; Prov. 4:23-27.)

A vacillating and indecisive soul, one that hesitates and forms diverse decisions in a day, one that is driven about with every wind and tossed, having but the stability of a wave of the sea, can do no great and worthy work in the world. No wonder the Lord would spew out of his mouth a man or a church characterized by such lukewarmness.

No employer would long keep a worker who could decide nothing for himself, but must hesitate and delay and ask a thousand questions before getting down to business. What is needed in the business world is a salesman or a commercial traveler, a clerk, mechanic, or superintendent who can take his message to Garcia, who can be sure he's right then go ahead.

So, in military science, the quality of perhaps greatest renown in a general is the power to decide quickly and firmly. A general who hesitates, and marches up hill only to march down again, is deserving of recall by his government and is likely to get his deserts. Give us a man who can, like Grant, decide, even against the counsels of his captains, to do the impossible, and then do it—take his Vicksburg. Deliver us from men like McClellan who can make up their minds to no course of action, and who allow their men to perish of fevers in camps rather than of honorable wounds in battle. It is better to make a rash decision than none at all. In war, he who doubts is damned.

Now, if Paul so often finds his best illustration in the language of war, why not we? Is it not true that in the fight of life in which we are engaged this same boldness and decisiveness is necessary, if we would win? He who stands forever doubting which course of conduct to pursue will do nothing worthy. Better make some honest mistakes and stir things up in the world than to die of moral and religious stagnation, doing nothing. There are some persons who never appear in any enterprise, but they make things boil. They are never lukewarm, tepid, insipid. They may cause friction and take the very skin off, sometimes; but they are not Felixes. Give us these in our Christian life rather than the gently indecisive dears who never do anything nor get anything.

"He is a good man—O, yes, he is an exceedingly good man—but then, you know, he doesn't do much; he won't set anything afire." No such thing! He's not a good man unless he sets something afire, though it be but a pile of brush or cornstalks in a half-acre lot! Not many of us can ever set the world afire; but every one of us can set something afire, and if we don't do it, we are likely to be set afire ourselves some day. Every branch that beareth not fruit he taketh away—and throws on the brush pile for the torch. From insipid goodness that has no tang to the taste, that is like a May-apple or an unripe pawpaw, Good Lord deliver us! Goodness is positive. Goodness is decisive. Goodness is the physician that sleeps with one ear open to the telephone and is ready to arise in the night and go when called and not to hesitate. Goodness is the mother who waits not a moment in the losing of her sleep or her convenience or her life for her little one. Goodness is the ever wakeful, ever loving, ever choosing Father of us all. No man is a good man who does not daily make important choices and relentlessly carry them out.

Some have declared they would rather see a strong man plunging into wrong than to see a shrinking soul do neither good nor bad. There s hope that the former will awaken some day from his fevered dream and turn to the right; while there is little hope that the latter will ever turn a corner. But it is far more to be desired to see a strong soul plunging into good, with a determined will, even though he make mistakes of judgment

But best of all is to see a calm, decided Christian striding steadily in the middle of the road, looking neither to right nor left, though a cross be at the end of the way. One such soul there was whose face was set toward Jerusalem in spite of all dissuading; and him we are ready to follow forever, as the highest type the world can know.

CAMPBELL.

On Sunday morning, March 31, my dear father, J. G. Campbell, left his earthly home for the one prepared for the redeemed. For more than 40 years he preached the gospel, until age and failing health compelled him to give up the work so dear to his heart. For two years he had been very feeble, but more seriously ill for only two weeks. His suffering was so intense that he longed to be released, yet the end came most peacefully. He was 87 years of age Aug. 1, 1900, and for almost 67 years had traveled with the dear companion who is still with us, though very frail. Only one brother and myself of a family of eight children remain. Our pastor, Bro. J. H. Gilliland, conducted the funeral service. We laid father's body in the old church yard at Grassy Ridge, five miles south, where he organized the church and long preached. He has gone to his eternal reward.

CRAWFORD.

Death has recently invaded the membership of the First Christian Church. Its victim was Mrs. Emma J. Crawford, the beloved wife of A. K Crawford. Mrs. Crawford was born near Wooster, Ohio, Oct. 2, 1856, and was the daughter of Mr. Quinby Jones. In October, 1889, she was married to Mr. Crawford and removed to Los Angeles. She was born again May 8, 1892, when the writer baptized her and husband into Christ. Early in last December she underwent a serious surgical operation and after about 12 weeks of relentless suffering she died on Tuesday, Feb. 26, 1901. She was uncomplaining through all the hours of her suffering. She talked of the future life with the utmost confidence, expressing her perfect willingness to go hence. I have never seen a person so peaceful in preparation for death. Her life was a beautiful testimony for Christ, her death was a glorious example of Christian faith. She leaves a son five years old and a husband to mourn her loss. On Thursday, Feb. 28, the writer conducted her funeral services. Mrs. Crawford was a humble, unpretentious disciple of Christ. She was of a retiring nature and loved the quiet, contemplative life. No member in all our church was more highly esteemed.

GAGE

Samantha M Morse was born Oct. 11, 1826, in Kingsville, Ohio. She united with the Baptist Church in her early womanhood, but later came in contact with the Disciples and united with them. She was united in marriage March 12, 1851, to Edward D. Gage. They moved to Nebraska in 1870. They were prominent factors in the early settlement of Jefferson county, in which they were large property owners. The husband entered into life eleven years ago, and was soon followed by their oldest child, Mrs. Annie Fitzpatrick. Several years later, Miss Nora, whom everybody loved, joined those who had before crossed over the river, and now the sainted mother has joined the happy number, leaving two children, James and Miss Susie, to mourn their loss. Lydia died in infancy. Sister Gage was a disciple in whom was no guile; a lover of the good, and a most devout and loyal supporter of the truth. It was her delight to be a mother to the motherless, and eleven orphans have been mothered by her. Six of these have grown to manhood and womanhood. These all call her blessed. She was scrupulously careful that nothing should be left undone for these that could help them in reaching true success in life. She was indeed a mother in Israel, and the church in Fairbury of which she was a member will greatly miss her. A simple, brief service was conducted by the writer at the home in Fairbury, and at Bower a second service was held in the chapel near the early home. The body was laid in the grave by the side of husband and two daughters, in the beautiful cemetery near the little country church at Bower, where she and hers had for years worshiped. There we laid her to await the resurrection of the just.

LONG.

Dr. Kelon H. Long died at his home in Jasper, Mo., Saturday afternoon, March 16, 1901, aged 41 years, 3 months and 21 days. He was born in Waverley, Ill., but when only 11 years old removed with his parents to Vesta, Johnson county, Neb., where he grew to manhood. He was married on August 13, 1883, at Harrisonville, Ky., to Ethlind Ryan. This union was blessed with four children, three girls and one boy, all of whom survive him. He entered on the practice of medicine in 1892 at Nashville, Barton county, Mo., but soon removed to Jasper, Mo., where he built up a large practice and won the confidence and esteem of the whole community. He went to Nebraska in 1893, where he soon established himself in a large and lucrative practice, but overwork and exposure brought on the dread disease, consumption, which caused him to return to his old home in Jasper where, after a lingering illness, he departed this life at 4 P. M., March 16. Dr. Long was a devoted Christian, having united with the Baptist Church when only 14 years of age. He became a charter member of the Jasper Christian Church in 1893.

M. S. JOHNSON.

Carthage, Mo., March 27, 1901.

OBLINGER.

Fred Hyman Oblinger was born in Alabama, June 29, 1881, and died at the home of his uncle, J. W. Breeden, near Arcola, March 4, 1901, aged 19 years, 8 months, and 5 days. Fred was a good boy, always honest and truthful. He leaves a wide circle of friends to mourn their loss. The funeral was conducted by the writer. L. T. FAULDERS.

STEELE.

William Steele was born in Lincolnshire, England, May 14, 1810. Died at Canby, Minn., March 5, 1901, aged 90 years, 9 months and 18 days. He came to America in 1852. In 1860 he settled at Rochester, Minn, where he spent the most of his remaining years. In 1864 he was buried with Christ in baptism at the hands of Bro. T. T. Vandola. He was an earnest, faithful Christian—truly he walked with God. Six children survive him. Funeral services were conducted by Rev. C. S. McKinney, of the Presbyterian Church. Funeral sermon was preached by the writer.

J. ENZOR HOOD.

Canby, Minn.

TUCKER.

Bro. Wilson Tucker passed on to rest and reward, Feb. 25, 1901, in his 84th year. He was born in Raleigh, N. C., in 1816. He moved to Indiana where, at the age of 17, he accepted Christ as his Savior. He lived in Illinois from 1837 to 1865. During this time he was actively interested in the Eureka, Mt. Zion and Matamora Churches. The memory of those days was precious to him in old age. From 1865 to 1871 he lived in New Hampshire and aided in the cause of Christ at Lee and Vernham. In 1871 he moved to Massachusetts, locating first in Haverhill and finally in Boston. He was actively interested in the church in each of these places. He spent his closing days in the Boston Church. He leaves behind him a faithful wife and two daughters, all earnest Christians. Bro. Tucker was unusually intelligent in the Scriptures. When all else had faded from memory the word of God was constantly upon his lips. For 67 years he was a faithful Disciple of Christ. J. H. MOHORTER.

Boston, Mass., April 9, 1901.

TOWNER.

Died, Agnes Towner, Feb. 6, 1901, 71 years, 5 months and 18 days, at her home near Bronaugh. She was the mother of eight sons and two daughters. One son and her husband preceded her to the better world. Early in life she became a member of the Church of Christ. She had been an invalid for a year. Her daily prayer was to leave this world. Elder Berkley preached the funeral discourse to a large crowd at her home. N. O. HARL.

WALKER.

William H. Walker was born in Morgan county, Ind., April 15, 1837, and died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Wm. C. Utterback, March 26, 1901, aged 63 years, 11 months and 11 days. He united with the Christian Church in 1876 and lived a consistent Christian life until death. He came to Keokuk county, Ia., when 11 years of age and made his home in this county 50 years, when he removed to Missouri in 1899. His health failing, he returned to Iowa and spent his few remaining months with loved ones. He was married in 1858 to Elizabeth Williams, who survives him. Theirs was an unusually happy companionship. To them were born four children, Dr. S. A. Walker, Mrs. Rillie Utterback, Mrs. May Carson and Mrs. Flora Hicklin, who with 15 grandchildren, one brother and five half brothers are left to mourn his death. He was a pure and noble life—hating fraud and deception—the recollection of which will ever abide with us as a priceless heritage. The funeral was conducted by Elder D. W. Campbell of the Christia church, Sigourney, Ia.

Book Notes.

We are glad to note that orders are coming in rapidly for the Moran Series of shorthand instruction books. Many young people are taking advantage of this opportunity to equip themselves for business. They will never regret it. Even if those who are purchasing these books never follow stenography as a profession, it is certain that their knowledge of shorthand will be a practical help to them, whatever business they may afterward engage in.

Here are two young women—Miss A and Miss B. They are classmates in college. The summer vacation comes, commencement is over and they return to their homes to await the re-opening of school in September. Miss A has a splendid time during the summer. She goes to a summer resort, has delightful rides on land and water, fishes a little, reads a number of novels, swings in a hammock a good deal and possibly (alas!) flirts just the least little bit. In September she returns to college with a sunburned nose and nothing else to show for three months' time spent. Miss B also has a good time. She swims and rides and fishes and reads and enjoys herself thoroughly, but every morning she seeks a quiet spot with a book and tablet of paper and diligently applies herself to the study of shorthand. In September she returns to college, a competent and capable stenographer. Her knowledge of shorthand makes her school work very much easier for her, and when she graduates she is prepared, if it is necessary or desirable, to earn a good income as a stenographer. The knowledge she gained during odd hours in vacation time is worth more to her than all her knowledge of music, painting on china, fancy embroidery, calculus and Latin. She is independent. The moral of this little tale is obvious. This Moran Series of instruction books contains seven books and costs, complete, just Five Dollars.

The third edition of Christian Science Dissected will soon be necessary, the second edition being almost exhausted. This little book is enjoying a well-merited popularity. It does not contain a superfluous line or paragraph, and is just the thing for the busy man or woman who wishes to know something of the wild and weird doctrines of Mary Baker Eddy. No honest, intelligent person can read this work without being convinced of the utter dishonesty of Mrs. Eddy and the folly and madness of her teaching. If you have a friend who is in danger of being led away by the "Scientists," secure a copy of this book and place it in his hands. Price, Twenty-five Cents.

Special Catalogue No. 31 is now ready. Bargains in Books is the title that has been given this little pamphlet. It is full of good things, and you should not miss securing a copy. A great many standard works are therein listed at half of the regular price, and even less. No matter what your profession, or what your especial taste in literature, you will find something to suit you in this catalogue. We have listed, among other things, a number of popular works of fiction, at exceedingly low prices. If you wish to secure either light or heavy summer reading, carefully examine this catalogue. It will be sent free for the asking.

The many persons who are now reading and enjoying W. J. Russell's new work, What is Your Life? will also want to read, if they have not already done so, the same author's former work, Wonders of the Sky, a short, popular treatise on astronomy—this universe in which we live. It is a charming little volume, entirely free from the dry, didactic style of the text-book, beautifully printed and bound. The price is Fifty Cents.

H. E. Rossell, of Missoula, Mont., writes as follows: "I want to express my thanks to M. M. Davis for his book Esther. It is one of the most readable and helpful books I ever read. Surely there is more where it came from!" Bro. Rossell, when writing these lines, had probably not seen the author's later work, Elijah, or he would have known, beyond a question, that there was more where Esther came from! Both of these works deserve the widest circulation. Mr. Davis is a delightful writer, and the reader of his writings will be charmed by his work. Both of these books are neatly bound in cloth, and the price of each is 75 cents.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

All Bible-school reports are to run from May 1, 1900, to April 30, 1901, and must be in by May 15, or the school is out of the banner race.

All funds due the co-operation must be in by May 31 or your school is reported delinquent, and you are not to hold this office responsible for it.

Our reception at Maitland in the home of D. P. Lewis was most cordial and the school prompt in its response to our work. A. B. Williamson, so efficient in public school work, is the superintendent.

At Skidmore A. J. Smith, principal of the public school, is most successful in our work. D. W. Conner is laying siege to take the community for the Master.

Notwithstanding their numerical and financial burdens, the school at Clearmont, led by Mrs. F. G. Newlon, seeks to honor Christ, while Bro. Gray is not slow to help every way possible. My effort to their help was ruined by the weather.

March was one of our worst months, but Ferd F. Schultz put in three new schools, raising the money for ministers, organizing one new congregation and seeing that some one was called to the work. His personal work is constant and very successful both for the school and church.

The work of M. H. Wood at Mill Spring emphasizes the necessity of an all-round man, for the congregation had virtually given up, the house being used by others, whereas now the brethren have taken renewed hope and are pushing forward and will have preaching one-fourth time.

Thanks to John H. Jones and S. D. Wilson not one thing was lacking to make our rally first-class, three sessions a day, all of them full of interest and followed by such good results. Garden City is taking front rank this year.

In Howard we have a "union" school that does first-class work and in which there is no friction, and it is Mt. Moriah, the Baptist brethren and ours having a union house. J. P. Furnish is our minister there, one of the best Baptist brethren in Missouri is superintendent, and the brethren all give liberally every year to our work, this year being the best in their history. So many schools in houses of our own plead a "union" school hinders their giving, but Brethren Barron, Walden, et al, never do. Surprising as it seems to some, they are glad to have us come.

From now on we must keep reminding all of Sedalia as the place, June 10 as the time, and one of the best programs ever had as the attraction. Come and enjoy the hospitality of one of Missouri's best churches, under the management of one of our best ministers. We want you to help us go up clear of all indebtedness. Will your school remit immediately? H. F. DAVIS.

THE young century has already entered upon its titanic tasks. It has much to do towards bringing the earth in subjection to man, and man in subjection to God. This was the two-fold commission given to man in the beginning. The earth was to be subdued and made a fit dwelling-place for man, and humanity was to be purified and built into a habitation for God. The divine purpose moves slowly but surely to its majestic consummation. God works in eons in which Alps and Andes come and go like cloud-shadows on a summer day. Many of Nature's forces have been harnessed and are doing service for man. Humanity has risen slowly out of the animal, as coral-built continents have risen out of the primeval ocean. Much yet remains to be done. Education must become more definite in its purpose, more rational in its methods and more universal in its influence. Religion must become more simple, natural and vital. Science must become more reverent, governments more just, politics purer, social life saner, the church truer to its mission, and international fraternity and good will must take the place of war. This is the goal which prophets have seen, and for which martyrs have died in every age.

WHAT WE STAND FOR

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

IT all depends upon what you want in a soap. If you require simply a dirt remover, almost any soap will do. But if you care at all about the thing which is to be washed, you must think twice before you act. Any soap will clean linens and muslins, but Ivory Soap leaves them as white as snow. Any soap will clean sheets and table cloths, but Ivory Soap leaves no coarse, strong odor. Try it once!

A New Music Book

EVANGELISTS will find the Gospel Proclamation in song a department of the book eminently suited to every phase of a successfully conducted revival.

SINGING EVANGELISTS will be pleased with the analytical classification, enabling them without reference to indices to find a suitable song on a moment's warning. The rich variety and power of the solo and special song department, selected specially for his use in revivals, will be joyfully received.

CHORISTERS will find the average choir supplied with a rich selection of beautiful and impressive solos, with choruses, duets, quartettes, invocations and doxologies specially selected for the distinctive part a choir is expected to take in the service.

PASTORS who are responsible for the kind of pasture upon which the sheep and lambs are fed, will NOT find a sentiment out of harmony with New Testament Christianity. He will find it a companion vade mecum for his pocket Testament, containing gems for public worship, for the prayer-meeting, for funeral occasions, for Baptismal, Thanksgiving and Convention services. He will find that an expensive hymnal will not be needed, unless it be to keep in the style.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS will find in Popular Hymns No 2 all that they can wish, because it is full from back to back with soul-stirring sentiment set to soul-inspiring music, the only kind C. E.'s care to sing. The Solos, Duets and Quartettes may be impressively used to enrich every session of the Society.

S. S. SUPERINTENDENTS who believe the Sunday-school should be the nursery of the church, the church at work saving the young, will find Popular Hymns No. 2 richly supplied with music within the voice compass and heart reach of the children, giving them a desire to remain and participate in the song service of the church. Popular Hymns No 2. contains 256 songs.

"IN FAITH, UNITY; IN OPINION AND METHODS, LIBERTY; IN ALL THINGS, CHARITY."

Vol. xxxviii. St. Louis, Mo., Thursday, May 2, 1901. No. 18.

Current Events.

The Cuban Delegation. Senor Capote and his four companions, who came to Washington to get a better understanding of our government's purposes in Cuba, were received in the capital with great honor and were given the sort of treatment best calculated to make them feel that the administration is kindly disposed toward themselves and those whom they represent. The departure of the President on his western tour made his part of the entertainment necessarily brief, but the Cubans were given a dinner at the White House and were treated with the utmost consideration. Most of their actual conferences were with Secretary Root at the War Department. After convincing them that neither the President nor any member of the Cabinet had power to alter the Platt amendment, Mr. Root devoted himself to showing them that it did not need alteration and that Cuban liberties were not endangered under it. It is believed that the commissioners were favorably impressed and that they left Washington holding just about the opinions which the President and the Secretary of War wanted them to hold. Reports of the outcome of the mission, however, will be worth little until the commissioners have met with the Constitutional Convention and it is seen what impression can be made upon the others by the arguments without the dinners. If the whole Constitutional Convention could be transported to Washington and received with social honors it would probably accelerate its acquiescence to the Platt amendment.

More War in China. The German forces in China are again exercising their remarkable faculty of making war—manufacturing it where none exists. In spite of the retirement of the Chinese troops from the neutral ground, the German expedition to the province of Shansi continued and there have been several engagements in the vicinity of the Great Wall resulting disastrously to the Chinese. There are unconfirmed reports that there is about to be another anti-foreign outbreak—a highly improbable event, so far as the vicinity of Pekin is concerned, where the foreigners are well able to take care of themselves. The reform edict committing the management of foreign affairs to a newly organized board, of which Prince Ching is president, is an important step toward the reorganization of the Chinese government. In the discussion of the indemnity question it becomes more and more clear that the Powers will not bring their demands within the limit which our representative has suggested. The total amount will probably be not far from $300,000,000 and rather more than less. Some of the minor Powers, which have spent little and suffered but slight loss, are making extravagant claims. It has been suggested as a probability that Russia may lend China the money to pay her debt to the Powers and may hold Manchuria as security. If this plan were adopted the Powers by demanding more than China can pay would be playing directly into the hands of Russia.

A Contested Election. A lively correspondence has been passing between Mr. Wells and Mr. Parker, the successful Democratic and the unsuccessful Republican candidate for Mayor in the recent election in St. Louis. The election was marked by much disorder and there is good ground to believe that frauds were perpetrated on a large scale, perhaps large enough to change the result of the election. Mr. Parker expressed his sentiments freely and publicly, but declined to contest the election until called out by a letter from Mr. Wells. The latter modified the objectionable feature of his proposition, as previously stated in these columns, and Mr. Parker has filed notice of a contest. Mr. Meriwether, who ran a close third on the Municipal Ownership ticket, will also contest. Much rascality will doubtless be uncovered by the investigation, but the amount which can be discovered is always such a small part of the whole that even if the highest number of legitimate votes was cast for Mr. Parker or Mr. Meriwether, it will probably not be possible to prove it. Meanwhile, a partial report of the April grand jury shows seventeen indictments for fraud in this election, more than half of which are against election officials.

A Discredited Prophet. The most fervent among all exponents of Christian socialism and the most zealous to denounce the conventional ideals of church and state which interfered with his socialistic millennium, has been George D. Herron, professor of "Applied Christianity" at Grinnell, Ia. He bitterly attacked many things which most Christians hold sacred, but much could be borne so long as he was believed to be inflamed by a pure and holy zeal. Within the last few weeks some facts have gained currency which were before known to but few. That the professor of "Applied Christianity" has deserted his wife and four little children, that he has persuaded her to secure a divorce, and that he is about to be married to a young lady whose mother endowed his professorial chair—these are matters which have caused the public some surprise. Since Dr. Hillis' eloquent and frank letter stating his reasons for refusing to meet Prof. Herron at the Get Together Club in New York, those who are acquainted with the facts have been less reticent in discussing them. Prof. Herron's teachings are extreme and destructive and he has, as it seems to us, fallen too much into the habit of prophesying evil. Civilization is always, with him, tottering on the brink of destruction, and this constant prediction of woe gradually acquired something of the ring of a false alarm. Yet he has sounded many a true note of warning and might have been a useful man, though doing only partial work. But the world is very critical of its reformers. It insists that they shall be decent. It will not back any "social apostolate" whose leader is "applying Christianity" while his deserted wife is applying for a divorce.

McKinley and Harvard. The prospect that President McKinley will be offered the degree of LL. D. by Harvard University at the coming commencement is agitating some of the graduates of that institution to a degree which seems to us unnecessary. The objection comes chiefly from some of those who oppose the President's foreign policy and is based upon the assumption that the granting of an honorary degree would commit the university to an approval of all of the President's official acts. This seems a superfluous assumption. If it is true, then a refusal to confer the degree because of the objection of the anti-imperialists would commit the university to a condemnation of the administration. But of course the university has no more business to pass judgment on political policies than a W. C. T. U. convention would have to adopt a resolution approving or disapproving of the free coinage of silver. There appears to be need of a better understanding of what an honorary degree means. The common understanding is that it is a recognition of high attainments in scholarship and culture, and that it involves no judgment on the recipient's political or religious creed. The President will attend the Harvard alumni dinner as the guest of Senator Hoar, who is president of the Alumni Association and the senior senator from Massachusetts can scarcely be accused of scheming to get his university to set the seal of its approval upon the arch-expansionist for political purposes.

Sport and Self-Government. The Protestant clergymen of Manila have petitioned the authorities to prohibit the Filipino national sport of cock-fighting. We have no disposition to criticize this action, for cock-fighting is a brutal and brutalizing amusement. But is it much worse than shooting pigeons from a trap? A New York gun club recently killed 20,000 pigeons in a week—a performance which, on the score of brutality, seems distinctly worse than a dozen cock-fights, and is no more representative of the spirit of pure sport. In a cock-fight it is at least one against one, and each contestant has an equal chance for his life. But in trap-shooting the pigeon has no chance to save his life by skill or strength; he has only the possibility that the gunner may fire wild. The essence of brutality—part of it, at least—is to treat a sentient creature like an inanimate thing. When the Filipinos become self-governing they will undoubtedly restore the cock-pit, even if it is prohibited now, and probably it would not improve their opinion of the Americans to learn that we practice amusements which are more objectionable on the score of brutality than those which we prohibit in the Philippines.

World's Fair Commission. The Louisiana Purchase Exposition, to be held in St. Louis in 1903, has taken several steps toward realization during the past week. The Commission has met and organized and the company has been incorporated. In accordance with the President's appointment, the nine United States Commissioners met in St. Louis on Tuesday of last week and a day or two later effected a permanent organization with ex-Senator Carter as president of the Commission. Joseph Flory, the recent Republican candidate for governor of Missouri, has been appointed secretary of the Commission. Tuesday evening a banquet was given to the Commissioners and guests by the Business Men's League. It was a notable gathering and marked the opening of a new phase of the work. The legislative work is done, and the necessary appropriations and subscriptions have been secured. The next stage is the work of planning exhibits and designing and preparing buildings and grounds. The site will be decided upon soon and it will be done, it is to be hoped, without reference to the pulls which real estate owners are trying to exercise in the interest of their own property. Ten per cent. of the $5,000,000 subscribed in St. Louis has been paid in and the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company has been incorporated with a capital stock of $6,000,000.

A Catholic Complaint. The Catholics in New York City have found a new ground for complaint in the operation of the public library law. The law at present gives part of the library tax to private libraries which have certain circulation, and the Catholics are considering how they may get a share of the great Carnegie gift for their cathedral library. At a recent meeting for the discussion of this question, Archbishop Corrigan argued that at least five branch libraries ought to be given to them at the city's expense. At the same time he took occasion to criticize the public libraries because they contain books which say things that are uncomplimentary to Rome. Sear's "Political Growth of the Nineteenth Century" and Myers' "Medieval and Modern History" are particularly objected to. To show how sensitive an archbishop can be about the history of his church, we may cite one passage which he quotes as sufficient to rule Myers' book out of the library. Speaking of medieval monasticism, it says that "the monasteries, instead of fostering piety and devotion, became the nurseries of indolence and profligacy. The tendency of the entire system was to cast contempt upon woman and degrade the domestic relations. Again, the movement withdrew from active life, just at the time when the world needed its best men, many of the choicest spirits of the age." That strikes us as being a very good statement of the case—that monasticism attracted many choice spirits but that as a system it suffered degeneration. To deny that this is good history is either to exhibit ignorance or to take advantage of the supposed ignorance of others—probably the latter in the Archbishop's case. The appropriation of public money to the support of private libraries is as illegitimate as the appropriation of it to private schools. A public library is a public school and a private library is a private school. Support of either a school or a library by public funds should carry with it the regulation of the same by the proper civil authorities.

The Committee on Revision. Important action was taken at a meeting of the committee which is to report on the question of creed-revision to the Presbyterian General Assembly at Philadelphia, May 16. After examining the returns from the presbyteries the committee found that the opinion of the church favors some change in its creedal statement, but "no change which would in any way impair the integrity of the system of doctrine contained in the confession of faith;" that the consensus of opinion is that the confession should be interpreted in harmony with the teaching of Scripture that God is not willing that any should perish, and that it is human wickedness and not a divine decree which shuts some out from salvation; that a plurality of presbyteries desires the changes to be made by new statement of present doctrines; that many presbyteries desire a revision with additional statements on the love of God for all men, missions and the Holy Spirit. On the basis of these returns, the committee recommends the appointment of a committee to prepare a brief summary of doctrine, bearing the same relation to the confession that the shorter bears to the longer catechism, not to be used as a substitute, but "to vindicate the doctrines of the church from all false aspersions and misconceptions;" and further to prepare amendments to certain articles setting forth more clearly the teaching of the love of God for all men, missions and the Holy Spirit. Finally, it is to be understood "that the revision shall in no way impair the integrity of the system of doctrine set forth in our confession and taught in the Holy Scripture."

A Gentle Protest. Much is being said, and not a little done, for the education of the negroes in the south, and it is a noteworthy fact that a large amount of the interest and the money for that work comes from the north. For the most part our southern brethren have accepted these well-meant attentions in the spirit in which they were given, but here and there one finds a different attitude manifested. Gov. Chandler, of Georgia, recently refused to meet a delegation which had come from the north to see what should and could be done for the negroes and, if he is correctly reported, he expressed his reason in this explicit language: "We can attend to the education of the darky in the south without the aid of the ——— Yankees." The progress of negro education must be slow enough at best, in spite of all the efforts of Hampton Institute and Tuskegee. But among the most serious obstacles which it has to overçome is that spirit which sympathizes with no method of solving the negro problem except disfranchisement. Strangely enough, too, that attitude of mind usually finds difficulty in expressing itself without the aid of profanity. In spite of Gov. Chandler's opinion to the contrary, we must continue to believe that the negro problem is one in which the whole country is interested, even including the Yankees whom the Governor so eloquently anathematizes.

Brevities. President McKinley left Washington on Monday for his transcontinental trip. It will be the longest journey ever made by a president in this country.

The Czar has prohibited the exhibition of a certain portrait of Tolstoi which represented him in the peasant dress. The picture aroused too much sympathy for Tolstoi among the peasants.

The bodies of President Lincoln and several members of his family have been removed from the temporary vault where they were placed about a year ago and returned to the vault of the rebuilt Lincoln monument at Springfield, Ill.

The German crown prince has entered the University of Bonn. Emperor William, who also spent some student years at Bonn, visited the University on this occasion, and the event was celebrated with great rejoicing.

No difficulty has been experienced in getting American capitalists to subscribe to the British loan which has just been voted. On the contrary, twice as much was subscribed in New York in the first few days as was allotted to America.

The exports and imports continue favorable to our country. The first nine months of the fiscal year closed with the month of March and showed that the exports for this time were $1,140,170,728 while the imports were $599,483,391. If we continue to thus pay out only one dollar while we take in more than two dollars from other nations Uncle Sam ought to become very rich.

The reports of the Canadian census have not yet been published in full, but they indicate, so far as published, that the population will number about 6,000,000. The increase in the past decade has been about 23 per cent. as compared with 21 per cent. of increase in the United States in the same period. The population of Canada increased as much in the last ten years as in the preceding twenty.

The state of California has decided to prevent the total destruction of its wonderful redwood trees and to that end its legislature has appropriated $250,000 to buy a piece of redwood forest which will be held as a public park. The tract to be bought is near Santa Cruz, about 50 miles south of San Francisco. The redwoods here are good but not the best, and the forestry specialists urge the purchase of a tract on Humboldt Bay, 270 miles north of San Francisco, where the finest big trees are found.

An Old Question in a New Light.

The question, "What must I do to be saved?" is being considered to-day in a new and important light from that in which it has been discussed from our pulpits for many a year. It is being asked to-day by the rich men who are disciples of Jesus of Nazareth. They find themselves, either by inheritance or through the exercise of good business ability, in possession of a much larger amount of wealth than is necessary for their own needs, or for the needs of those dependent upon them. They have learned from Jesus that wealth wisely used is a blessing both to those who give and to those who receive, and that it is a curse to those who hoard it up, or squander it in unworthy ways. They therefore are confronted with the question, "What must I do to be saved?" that is, "What must I do with my wealth, for which I will be held responsible, so as to receive the approval of Him whom I acknowlege as Lord?"

This is not so easy a question as some may imagine. We heard recently of a wealthy man in this city who, when he first began to feel the weight of responsibility as to the proper use of his wealth, decided to distribute large amounts of food and clothing to the poor. He therefore employed several wagons and had them make weekly visits in destitute portions of the city, distributing to those who were found to be in want. It was not long until he discovered that he was pauperizing many who had hitherto managed to earn a livelihood, and that scores of people were waiting for his wagons instead of hunting for a job. He abandoned that method of using his wealth and gave considerable time and thought as to how he could best use it so as to bless his fellow men. His final decision was to put a large amount of it in the endowment of an educational institution where poor young men and women could be educated and equipped to care for themselves and others.

Mr. Carnegie faced the same problem, and finally adopted the method of establishing free libraries. Other wealthy men have adopted different methods of disposing of their wealth for the benefit of the community. But never in the history of the world, perhaps, were there so many men studying the question as to what disposition they can make of their wealth in order to save themselves and others. Of course there are multitudes of wealthy people who have not yet awakened to the realization of their responsibility for the right use of their wealth. They imagine that they have a right to do with it as they please and to squander it on themselves and on their children if they so desire. But the work of enlightenment is going on, and more and more men are coming to see that the gaining of wealth involves the responsibility of using that wealth so as to confer the largest blessing upon their fellow men.

The principle involved applies to possessions of every kind. One whose mind has been disciplined and enriched with useful knowledge should raise the question "What must I do to be saved?" or "What use can I make of the education I have gained so as to benefit my fellow men?" The man of talent in any line has the same sort of question to deal with. Churches with wealthy establishments and fine equipments are beginning to feel the force of this question as applied to themselves. They are asking what they must do to be saved from selfishness, covetousness, exclusiveness, indifference and pride. Ministers of the gospel who have dedicated their lives to the work of the ministry find themselves confronted with the same question, how must they live, how must they preach, how must they follow the example of their Lord and Master, so that they may save both themselves and those who hear them?

It is a healthy sign that this question is being faced by professed Christians. It is an indication of an awakening sense of responsibility. To all of these cases there is but one answer that will prove satisfactory, namely: Regard your wealth, or education, or talent, or calling, or opportunity, as a trust, and use it unselfishly for the benefit of man and for the glory of God. So shalt thou have fellowship with Christ and be saved.

Cause and Effect.

The Congregationalist of Boston, which was recently sold to the Sunday-school Publication Board of that body, because its separate publication became financially impracticable, in dealing with the causes which have made the change necessary, says:

"The secular press has given increasing space and prominence to news which formerly was left to the religious newspapers. On the other hand, the field of interest, from a Christian point of view, has broadened and changed till it includes the entire life and progress of the world. Denominational barriers have dwindled till they distinguish rather than divide bodies of Christians of different names, who work side by side to advance the power of God in all His world. The religious paper which Congregationalists demand must not only give them the news of their own denomination, but of the progress week by week of the whole kingdom of God among men. These changed conditions require far greater labor, skill and expense in editing a first-class religious journal than were expected a generation ago."

Which reminds us that a decade and a half ago, when a representative of this paper, then temporarily residing in Boston, approached one of the editors of the Congregationalist to ask the courtesy of an exchange, he was informed that it was not their policy to exchange with papers of a different denomination only in exceptional cases. As this paper had a larger constituency than the Congregationalist, and represented a larger religious body, its representative did not feel that he was asking for more than he was offering. We are glad, however, that its editors have found out that "the religious paper which Congregationalists demand must not only give them the news of their own denomination, but of the progress . . . of the whole kingdom of God." We believed as much then. Whether an editor of a religious paper feels able to give the news of every religious body each week or not, he ought certainly to be in touch with what is going on in these religious bodies that he may intelligently speak of them and their work. The narrow-visioned religious journal that cannot see over its own denominational wall has had its day and it is only a question of time when it must "cease to be." The sooner it ceases to be, the sooner will Christian unity come, and the world be brought under the sway of Christ.

Missouri Bible College.

The crisis is past. The institution is saved. Its future is assured. Some large-hearted gentlemen, meeting in this office last week, decided to guarantee the deficit of $8,000. With full faith in the intelligence and honor of their brethren in Missouri, who, they believed, would make good this deficit as soon as their attention was properly called to the matter, they gave the legal guarantee which secures the full amount of $50,000, bearing six per cent. interest from May 1. How much this means for the cause of Christ in Missouri and throughout the world it is not given to any of us now to see. We believe it to be an event of the highest importance and well worthy of an annual celebration by the school. It now remains for those brethren in the state who have hitherto taken no part in this enterprise, but who have wished it well, to subscribe such an amount as they may feel able to pay, in order to justify the confidence of those who have already given liberally to it, and so to have some part in this great work of teaching the Bible to the educated young men and women of our State University. Let us not forget to thank God for this new proof of His goodness.

The Religious Weekly.

In an article on "The Possibility of a Christian Daily," in the Christian Endeavor World, Dr. Sheldon says: "It is only a question of time, I think, when the distinctively sectarian weekly and monthly papers must take even a more secondary place than they now hold. There is an open field, therefore, for a distinctively Christian daily such as we do not now have." He explains that he means a paper which shall give the world's news, but shall do it in a Christian way, giving each piece of news more or less prominence according to its real importance, and having for its prime object the advancement of the kingdom of God. Yes, the "distinctively sectarian weekly" is declining; so is everything else distinctively sectarian. But does this not leave an open field, not only for Mr. Sheldon's Christian daily—which we believe in and hope for—but also for a Christian weekly, which shall be thoroughly undenominational, shall give the world's news as the secular weeklies do, but assigning to each item space and prominence according to its real importance, and having for its object the advancement of the kingdom of God? This would mean a paper not devoted to the enterprises and the news of one denomination or one "religious body" alone, but giving the world's news and looking for support to all those who believe in the moral order and want to see it prevail in every department of life and in all parts of God's world. It would be devoted less exclusively to the advocacy of the peculiar plea of any religious body and the report of its doings, and more to advocacy of righteousness in business and in government, to temperance, order, charity, and truth. Is there an open field for such a religious weekly?

Brother Jasper.

The Reverend John Jasper, of Richmond, has ended his pilgrimage and has gone to his long home, where he will be troubled no more by theories about the heavenly bodies, or by the perversity of men who could not agree with him that "the sun do move." He has fought a good fight and has doubtless entered into his inheritance in the city that hath no need of the sun, stationary or otherwise.

Here is a section of one of Bro. Jasper's sermons presenting some of his scriptural arguments to prove that the sun moves and that the earth is flat, square and stationary. The report is given in the Standard (Chicago):

"Now when Joshua and his hosts got into the plain of A-ja-lon, the sun was right above 'em. The sun was there, and how did it get there, if it didn't move?

"The moon was also there. And Joshua commanded them to stand still. Now, what in the name of common sense did he say this for if they wa'n't moving? And they took five kings and hung 'em on trees until the sun went down. Could it go down and not move? The great army stayed there until the sun rose again. If it hadn't left, how was it goin' to get back there?

"Philosophers say we are livin' on a round earth. The earth is square. If you ain't been teachin' that way in your grammar you had better do it after this. The wind blow from the four corners of the earth. How could the earth be roun' and have four corners? The philosophers say there are people under our feet. If they are down there they are everlasting disfranchised. Where did they get all these other worlds from? Tell me about one missionary that has been under the earth that has come back and made a report. They have been to China and Africa and all them forin' countries, but they have never told us about this country under the earth. Where is the hole that the axle of the earth goes through, and what does the axle rest on? There ain't no hole, and there ain't no axle."

There are few to-day who believe as the Reverend John Jasper did about the solar system, but they are still fewer and more ignorant who would on this account begrudge him an abundant entrance into that presence in which the wise men of earth, with their boasted wisdom, are but as children playing with pebbles on the shore. Bro. Jasper rested his argument upon "the impregnable rock of Holy Scripture." He did not interpret it as most of us do. He assigned to it a function which we do not believe the divine revelation was intended to exercise. But he believed in it as the revelation of the mind of God to men, and in so doing he occupied higher ground than those men of science whose eyes are so bent upon the earth that they cannot see the light which comes from above. Brother Jasper has been to our generation an object-lesson to teach two things: first, how ridiculous a good man may make himself appear by using the Scriptures for a purpose for which they were not intended; and second, how good an ignorant and mistaken man may be in spite of his mistakes. He was wrong, we think, about the sun, but he was right on the main issue. The Sun of Righteousness was the center of his system. His religion was Copernican, though his astronomy was Ptolemaic. So all honor to the Reverend John Jasper. His theory of astronomy has passed away, as perhaps our theories of cosmogony shall, but the Word of the Lord endureth forever.

Notes and Comments.

A writer in the Advance (Congregational) refers, half in complaint and half in triumph, to the fact that many of the leading Congregational pulpits are being filled by ministers drawn from other denominations, among which he specifies, Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians and Disciples. "Congregational churches get the pick of the ministry of other denominations. The broad men in all of them are tossing uneasily in their ecclesiastical bunks, and gazing longingly toward the woven-wire springs and hair mattresses of Congregationalism." The figure is an unfortunate one. A careful observer of the progress of the Disciples of Christ, for example, is not struck by the appropriateness of referring to the body ecclesiastic under the figure of a dormitory. Somnolence is not a mark of our ministry and our "best men" are not gazing longingly toward anybody's easy berth. We class as several degrees lower than our best those ministers who change their church connection in search of the "woven-wire springs and hair mattresses" of "leading pulpits" or flowery beds of ease in any other form.

There are some ministers who change their denominational affiliation to get an easy and lucrative place, but this, of course, was not what the writer of the above statement meant. He refers to the fact, which is true, that Congregationalism has attracted many broad men out of narrower denominations. It is not true that it has drawn off many of our ministers, for there is no greater liberty to be gained by going from us to them. But the migration of ministers from one denominational fold to another, which is becoming a marked feature of the church of to-day, indicates more than a drift toward one or two bodies which allow broad liberty. The interchange is quite general. The accessions to our own ministry from other bodies are numerous. Presbyterianism has, during the last seven years, received an average of 72 ministers annually from other denominations. All of this indicates, not a pining for the flesh-pots of the rich churches, but a gradual subsidence of denominational walls, so far as the best and broadest minds are concerned.

To revise or not to revise, is the question with our Presbyterian brethren. But after all has not the revision been made in the minds of a vast majority of the members of that body? It is only a question of making the outward form of the creed correspond with the real convictions of the people. Isn't it strange that there should be any hesitation about making such a revision? It is an illustration of how sacred a very human and fallible instrument may become by long custom and usage. But whether we revise or refuse to revise our own opinions or those of our fathers, one thing is certain, there is a quiet readjustment of thought going on in all the churches which is as irresistible as gravity, and the tendency of which is to bring all our theologies and beliefs to the supreme test of the mind of Christ, and to write Ichabod on every creed or dogma or practice or institution that fails to conform to that test. Those who have the spiritual intuition to recognize this fact promptly, and to conform themselves to it, are likely to be the leaders in the religious thought and life of the twentieth century.

A Baptist contemporary finds in the recent visit of Minister Wu to the University of Chicago a new evidence of that institution's "wonderful proclivity for running off after strange gods." Minister Wu gave an address on "Chinese Civilization," but the idea that China has any sort of civilization seems to our critical contemporary superbly ridiculous. Probably its keen and well-trained nose for heresy detects in the university's invitation to the wily heathen an odor of higher criticism or evolution. Some attempt to classify all theological, philosophical, social and moral aberrations and innovations under one or the other of these heads. It is so convenient to have two or three generic terms like these which can be stretched to cover all varieties of miscellaneous heresy, that the method is not likely soon to be superseded, even though it may become necessary to find some different names when these have lost their terror.

The 15-horse-power sun-motor, which has recently been built in Los Angeles, is a promise of great things. An immense concave reflector focuses the sunlight on a boiler and makes steam without fuel. Toss an open umbrella on the ground and its form and position will represent those of the new machine. The boiler of course is located somewhere on the handle. It is automatically self-adjusting like a windmill, and turns its face toward the sun as faithfully as a sunflower. The water-mill, the wind-mill and the sun-mill are three taps in nature's great reservoir of latent power which man can use but can never use up. Go to, ye coal-barons! Will you devise a method for cornering the sunlight?

Speaking of the sad plight of New York's city government and the difficulties which Tammany puts in the way of reforming it, Harper's Weekly says: "If he (the reformer) organizes an opposition, the ballots of himself and his associates will be counted by Tammany inspectors; if he seeks to gain his rights, Tammany policemen will be present to maintain (?) the peace." How like St. Louis! Substitute "Nesbit Law" for "Tammany" and the description fits, so far as election methods are concerned. It is hard to introduce reform when corruption attacks the ballot, the lawful instrument by which reforms are effected.

The papers a week or two ago contained accounts of the laying of the wonderful prayer-healed corner stone of a Christian Science church in New York. The wrong wording of the inscription on the stone was said to have been miraculously corrected in answer to the prayers of the faithful. An officer of the church sent a letter to a New York editor further explaining the occurrence. The letter presented certain peculiarities of spelling and grammar which are usually considered mistakes—though that, of course, may be only a delusion of mortal mind. The editor pigeonholed the letter and suggested to its writer that he give it "absent treatment" such as the corner stone received.

Editor's Easy Chair.

A spring morning in the woods! Are there any of the Easy Chair readers who do not know what this means? If so, there is a luxury in store for them if they care to enjoy it. It was the privilege of the Easy Chair a few days since to enjoy this luxury often before experienced. It was in the primeval woods of Southwest Missouri, and in the midst of the hill country, one of its most rugged sections. The blush of the early dawn lay peacefully upon the hilltops like the smile of an angel. The birds had awakened and had begun their morning symphony. The oaks were bursting forth into bud, the hickory was in young leaf, the dogwood blossoms in full bloom scented the air and the redbud added color and beauty to the scene. The fresh young grass springing from the earth had a fragrance that brought with it the memories of life's early springtime. The "spring-beauties," the wild "pansies," the "sweet-williams" made a carpet fit for kings to walk upon. After a while the great red round sun came up over the eastern hilltop as if it were rising out of the hollow beyond, and looked as near and as large as it used to in those old days when seen with wondering boyish eyes. The notes of a wild turkey gobbler on a neighboring hilltop served to impress us with the wildness and primitive character of these upland woods. It brought back the memory of those early days when this Thanksgiving bird was chased with dog and gun in the early dawn, in sections long since abandoned by them because of the thickening habitations of man, the great intruder and encroacher. It is like being transported back to one's boyhood to be brought face to face with those primitive scenes.

What a temple was this in which to worship God! There stood the majestic hills where they have been standing since long before man made his advent to this earth. They were crowned with a generation of trees whose ancestors reach back from acorn to oak to a somewhat later age. Over the flower-carpeted earth, and up through the fragrant air, the arched sky was as blue as ever spanned the fair plains of Italy. If one needed music, aside from the songs of birds, to add to his worshipful mood, it was heard in the gentle ripple of clear, sparkling streamlets flowing over their rocky beds in the hollows, and the musical whisper of the young leaves rustling with the gentle morning breeze. In the midst of such surroundings one can easily enter into the spirit of Bryant's lines:

"The groves were God's first temples. Ere men learned
To hew the shaft and lay the arcitrave,
And frame the roof above them."

There is enough stillness to make the scene awe-inspiring, which is more than can be said of most churches, even in the intervals of song and prayer and sermon. These modest wild-flowers are not as pretentious as the roses, the lilies and the carnations which adorn our churches, but there is a quiet beauty and fragrance about them which are quite as much in accord with the spirit of true worship. Were these flowers indeed

"Born to blush unseen
And waste their sweetness on the desert air"?

We do not think so. Does not the God who created beauty and the taste for beauty love the beautiful? We came across one cluster of these beautiful wild-flowers in our walk in the woods which perhaps had been bemoaning their fate about being "born to blush unseen," but which were seen by at least one pair of appreciative human eyes, and plucked from their seclusion to adorn the breakfast table. The moral of this is that unrecognized genius and moral worth need not repine at their lowly lot, for at such time as they think not they may be brought forth from their obscurity to win the approval of admiring eyes.

Following up a purling little stream that flowed down one of the hollows between lofty hills, we came at last to where it issued from the earth and ran out over a limestone bedrock, making a miniature waterfall. Forming a cup with our hands we drank from this pure fountain to the health of the trees, and to the birds, and to the beauty of the sky, and to the grandeur of the everlasting hills. The fabled nectar of the gods was no equal to this pure, limpid stream, distilled in these mountains, and it was infinitely superior to all the ales and beers and wines and liquors, brewed by man, which cloud the intellect, benumb the moral sensibilities and destroy both body and soul. Here is one of Nature's own sanitariums, and to this and kindred places will men come in the future that they may be healed of their manifold maladies and distempers. As it was only five or six miles' walk to where we had an appointment to preach, we preferred going on foot. But the sermon that came to us that morning under the inspiration of these scenes of nature was not preached when we met the audience, and perhaps never will be. Beecher once said that if his congregation could hear one of the sermons that came to him in his study, they would never wish to listen to one of the sermons he preached. Many of us, with far less genius than the gifted Brooklyn preacher, have had the same feeling. There are thoughts so high and feelings so deep that when we come to put them into the frail vehicle of human speech, we scarcely recognize them ourselves, and as for our hearers, they get but a glimpse of the original ideas and the emotions which they stirred. This was one of the limitations which beset God in making a revelation of Himself to man. His thoughts were too sublime, His purposes too high, His love too deep, to be conveyed by human speech. Hence the incarnation.

Speaking broadly, the whole great southwest as we passed through it, seemed to be a mighty bouquet of apple blossoms variegated with green wheat fields. One sees the country at its best, or at least in its greatest beauty, perhaps, at this season. Judging from blossom and blade, the apple and wheat bins will not be empty in the coming autumn. There is prospect of an abundant fruit crop and a bountiful harvest. Surely this country is a goodly heritage! It is a land of plenty, whatever may be said of the want and squalor which abound in certain parts of our great cities. No section of Missouri has in it greater possibilities than the southwest. Springfield is its metropolis, but beautiful towns and growing young cities are springing up along the lines of railroad all through that fertile region. But to our eyes the country with its farms, its orchards, its meadows, its grazing herds, its old rural homes, is the most beautiful, as it is the most desirable, place for living. Out of these country homes come the majority of our merchant princes, our railroad magnates, our legislators, our governors, our preachers and presidents. God bless the homes of America and make them more and more fountains of purity, of virtue, of integrity, of righteonsness, whose healing streams shall carry life and health to the nations and to the world!

Questions and Answers.

Did the Savior ascend to his Father before he permitted anyone to touch him? An Inquirer.

There is no proof that he did. His word to Mary bidding her not to touch him but to go and tell her brethren, means probably that she was not to linger in worshiping him, but to proceed at once to make known the glad news of the resurrection.

A Christian woman is compelled to leave her husband on account of drunkenness, and after two years of silence and neglect she obtained a divorce on the ground of drunkenness and neglect. The husband was also guilty of adultery. She has had her divorce three years. She now desires to remarry. Could a Christian man marry her and both parties be innocent? Or is it unscriptural for divorced persons to remarry under these circumstances?
Inquirer.

Our understanding of Christ's teaching on the subject is that the innocent party to a marriage which has been scripturally annulled is at liberty to marry again.

1. Does the Christian era date from the birth of Christ? If not, when does it commence?
2. Where will we find the evidence that Christ was crucified April 7, A. D. 30?
T. W. Dunkeson.

1. It dates from four years preceding the birth of Christ, because of an original mistake as to the actual year of his birth.

2. The statement as to the date of Christ's crucifixion is based upon the usually accepted chronology, that of Usher, with the correction of the four years above mentioned, for which he makes no allowance. The day of the month is determined by ascertaining when the Passover came in the year 30, according to the full moon, etc. The crucifixion, of course, is fixed by its relation to the Passover.

To whom does the pronoun "us" refer as used by Paul in Ephesians 1:1–12? Also, are those included in "ye" of the 13th verse the same as those of "us" of the preceding verses?
Geo. C. Ritchey.

The "us" and "we" in the verses cited refer to those who had already accepted the gospel. These were mainly Jews. In the twelfth verse there is a contrast between "We who had before hoped in Christ," and "Ye also having heard the word of the truth," etc., in which the former refers to Christians who had already received the gospel, probably Jews, while the "ye" refers to the Gentile Christians to whom the gospel came later. Paul declared the gospel to be "the power of God unto salvation unto every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek." This order was followed in the preaching, and it is to this fact that reference is made in the verses referred to.

The Preacher and the Poets

By HUGH McLELLAN

The poet and the preacher are both servants of God. One is the seer of natural religion, the other the prophet of the revealed. The poet's temple is the grove, and his altars the rocks; his organ is the forest, his choir the myriad voices of birds and winds and thunder and sea; his audience the world-heart. Amid these surroundings the poet walks as high priest and enters into the secret places of the most high. The preacher ministers at an altar, but upon that altar lies the written and inspired Word. From this clearer and authoritative revelation the preacher draws his message and speaks to listening faces. Every true poet is a preacher; and every true preacher, in his loftier moods, has something of the poet in him. The muse and the spirit are both working to the same end, and the ecstatic rapture is not unlike the divine afflatus. The work of the poet and the work of the preacher are mutually helpful, for the muse finds its followers among the pure in heart, and the child of faith mounts upon natural wings to divine certainties.

Poetry has always been the handmaid of religion; as a voice in the wilderness it has proclaimed the coming kingdom. Religion has much use for poetry; for while, for a time, the mind of faith may rest assured in the authoritative statements of revelation, yet there comes a time to every enquiring mind when, relaxing its hold upon sentences and statements, it leans back on the great natural elements of the universe and finds strength and assurance made doubly sure. The philosophic mind would find difficulty in holding to an authoritative revelation, were it not confirmed in the pages of physical nature and the book of human experience. Thus do the poet and the preacher call the soul up to God in different ways; the one using the love of God in nature, and the other the same love as seen in a suffering Savior. It is well then for the preacher to acquaint himself with the poets that specially help him.

A preacher when he goes into the pulpit takes in two things: First, his own personality; second, his message. Personality is not merely physical presence. Were that the case, a great preacher could be weighed out in ounces or measured off in feet. Presence is that selfhood which lies back of flesh and looks out through the eyes and trembles in the voice—that quality which makes one man a John and another a Judas. A personality can make Felix tremble even though the preacher be mean in bodily presence. The preacher's message is, of course, his sermon. There are poets for personality and poets for messages.

The poets for personality are those which vitalize and strengthen one's own manhood, which refine one's spiritual nature—poets that are not for trade; poets that are not cash carried around in the pocket, but gold mines back in the mountains of one's possessions; poets that are not chalk to whiten a face, but oxygen to redden blood.

First of all, a preacher should have the element of manliness. He should be a man. Not an angel nor a jelly-fish nor a sexless, pietistic clericalism, with the form of a man and the tastes of a woman—a monstrum horrendum—what Kipling calls "a blooming harumfradite"; no indeed, but he who would gain the respect of men (and women too) must be a man. Now there is a group of poets that we might call the "manly poets"—poets that have a splendid virility ringing through their lines, and who give us a healthy view of life. Burns, Browning and Kipling will do to represent the group.

Burns gives us manhood, honest manhood, as the crowning work of God. An unadulterated manhood is the major of his song—manly love, manly toil, manly independence. The strong arm and the brave heart is the combination he loves. We of the white face and white tie need a little more color in our cheeks and sermons and lives. Burns stands for out-of-doors, for plain food, for physical life all the way from mice to men. He is a tonic for a class of men who have been associated too much with rocking chairs.

Browning is a manly poet in another way. He frees the intellect. He vitalizes the mind. He throws the mind out into deep water and makes it swim. He talks to you presuming that you are a man with a man's mind and that you are able to confront a great problem in life or love without fear. He explains nothing, he softens nothing. Tennyson and Longfellow explain so much that there is nothing left to the reader. It takes only one lobe of the brain to read them. Browning makes a man of the reader because he trusts him. He lets him do the thinking as well as the reading. Browning helps to manhood, again, by his doctrine of the individual. He believes in the individual, not in the crowd. He believes that you are worth something, that you are worth speaking to, that your love and your hate and your patience and your temper and all that belongs to you are worth something. Browning is brain tonic—grape-nuts and phosphorus all in one.

Kipling is the poet who gets a great deal out of things. He loves the world—the world of war and ships and camps and white men and black men and elephants. He is a kind of foreign missionary without the gospel. If he has any gospel it is the Gospel of Things. A man will be more interested in his parish by being interested in Kipling.

Burns is for a healthy heart, Browning for a healthy mind, and Kipling for a healthy observation.

In the second place, the preacher should be a man of strong feeling. To preach strongly one must feel strongly. Back of all denunciation and exhortation is the personal feeling of the preacher. Can he rouse to indignation unless he be indignant? Can he kindle to enthusiasm who is not enthusiastic? Can he influence at all who hides his heart? There are times when the preacher must become a burning brand flaming before his people; when a mighty zeal for God consumes him; when, leaping out of "firstlys" and "thirdlys," and spurning the constraining machinery of formal homiletics, he becomes a throbbing word,—a word that knows no logic save the logic "must," and uses no art save the tumultuous cumulations of passion. There are poets that help to this end—poets who pulse, who throb, whose metre is the heart-beat and whose words are drops of blood. Such are Shelley, David, Wordsworth, and Whitman.

Shelley is the poet of indignation. Eagle-like he beats his ineffectual wing against his cage, and tires his eye in gazing at an impossible sun. It is heart-gymnastics to read Shelley sympathetically.

Keats' is a gentler strain—a dove-like, heart-moving sorrow.

The Psalms of David are strangely full of diverse feeling. The transitions are rapid from faith to doubt, from joy to sorrow, from sin to penitence. The psalms are like David's own wild harp, vibrant under the sweeping fingers of feeling.

Wordsworth is the poet of subdued feeling. He is deeply moved in the presence of a flower. His feeling is strong but at first it is unseen. It is like the under-tide of the sea, not evident until one is caught in its flow.

Whitman is the poet of nakedness. His is a glaring sincerity. He may be used as salt to savor the mass.

All of these poets help to heart-revelation, which revelation is the secret of power. There is a great lesson for the preacher in that old picture of Jesus standing with his flaming heart exposed.

The third element of personality evident in a speaker should be culture. This gives to all his utterances that indescribable charm which Matthew Arnold calls "sweetness and light." It is to discourse what the blue mist is to a mountain—mystery in its beauty and gentleness in its strength. It is this element in a speaker's style which lifts him out of the prosaic and puts his feet in the way of interest. There is a group of poets that help to do this. They are the poets of high English classic—poets that have grafted the Greek branch into the English vine. A few of them are,—Shakespeare (especially in his sonnets), Collins, Gray, Lowell, and Clough.

Now for the poets that help a preacher in his message. We might call them the "quotable poets." They are the poets that have said good things in the best way. It is hardly worth while to particularize. All the great poets are in this class. Quote their noble utterances to barb and feather the gospel shaft. The time has come for the throwing away of cheap, trashy anecdotes and untrue incidents. They are unworthy of the pulpit. A whole sky-full of poetic light may be had for the opening of the window.

What is it to be a student of poetry? Is it simply a reading interest? Is it the accumulation of quotations? No, it is to see life as the poet sees it. It is one thing to quote "A man's a man for a' that," and another thing to see the view of life that Burns saw. It is easy to quote "Why I am a Liberal," but it is hard to accept the moral responsibility of the lines. The poetic view is the true view. It is the view that looks the way of nature's great laws. A great sea of truth sets toward that point; and our barks sail swiftest in the flow of these natural currents. Thus does poetry become the handmaiden of religion, and the streams that flow from Helicon's harmonious springs water the vales of Sharon. Thus are the golden apples of the gospel held in the silver baskets of a true literary form.

English Topics.

British Extravagance.

We are in England in sore need of a school of true reformers. All great nations waste vast resources and Britain is amongst the most prodigal of all. This extravagance arises from the cost of an enormous aristocratic officialism. Our Civil Service is very efficient and is freer from venality and corruption than that of any other country; but its expense is appalling. Every inhabitant of the United Kingdom has to pay about a pound a year in order that Civil Service officials may receive their salaries. The Service costs the country 38 million pounds (190 million dollars) annually, which would mean a salary of nearly 40 pounds for each of the 100,000 officials from the Prime Minister to the humblest clerk downward, but for the fact that traveling expenses, printing and building have to be taken into account. It is an astonishing fact that more than one-third of the government's entire income is annually absorbed by the Service. The army only receives one-sixth. One of the smallest salaries is that of the turncock at Buckingham Palace. He gets 28 shillings a week, free residence and 8 pounds in addition every year for catching rats in the Palace. The Lord High Chancellor at the other extreme, receives 10,000 pounds, or as much as is paid to the President of the United States.

Critics of the Higher Criticism.

Those who are tired of hearing about the higher criticism are mistaken if they imagine that the critical movement is subsiding. I have just received from the publishers Vol. II, of the new Encyclopædia Biblica. It is a magnificent book. The work will require two other volumes to complete it. One of its chief uses will be to show the religious world what the higher critics really mean, and what they can really do. I do not see how they can go any further than they have gone in this Vol. II, which far transcends Vol I in speculative audacity. The late celebrated Dr. John Brown, of Edinburgh, (author of that delightful book Horae Subsecivae) used to say that the necessary characteristics of successful writing were comprised in the four classic adjectives, Sagax, Capax, Perspicax, Efficax. I am glad to say that the Enclopædia Biblica fully answers to the Capax and Efficax, but I am very doubtful about the Sagax and the Perspicax. Undoubtedly it is a magnificent monument of the complete erudition of the age. I wish some millionaires in England and America would give a copy to every minister in the two countries. The authors of the articles are distinguished,the list including many of the greatest scholars in Britain, Germany and America. Amongst the British are Drs. Bruce, Davidson, Kennedy, Conder, George Adam Smith, G. Buchanan Gray, Hope W. Hogg, Israel Abrahams, Armitage Robinson, Norman McLean, Owen Whitehouse, Stanley Cook, T. G. Pinches and T. K. Cheyne. The Germans include Professors Tiele, Kautsch, Adolf Deissmann, Hermann Guthe, Baron Hermann Von Soden, Julius Wellhausen, Immanuel Benzinger, Paul Volz, Theodor Noldeke. The American contributors are Professors Toy, of Harvard; Francis Brown, of New York; G. F. Moore, of Andover; Morris Jastrow, of Pennsylvania University; N. Schmidt, of Cornell; Orello Cone, of St. Laurence; W. Max Muller of Philadelphia. Thus, the finest biblical learning of two continents is enlisted in the production of this splendid literary religious performance. It is interesting to note how it is being received. While the most competent organs of the religious press are unanimous in praising it for its massive scholarship, they seem to be as one in expressing consternation in view of its excessive destructionism. The editors are Professors Cheyne and Sutherland Block. Canon Cheyne is the famous Oxford professor of Exegesis. The higher critics have in this Vol. II, thoroughly astounded the literary world. What may be called the "extreme left," is represented in this encyclopædia as never before. The reviewers are all fluttered. One very competent writer says that in many cases "higher criticism helps itself to anthropological facts and arguments, taken straight from Mr. Herbert Spencer. These facts and arguments are used as confidently as if Mr. Spencer had brought them down from a mountain as the result of some supernormal revelation. This criticism may be higher, but is not scientific. A man in this world must get his knowledge for himself. It will not do to rely on facts collected by proxy for a philosopher with a theory."

Demonstrative Destructionism.

The old conservative position in theology has been for some time exploded. But that is no reason for the abject surrender of all cautionary discretion. In my humble opinion the higher critics are far too reckless. A lady happened recently to make some remark on the Ruskin Exhibition. "Yes, but what is Ruskin?" asked another lady. In the same way one is always hearing about the "higher criticism," and is eager to ask, "What is higher criticism?" The phrase is usually applied to biblical studies. I know that, but it is also applied to Homeric and even to Shakespearian pursuits. Thus, if we make a study, by the "comparative method," of Bacon and Shakespeare, of all the adjacent literature and history, of the drama in all ages, of all Shakespearian first editions, folios and so forth, of all known examples of collaboration, and of literary frauds and forgeries, is not that higher criticism? But if this laborious and well equipped specialist goes on to conclude that Bacon was a son of Queen Mary Stuart by John Knox, that he is the author of "Macbeth," and with Nash, of "Hamlet" also, while Burleigh collaborated in "Henry IV," are we bound to take his revelation for gospel, or rather, for the critical reverse of gospel, for truth? Must we do this if half a dozen other higher critics have half a dozen other theories equally learned? Now let us think a moment about the much advertised "conclusions of the higher criticism." We soon grow bewildered by the higher critics themselves. Prof. Noldeke says "the Book of Esther is perfectly unhistorical." But Prof. Layse says just the reverse. A reviewer in the Academy loses his head altogether and regards Esther as a purely secular narrative with no more religion in it than "Jack the Giant Killer." He adopts the Wellhausen view that the book "under a thin disguise shows two Babylonian deities (Morduk and Ishtar) conquering the Elamite god Hamman and his consort Vashti." The truth is that Prof. Noldeke indulges in much fantastic guesswork, and so do many of the writers in this Encyclopædia Biblica. It is a sad pity that fifty of the most learned specialists in Europe should unite to plunge the religious community into a quagmire of doubt at the beginning of the 20th century. With respect to the New Testament articles, the most important subjects have been entrusted by Prof. Cheyne to Prof. Schmiedel, of Zurich, whose speculations travel far beyond sound evidence. He evidently has a low opinion of the historical value of the Acts, which he regards as a composite work issued in its present form in the 2nd century. He puts John's Gospel as late as A. D. 135, and regards its apostolic authorship as impossible. It is unfortunate that a volume of such marvelous research should be so constituted on one-sided theoretic and hypothetic lines as to be calculated to unsettle faith with any real evidential corroboration for justification.

WILLIAM DURBAN.

43 Park Road, South Tottenham, London, March 28, 1901.

[Let there be no dismay. The foundation of God standeth sure. The faith was never in less danger of being overthrown. If the work referred to by our correspondent has taken untenable ground or has advanced theories in antagonism with the eternal verities, other critics will soon make this fact manifest, and the learned volumes will ere long be but monuments of human folly. Meanwhile let us possess our souls in patience and avail ourselves of whatever truth the work may contain.—EDITOR.]

Kansas City Letter.

By George H. Combs.

Easter has come and gone, with its perfect sky, its flowers and its worship. The churches were filled to overflowing and gladness reigned in our hearts. Somehow on this day of days the great truth of the resurrection of the Christ seems more real, more impressive, than at other times and the power of that resurrection more felt in all our lives. We feel then and more deeply than at other hours that this story of the resurrection is more than historic, is prophetic as well, telling not only of the Christ victory over death, but through him the victory of the Christian over sin. He rose, we too shall rise. "Risen with Christ"—may this be true of all who have named his name.

One of our preachers here has recently added much, and somewhat to his surprise, to his stock of experience. In the discussion of the dignity of labor coming through the Christ, the abolition of caste and the essential equality of all in the sight of God, he stated in concrete illustrative way that the girl who served in the kitchen was of equal honor with the girl who served in office or in shop. This seemed not only a very democratic and Christian doctrine but a very trite and homely statement as well, but mirabile dictu, the newspapers the next morning under flaring headlines on first page ran the "radical" sermon, and a tempest in the teapot was on. The statement that the servant girl is just as good as the office girl provoked a storm of indignation, and the further contention that this girl was often quite the equal of her mistress was met with hot resentment. There were paper broadsides by the wholesale and this poor offending preacher was kept quite busy for several days in answering irate enquirers over the telephone, but the storm at last passed by. Whew! Is Pharisaism so alive now? Is Brahmanism flourishing in Christian cities yet? Democracy is all very well "in the air," but we seem to be in no great haste to come to its practical realization.

After all we are to lose one of our most faithful and beloved pastors, A. W. Kokendoffer. Mexico was persistent and reluctantly must we come to the severance of brotherly ties. Our brother will be greatly missed. He has been with us for ten years and during that time, through the consecrated co-operation of his fellow-laborers, has built up a large and aggressive church with a membership of at least eight hundred. A substantial church house has been built during that time and Pastor Kokendoffer hopes to crown his work by raising during his last month's ministry the last dollar of indebtedness on the building. This indeed is a worthy close of a gracious ministry and full of suggestiveness to preachers everywhere. Here is a man whose chief concern is to serve with faithfulness the church of his love and to arrange for his successor and his work before his own ministry shall close. Such unselfishness can but be appreciated by all. Only the health of Mrs. Kokendoffer could afford justification for this step. The argument for long pastorates receives fresh emphasis and new confirmation in this ministry. The pastor of the Forest Avenue Church is doing just now the very best work in his ministry here, his influence having become coextensive with the city, and his removal is a great loss just now to many important interests. One word more: this brother of ours says goodbye to brother preachers between whom and himself there has rested never for a moment the slightest cloud of misunderstanding. Whatever may be the defects of these churches by the Kaw, at least set it down to their credit that there has never been between them the slightest friction, nor has their fellowship been marred by petty rivalries and envyings. This word stands too of the relations of all our ministers here, between whom has ever existed only the most cordial brotherliness and it is with real pain we bring ourselves to say good-bye.

B. L. Smith and C. C. Smith, the tireless and the ever working, are constantly reminding us now of the great day when we shall make our offering to American missions. It is safe to say that if a tithe of their concern for this work were shared by our preachers and workers generally there need be no apprehension of even possible failure. It is so easy to let our secretaries "walk the floor," and yet it is so cowardly and so sinful. Shall we never come to see that these men are simply our servants and that this is our work, the work of all the churches? How to distribute this sense of responsibility is our need of needs. The work of distribution is ever slow, ever lagging behind the work of creation. In the spiritual as in the material world, the problem of the creation of wealth has been solved but not the problem of distribution The sense of responsibility has been created, but it is not generally shared, the missionary conscience has come but has come only to the few. How shall we distribute responsibilities? This is our one unanswered question and yet the one most vital. "American missions to the front"—a worthy rallying cry of a great people in a great and memorable year.

A Bit of Bethany

By GEORGE B. EVANS

Emerging from Pittsburg, "as under a cloud," the traveller at length catches glimpses, through the rifts in the smoke from this greatest steel mart, of hilly country whose gentle slopes are literally covered with a forest of oil derricks. You ride, as it were, in the very shade of these tall, rafter-like structures for several miles. The pipe lines carrying off the oil and furnishing the gas to the engines form a spiderweb of steel tubing. At last you alight at the modest little city, Wellsburg, on the West Virginia side of the Ohio river.

Here you take a buggy for Bethany, for while "all roads lead to Rome," only one leads to Bethany; but then Bethany is not Rome. The Wellsburg-Bethany pike, however, is no mean pike. It is a first class macadamized road, and as you spin along you soon forget all else save the perfect panorama of picturesque scenery that is unrolling before you. Your aesthetic thirst can be quenched by deep draughts of this the nectar of nature. The artist can find in its variety of landscape a constant delight; its pastoral peacefulness, its sylvan shades, its rugged rocks, its sparkling waters, its towering hills, "heaved Pelion upon Ossa's shoulders broad"—all respond to diverse moods. The artistic genius of Divinity revels on such a canvas.

The road follows the historic old Buffalo, making a strengthening levee around its convex curves, while anon it crosses and recrosses its sinuous course over quaint, antique, covered bridges, whose planks are bound together with primeval wooden pegs.

But the road has an individuality that has not yet been mentioned. It twice loses itself in the mountain side to emerge again after threading its way through the shadows of two tunnels. It is not every country road that can boast of such tunnels.

Perhaps many of my readers have been here before, and will therefore remember the landmarks along this Appian way. Surely they have not forgotten the tollgate, Waugh's Dam, Mirror Bend, Jordon's Hollow, Hamlin's Hill, the Narrows, Point Breeze, and then—the glimpse of Bethany.

Before we leave the pike let me relate a little incident in connection with it and Alexander Campbell. The students once decided to play a Hallowe'en prank on the president. The plan was to go to his stable that evening and carry off his coach. Hearing beforehand of their intents upon his coach, Mr. Campbell had concealed himself within it. They got the coach all right and dragged the vehicle almost to Wellsburg. But when they proposed to leave it and return, the "Bishop" made his debut upon the scene, to the complete chagrin of the conspirators. Thanking them heartily for his ride, he told them he would be obliged to ride back with the same pomp and style that had brought him there. Thus it was that early one morning in November the staid Alexander Campbell made quite a sensation in Bethany by dashing into town with his unique "coach and four."

Bethany, like Stringtown, is on the pike. Like the Judean Bethany it is a small, sleepy, secluded hamlet, with dreamy streets like those of "sweet Auburn." Its two score or more of houses have a somewhat ancient appearance, a decided antebellum aspect—rusty and rustic at once.

Doubtless there is no more interesting place to the Disciple than Bethany. Even as the early disciple sought out that quiet, retired village hidden among the Judean hills near Jerusalem, so the Disciple of this day and age seeks amid these West Virginian hills the modern Bethany.

Here is where a greater than Luther taught and lived. It was the home of a sage. Its streets seem sacred because trod by him; its atmosphere pure because he breathed here the free air and sunshine. Indeed memory makes the very pavements pay tribute to this greatest religious star of the nineteenth century.

We must not forget that here is located one of the oldest congregations among us. It is a pioneer among pioneers. Its historic associations are a treasure indeed. Its pulpit since the beginning has been a synonym for Christian culture and consecrated conviction. It has been graced by such godly characters as the Campbells, Isaac Errett, W. K. Pendleton, Chas. L. Loos, W. H. Woolery, and many other bright, brainy men of God.

The church is a very modest brick structure, plain almost to homeliness. J. C. Earl's steel engraving of James Lane Allen's "first house of religious liberty in the western wilderness" in his "Reign of Law" is an exact counterpart of the Bethany church, with the one exception of the location of the doors. Bethany's doors are at the pulpit end of the church. It gives one an incentive to be there on time, for who enjoys the ordeal of walking down an aisle the length of a church before the eyes of all, especially several minutes late? Inside, as without, it is very plain, with its old-fashioned, high-backed pews.

But let us climb the hill to the college. No student ever forgets that hill. How many hundreds have trudged panting and perspiring up its steep slope. The Hebrew students always go up with a prayer for more "breath of lives."

Crossing the campus where soon "biz" couples shall mingle with the mating birds and add their incessant buzz to the stir of summer zephyrs, we arrive at the crest of the hill. Here stretches the old Gothic pile of buildings, one-sixteenth of a mile in length, with its turrets, spires, and battlements. Lifting its head above all is the tower with its belfry.

I wonder if, out in life's activities, when our college days will be but a sacred memory, we shall still hear the tolling of that bell. Shall its silvery tones always call us to duty? It is "Liberty Bell," graven with letters of burnished gold that read, "Proclaim religious liberty and truth throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof."

Then, too, there is the corridor. Who can forget it!

"We are marching, we are marching once again on the old Corridor,
We are singing, gaily singing, all the songs we have sung oft before;
Loudly swells our glad and happy chorus,
Care and sorrow flee before us,
And the hours pass lightly o'er us, as we march and sing to-day."

How its rafters ring with "Alma Mater," "The Banks of the Old Buffalo," "When a Hundred Years Have Rolled," "Solomon Levi," and "Bethany, Dear Bethany." Bethany's individuality is best revealed on her corridor. Its planks are worn hollow with the tramp, tramp, tramp of her loyal sons and daughters who have talked and sung "On the Corridor."

But we have no time to pause for the chapel service, for it is Friday morning, and there are orations. Neither can we visit the society halls or recitation rooms and talk to "our Profs so dear."

One little story about the tower before we leave the building. Some years ago several students took a calf up on the college tower and left it tied there. It was not a golden calf that they raised, although it did "come high." Indeed beef was highest then in Bethany.

Let us summarize some of Bethany's history. In 1840 Jno. C. Campbell, of Wheeling, obtained from the legislature of Virginia the charter of this institution. On September eighteenth of the same year Alexander Campbell was elected president of the college and was asked to prepare a course of studies. Upon a tract of land presented by Mr. Campbell a large brick structure was soon erected, and on November 1, 1841, the first session of Bethany College began. The loss of her building by fire in 1857, the interruption of the civil war, and the death of her founder and president in 1866 mark the dark places in Bethany's history.

Bethany is the mother of us all. She has furnished presidents to most of our other colleges, has supplied their Bible chairs, and given them many other scholarly instructors, has edited our prominent papers, has seen her sons in the halls of Congress and at foreign courts, and in countless ways has been a crown of rejoicing to the state as well as the church. Look up, oh Bethany, and see that

"High up on the scroll of honor and fame, Thy sons, strong and manly, have written thy name."

Leaving Bethany, let us go even unto Bethphage, for that is what we call the old Campbell home. It is just beyond the village, up a lane shaded on either side by overhanging locusts.

Here is where the Father of the Restoration spent his busiest, happiest days. For twenty-five years he "came in and went out" from this cozy home. Here he lived at peace with God and man, giving the best of his heart, hand and mind to the college that he loved so dearly.

I visited that home the other day. As I went across its gardens and through its rooms and viewed the relics and treasures of the family, I felt highly privileged in being able to see such sights, such scenes.

About one hundred and fifty feet west of the residence is Alexander Campbell's study, a brick building hexagonal in shape, with a skylight, since "lux descendit e caelo." This study used to have a wing thirty-five feet in length in which were stored books, pamphlets and papers. It was in this study that Mr. Campbell wrote his books and edited the "Millennial Harbinger." The study is shaded by larch and fir trees brought from Philadelphia in 1839.

The cemetery overlooks the Campbell home. Stretching between the two is an orchard, whose annual budding and blossoming tell of a resurrection. Thus the dead on that hillside sleep "near to nature's heart," so near that they can hear her pulsations in each spring's rejuvenation. Here lie not only Alexander Campbell, but Thomas Campbell, W. K. Pendleton, W. H. Woolery, J. M. Trible, the sainted Richardson, and others. "Though dead they yet speak," still live; "their works do follow them."

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

A meeting of the International Sunday-school Lesson Committee was held in New York the 17th and 18th days of April. The following members of the committee were present: Prof. John R. Sampey, of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky.; Bishop H. W. Warren, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Denver; Principal E. I. Rexford, Episcopalian, Quebec; Prof. J. S. Stahr, of the Reformed Church, Lancaster, Pa.; the Rev. Mesheim Rhodes, D. D., of St. Mark's Lutheran Church, St. Louis; Prof. J. Q. D. Hinds, Lebanon University, Lebanon, Tenn.; Dr. John Potts, Victoria College, Toronto; the Rev. A. F. Schauffler, D. D., superintendent of New York City Missions, and the writer. The members of the committee who were not present were: Prof. J. M. Stiffler, of Crozer Theological Seminary; Mr. B. F. Jacobs, Chicago; Dr. A. E. Dunning, editor of The Congregationalist, Boston; Bishop E. B. Kephart, of the United Brethren Church; Mr. John R. Prepper, Memphis, Tenn., and Prof. W. W. Moore, Richmond, Va. Mr. Jacobs is in ill health, Dr. Dunning is in Europe, Bishop Kephart was detained in the discharge of his episcopal duties, Mr. Prepper was not able to attend on account of business engagements, and Prof. Moore requested to be relieved from further service on the committee.

The most interesting and important feature of this meeting was the presence of eighteen or twenty writers of Sunday-school lesson notes. They were present by invitation of the Lesson Committee. They were requested to come with suggestions that would be helpful to the committee and through the committee to the Sunday-school work throughout the world. I believe that you will be interested in knowing who were present and the names of the publications represented. M. C. Hazard, of the Pilgrim Teacher; W. J. Semmelroth, of the International Evangel; C. R. Blackall, of the Baptist Teacher; M. W. Williams, of the Sunday-school World; R. W. Miller, of the Heidelberg Teacher; I. J. Van Ness, of the Convention Teacher; O. F. Stafford, of the Sunday-school Helper; T. B. Neely, of the Sunday-school Journal; J. A. McKamy, of the Sunday-school Work; C. S. Albert, of the Augsburg Teacher; C. G. Trumbull and P. E. Howard, of the Sunday-school Times; F. N. Peloubet, of Peloubet's Notes; D. C. Cook, Mrs. Cook, Mrs. Caldwell and Miss C. B. Leonard, of the D. C. Cook Publishing Company; W. A. Wilde and Mrs. Wilde, of W. A. Wilde & Co.; Mrs. M. G. Kennedy, editor of the Quarterlies of the American Baptist Publication Society; James Atkins, of the Sunday-school Magazine, and R. D. Fraser, of Canada, editor of the Sunday-school publications in the Dominion, were present and offered suggestions. The persons here named organized at this time the Sunday-school Editors' Association.

The principal requests presented were the following:

(1) Lessons for beginners, i. e., children under six years of age; and (2) Two years of supplemental lessons for advanced students. It was suggested that the "supplemental" lessons should be (1) historical, (2) topical. The committee agreed to attempt the selection of lessons for beginners, and a special committee was appointed to take into consideration the second suggestion and report a year hence.

The Sunday-school is in a transition state. The above mentioned requests and the action of the Lesson Committee indicate that such is the case. The Rev. F. N. Peloubet, of Peloubet's Notes, said that the desire for a longer time on a given subject is increasing; that instead of six months on a subject, as has been the custom from the beginning of the uniform lesson system, an entire year should be given to a subject. Instead of six months, for instance, in "Hebrew history," and a similar length of time in "The Life of Christ," let an entire year be given to each. This statement from a gentleman so well informed occasioned surprise, and is one of many indications that our Sunday-school work is in a transition state.

The International Sunday-school Lesson Committee is not a close corporation. Its members do not think that they have completed the curriculum of knowledge. They ask for suggestions and give them fair consideration when they are presented. They are the servants of the Sunday-schools in America and Europe. As a matter of fact suggestions came to the committee in its recent meeting from India. If you desire at any time to reach the committee with suggestions, address the Rev. A. E. Dunning, D. D., 14 Beacon St., Boston, Mass. Dr. Dunning is secretary of the Lesson Committee.

In the New York meeting the lessons for 1903 were completed and those for 1904 were blocked out.

There is an English branch of the Lesson Committee. The initiative and the final decision are with the American members. The lessons, for instance, for 1903 were selected a year ago and were sent to the members of the English committee, all of whom reside in London. They came before us at our last meeting with the criticisms and suggestions of our English brethren, for a final decision. The lessons selected for 1904 will be sent across the waters to our English kin who will suggest emendations, corrections, additions, changes and subtractions, all of which will come before the committee on this side the ocean at its meeting in June, 1902. This will indicate to you with what care and deliberation the International Sunday-school lessons are prepared. They are not, as you see, thrown together in a careless manner. Nor are they the work alone of the fifteen gentlemen composing the American branch of the International Lesson Committee. They are the work of the English committee and of the most thoughtful and efficient Sunday-school workers in the world. This is enough for the present on this subject.

A Lord's day was spent recently with the Euclid Avenue Church in Cleveland en route to New York. J. H. Goldner is pastor. This is a great church. It seems to be in good condition. I do not know of a better congregation in our brotherhood. It is a remarkably intelligent church. There has never been sensational work in the Euclid Avenue Church. Such work would not be tolerated. All that I have heard of Bro. Goldner was good. He is a young man—probably not more than thirty years of age. It is remarkable that one so young should be pastor of such a church, and still more remarkable that he should be able, in such a place, to give satisfation in his work.

A morning was spent also with the Hyde Park Church in Chicago—Edward Scribner Ames, pastor. Dr. Ames gave a thoughtful and thought-provoking sermon to a good audience—good in both size and quality—on "The Present Day Creed." The creed for our time, in a word, is personal trust in, and an enthusiastic devotion to Jesus Christ our Lord. This was the substance of the sermon. About a year has passed since my last meeting with this congregation. Evidences of improvement were visible on every hand.

The Disciples in and about New York are veritable heroes. It is a great thing that, in the midst of their unfavorable environment, they live. But they are more than merely living. They are steadily increasing in numbers. Their increase is not rapid—but there is an increase. B. Q. Denham is with the church on West Fifty-sixth Street; J. M. Philputt is with the congregation on 119th Street; S. T. Willis is with the Disciples on 169th Street; M. E. Harlan is with the church in Sterling Place, in Brooklyn; Joseph Keeval, I think is with the Green Point congregation in Brooklyn; and a Bro. Shepard is with the company recently organized in Newark, N. J. There were 450 in Bro. Willis' Sunday-school not long since, and this without any sensational attraction. Quite a number of additions have recently been made to these churches. They are living in peace and unity. I believe there is a congregation of Disciples in Brooklyn not named in the foregoing list. My admiration for the pluck, courage, patience, persistence of the Disciples of Christ in New York and vicinity is almost extravagant. The difficulties are colossal. I know what they are. I encountered them for thirteen years.

Was Campbell a Disciple of Locke

By IRA BILLMAN

In the common acceptation of the word, a disciple is one who takes another for his authority. If, therefore, it can be shown that it was a matter of principle with Campbell to "call no man master," it follows that he was not a disciple of Locke. The proof is at hand. On the authority of Scripture, and not of Locke or any other man, Campbell held that "Christians only" must be only Disciples of Christ.

In his Memoirs of Campbell, Vol. II, p. 132, Richardson gives the thought in a few words: "Campbell utterly denied he was a follower of ——— or any other human leader." The declaration is final. The thought is not to be entertained for a moment that the brainiest man of his age did not know what constituted a disciple! Surely, in the face of such a sweeping statement made by Campbell himself, that he was not the follower of any human leader, knowing as he did what they all stood for better than any other living man, the contrary claim advanced by some one else, whatever his researches among "the sources of Campbell's theology," must simply have no force whatever.

This position is capable of scientific demonstration. "Like produces like." "Men do not gather grapes of thorns." No man was Campbell's master and therefore he has became no man's master. There is no "Campbellite Church." The world was ripe for an ecclesiastical ruler. It conspired to that end. Had Campbell been a sectarian he would have founded a sect, and no help for it. The proof is conclusive that Campbell was not a disciple of Locke.

At this point in the argument the claim is made that "Lockianism was the prevalent philosophy of the times and so Campbell must of necessity have been molded by its influence, and therefore was a Lockian." With like force it might be said: Sectarianism was the prevailing sentiment in the ecclesiastical world, therefore Campbell used its tool and of necessity became a Churchman! Nay, more! If all the men following Locke had of necessity to use his tool, then he had to use the tool of those before him—and we now use a dug-out, not an ocean steamer! The fact is, instead of being molded by the "philosophical concepts" of his time, in this instance the clay turned on the potter and put materialism to a perpetual confusion!

The stress of the argument is laid on this point. "Campbell was trained in the Lockian school of thought and adopted its characteristic principles, one of which is, the source of all our knowledge is the senses." To meet this claim, we have the denial of Campbell that he adopted the characteristic principles of any man, joined with the declaration of Pres. James McCosh, than whom no man is better qualified to judge, who says: "For ages Locke was spoken of in France and Germany as a sensationalist. He is certainly not liable to this charge, as he everywhere insists on reflection as a source of ideas." —Schaff-Hertzog, p. 1333. The case is remarkable. The first man declares on his honor he has not stolen the horse, and the second man with equal emphasis declares there was no such horse to steal.

But we are told, "Campbell applied Lockianism to theology, e. g., faith is the belief in testimony and conversion is due to the written word alone." We are thus given to understand that Campbell accepted Locke's teaching, that knowledge comes alone through the senses. The statement wrongs both Locke and Campbell. As McCosh says: "Locke teaches we get our ideas from experience through the two inlets of sensation and reflection," which is a very different thing from getting them through the one inlet of the senses. In this there is nothing conflicting with the most orthodox mental philosophy as now taught; that "the whole mind operates through the senses, understanding and reason." On this subject no man is better able to support an opinion than McCosh, and he says: "Locke is not liable to the charge of empiricism." No more is he liable to the charge of materialism or rationalism.

But one point more remains for a brief notice. The claim that Campbell believed and taught some things in common with Locke, and therefore, if not his disciple, he was at least a Lockian, is the same as it would be to claim that Campbell was a Sandemanian, because they too believed and taught some things in common. When, therefore, Campbell claims for principle's sake, that he is not a Lockian, to persist in so naming him is of a piece with the conduct of those who gratify their venom by calling Christians Campbellites. The fact is, nothing in the world is more easily established than that Campbell was an independent thinker. He says himself: "I have endeavored to read the Scriptures as though no man had ever read them before me, and I am as much on guard against reading them to-day through the medium of my views yesterday." Such a man is not even a follower of himself!

If space would permit many things might be shown wherein Campbell held on his course at variance with Locke. But enough, if what we have written aids to a revelation of what is at the bottom of this effort to kill Campbell and Locke with one stone! Our conclusion is, because Campbell denied he was the follower of any man; because a man is a free agent despite "the reign of law;" because holding some things in common with another does not make one his disciple — Campbell was neither a Lockian nor a disciple of Locke, and that we should quit calling him so or give up the protest against being called Campbellites!

[The above article by Bro. Billman suggests to the editor the following comments:

1. It is wholly unwarrantable to define a disciple as "one who takes another for his authority." The dictionary definition, "one who believes the teaching of another," is better. Whether or not Campbell was a disciple of Locke in this sense (which is the only correct use of the term) is a question which cannot be answered without two inquiries: First, what were the essential points of Locke's teaching? Second, did Campbell believe them? The article would be more to the point if it gave attention to these questions.

2. It has never been claimed that Campbell was a disciple of Locke in anything but philosophy, and indirectly in theology, since his theological thought was influenced by his psychology and theory of knowledge. If his principle to "call no man master" involves independence from all teachers in philosophy, it must also involve independence from all teachers in science and mathematics and literature. To give universal application to this denial of human leadership, instead of limiting it, as Campbell did, to matters of religion, is to impute to him colossal egotism as well as impossible individualism.

3. "Like produces like." True, Campbell was no sectarian and therefore founded no sect. Also true, but irrelevant. This does not affect the question, whether he had a teacher in philosophy or theology; it only means that he did not confuse these with the gospel and therefore did not make them tests of fellowship.

4. Whether or not the world was ripe for an "ecclesiastical ruler" at the beginning of the nineteenth century, is at least questionable. Our opinion is that an "ecclesiastical ruler" at that period would have been an impossibility. Many tried this role, but all failed.

5. The statement that Campbell must of necessity have been a follower of Locke in philosophy needs explanation. He might have been a man so ignorant of his time as not to know about Locke's philosophy or any other; but he was not. Or he might have been a philosopher himself like Locke or Kant, capable of entering into the situation as it was and of contributing so much original thought to the solution of its philosophical problems as to become more a teacher than a disciple; but he was not. Campbell evinced no special genius for philosophy. Since he neither ignored philosophy nor originated anything in it, he must have been a disciple.

6. Whether or not Locke can be correctly called a "sensationalist" is not a relevant inquiry. He did not hold that sensation is the sole source of knowledge, but that it is the source of the materials of knowledge. It is not obviously inappropriate to call this "sensationalism." But call it what you will, Campbell's theory of knowledge was the same as Locke's, so changing its name will not affect the question of the former's discipleship.

7. "Sandemanianism" is a name applied to the religious beliefs of a sect; "Lockianism" is the name applied to certain philosophical beliefs. If Campbell's religious opinions had been as much like those of Sandeman as his philosophical opinions were like those of Locke, it would have been hard to persuade the world that he was not a Sandemanian. He could, however, have referred to a divine master as his teacher in religion, but there is no inspired teacher of philosophy whose disciple he could claim to be.

8. It is to be regretted that the writer of the above article sees fit to use such a phrase as "gratifying their venom" in connection with those who believe that Campbell was, in philosophy, a disciple of Locke. Such expressions tend to raise the temperature of discussion to a point higher than that in which dispassionate philosophical inquiry flourishes.

Finally the relation of Campbell's philosophy to Locke's is one which cannot be settled without an inquiry into Campbell's philosophy. For such an investigation (which has not been attempted here either in the article or in this comment) see the volume entitled "Alexander Campbell's Theology," by W. E. Garrison.—EDITOR.]

Dignity and Responsibility of Man.

By Louis S. Cupp.

Man is an abridged edition of God. A Christian is a new edition, carefully revised and enlarged. No star, or beast, or bird can claim such honor and dignity, such kinship to God. He is the spiritual image of the Father, and like God is immortal. "Thou hast made him but little lower than God, and crownest him with glory and honor." Like God man has intellect and free will, the same in kind as the Father, differing only in degree. Man reads the laws of nature and thinks God's thoughts after him. Where God has omniscience man has finite knowledge. Where God has infinite love man has finite love. Where God has infinite memory man has finite memory, the same in kind as far as it goes. He is the only creature that can worship God and render intelligent obedience. Man is the only praying animal. He is the crown and climax of all creation. He is the natural lord of earth's creatures and forces. "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet." In this kinship to God and mastery of nature we see the true dignity of man.

But this dignity confers great responsibility. The king's son must live worthy of his father. So we are under obligation to live worthy of the great honor which God has bestowed upon us. This obligation is born, not made. A man's obligation to live a righteous life, like his obligation to be a good citizen, is born with him. There is no escape from it. This obligation rests on all alike, sinners as well as saints, for all are in God's image. Men out of the church are under as much obligation to live decent, virtuous, godly lives as those in the church. What is wrong for the church member to do is equally wrong for the worldlian. God sets the standard of morality not over the church simply, but over the world. By this standard all men at the last day will be judged.

Staying out of church does not excuse you for lack of righteousness. To a profane man I say, "Friend, don't you know it is wrong to swear, to take God's name in vain, in whose image you are created?" and he answers, "Oh, I never make any pretensions of Christianity." He thinks that excuses him, but does it? A man insults your wife and you take him to task about it. He says, "I have never made any pretensions of being a gentleman." Would you excuse him? No. You know he is under as much obligation to be a gentleman as you are. A liar says, "I have never made any pretensions of being truthful," or a convicted thief pleads, "I have never pretended to be honest," will the judge excuse him? No. Does the law free the bank robber because he is not a church member? Neither will God excuse your immorality because you are out of the church. There is no license in disobedience. Becoming a Christian does not add a single obligation which has not rested upon you from the age of accountability, neither does being a sinner subtract one. Every obligation rests upon the sinner which rests upon the Christian. All his life he has been under the deepest obligation to give himself and the best that is in him to God and humanity. Christianity is not so much assuming new responsibilities as it is discharging old obligations by a new adjustment of faith and life. Men say, "I don't want to join the church, because I would have to quit drinking, or gambling, or cheating, or abusing my neighbors, or my business, or keeping open on Sundays." If it is wrong to do these things in the church it is wrong to do them out of the church. Staying out does not excuse you. The man out of the church feels under as much obligation to rear a virtuous family as the Christian. Then why not accept for himself the equally moral obligation to live a righteous life?

"Then why must I join the church?" the sinner asks, "why can't I discharge my obligation by living righteously out of the church?" A dozen answers might be given, but here three must suffice. First, because joining Christ is joining the church, and without Christ there is no salvation. Second, because "the Holy Spirit is given to them that obey him" (Acts 5:32), and without the Spirit no man can live the kind of life God demands. Third, because there can be no true righteousness where obedience to Christ is omitted.

Some withdraw from the church because of their illegal business or bad habits and think to have thus freed themselves from all obligation towards righteous living. Others absent themselves from the Lord's supper for the same purpose. Both classes seem to think their proceeding has somehow legalized their business and habits and freed them from guilt. A greater mistake could not be made. If your business and habits are bad you have no more right to continue them out of the church than in it; no more right to practice them when you do not commune than when you do. Shifting your attitude with respect to the church does not relieve you of responsibility to God. You must quit your illegal business and habits, not the church, if God holds you guiltless. Every step of the prodigal going away from home but increases his obligation to return.

Sometimes a church member, when moving into a new community, hides his letter in the bottom of his trunk and thinks he has permission to do as he pleases. It is a false view of righteousness. A change of location does not free you from obligation to do right. This obligation is not born of the church or the community, but of God. The image of God is not on the letter, but on your soul. You are under as much obligation to contribute to the expenses of this new church, to give to missions, and to live righteously as though your letter were in the hands of God in heaven, instead of in your trunk. Let us remember that whether in the church or out of it, "each one of us shall give account of himself to God." As preachers, let us urge upon sinners that they are under as much obligation to do right as we are.

The Evolution of Christian Unity

By J. M. LOWE

Growth is God's way of bringing things to perfection. Life burns with a passion for more and better. This is what fills life with interest and thrills it with hope. Whatever is true or false concerning evolution as applied to the natural universe, it is true beyond a question that character cannot be created, but is born of struggle and grows thereby. What is true of the individual is true of society. The church must grow as to character.

In the evolution of Christian unity love is the resident force. God said, "Be ye therefore perfect." These words call for a career, a program for their fulfillment. No one supposes that man could be instantly perfect even though perfection were commanded of God. The ideal before the infant church was perfect. To clothe this ideal with flesh and blood was the task of all coming time. When creed has become deed, command conscience, and love law, character is on the high road to heaven. Knowledge knows. Wisdom knows how. Faith follows and love serves. This has been the program of the ages. The final solution of a problem is to live it out.

The church could not be one simply because it was commanded to be so. Unity does not come from commands but from service, which is, however, superinduced by wise obedience to such commands. "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." This is a command, but the transfer of mind must come by communion not by command.

For thousands of years this world by searching failed to find out God. Plato "trod upon the skirts of revelation," but passed away without seeing her form and face. "Man's extremity was God's opportunity." Success was born of failure. Experience taught a negative lesson. But the word had to be made flesh. The incarnation did not cease with the earthly life of Jesus. It was to be continuous. Jesus increased in wisdom and in stature and in favor with God and man. The church had to do the same. How long it takes for a great truth to work itself into the brain and heart of the world! The wars and persecutions of the world have been the birth-pangs of new eras. How our nation was tossed and torn with pain to give birth to a race of free men! Wars, laws, letters, science, songs, sermons, prayers and tears, all have been working together, whether in conflict or concord, to give us a world whose law is love, the principle of unity, the tie that binds.

The church was born in an age of imperialism. The world's watchword was Power. Back of the Cæsars were the swords of armies. Before the world could be conformed to the church, the church must, in a sense, be conformed to the world. There was a pope because there was an emperor. The spirit of power crept into the church, which was held together, as was the Roman empire, by power. The church absorbed the framework of the empire and the cross followed the sword to the ends of the earth. When Jesus came the world was mad with conquest. It took more than a thousand years to check the war spirit and enlist man in the good fight of faith.

Luther called a halt and announced to the world that the just shall live by faith. Everyone was to become his own priest and read from the sacred page his own lesson. Men said, let us find the truth. Difference and division were as inevitable here as union had been by the authority of Rome. Men thought and reached different conclusions. They made the monumental blunder of supposing that the grace of God could reach the world only through their thinking. It would be as wise to say that the sunlight must wait for a definition or that water cannot quench thirst unless we understand its chemical properties.

Certain great thoughts were emphasized. Calvinism and God's sovereignty; Methodism and the Holy Spirit; Baptists and freedom of conscience; Congregationalism and independence; Disciples of Christ and the kingship of Jesus, the church restored, Christian unity. These movements contribute to each other. One lays the foundation for the other. Disciples of Christ are possible because of what preceded. We are as much indebted to our religious predecessors as we are for our civil liberties to the soldiers of the sixties and the heroes of Valley Forge. One stream of Christian thought has been flowing down the centuries, ever deepening, ever widening. It is what it is to-day because it was what it was yesterday. The trial of one century is the triumph of the next. Others sowed in tears and we are reaping in joy. The differences are incidental. The points of agreement are fundamental. Who thinks unity can be created? If it does not inhere in the nature of the Christian religion, we may as well break our pens and save our voices. If Christian unity has not always been a possibility it is not now a probability nor will it ever be.

The Christian bodies of the world are meeting and mingling. They are sending their heralds across the sea. Whatever the name or creed, they see that the gospel they preach has the same effect upon all. It charms, redeems, purifies. Their hearts are truer than their heads. The spirit of Christ which is not contained in books nor limited by definitions is outrunning the strides of intellect and whenever and wherever this spirit sees itself beaming from the face of another, there will be no formal agreement to unite, for as the hill-tops give back the glory of the rising sun so love will flow from eye to eye and joy from heart to heart. Names and creeds will fall like winter leaves. If they are kept as relics it will be to show how sadly they are outworn.

Not only so, but other prophets proclaim the same message. Social science points to an age of closer and truer unity. Invention is marching in the same direction. Commerce is weaving the continents into one. The hum and hurry of the city might easily be translated into this sentence: "No man liveth to himself." Sailing ships, roaring mills, waving fields, grazing herds and flying trains speak with wordless voice—we are all one. But beneath the hum of mills, the bustle of business and the tramp, tramp of progress is the steady throb of Christian thought, repeating once and again—"we are all one in Christ Jesus."

The Home Missionary Appeal.

By J. E. Lynn.

The tide of missionary enthusiasm which has during the last few months been gradually rising among our churches should reach high water mark on the first Sunday in May when the offering for the mother of all our missionary societies is to be taken, the home missionary offering. This cause deserves the best we have; the call that the Kansas City Convention made for $100,000 for home missions this year is a very modest one. The first year of the new century should set the mark high. The churches need again and again that the motives which should appeal to our hearts in behalf of this good cause should be restated. It is well that we are hearing constantly of new motives for missions. What appealed yesterday may not appeal to-day. Our wills, like our watches, need constantly to be rewound. Let us at once make clear that the master motive for missions in the American field is love for God, love for Christ's kingdom, love for fallen humanity that need to be redeemed. This is the one all inclusive motive. If we give simply because we want to raise our apportionment or because the treasury is empty or because the one hundred and nine missionaries in the field need support, then our giving will be spasmodic and half hearted, but if we come to really love Christ's cause and to take supreme joy in seeing the borders of his kingdom extended, then our gifts will abound.

We should love to support this work because home missions has been and still is absolutely indispensable to the stability of American institutions. This is a historical fact that few people fully realize. A leading journal commenting recently on the "Diamond Jubilee" of the Congregational Home Missionary Society remarked that "the present stability and integrity of American institutions is due more to home missionary work than to any other single cause. Since the time that the tide of civilization in our country began to flow westward, to the home missionary work of all denominations must be given the credit for averting the twin dangers of barbarism and irreligion."

Again, this cause claims our liberal support because of the magnitude of its program. As a people we are just beginning to understand how great is the field and how vast the problem of missions in our home land—the work of evangelizing the west, the re-emancipation of the south, the convincing of the east, the converting of the great cities of the north; a work that is this year greatly enlarged by the opening of doors in Porto Rico, by the appeals of our German neighbors in the cities, by the cries for help coming from Canada, by the voices from the Pacific slope telling us of ripe harvests without workers to reap them. Three hundred appeals are lying upon the desk at the office of the Home Society unanswered, waiting for the voice of the churches to be spoken in their offerings on the first Sunday in May. This is a golden opportunity. Church of Christ, lift up your voice with strength, lift it up, be not afraid. Speak out with no uncertain sound, let the order to our faithful society be, "Go forward."

Current Literature.

The latest contribution to what may be called the permanent literature of the Disciples of Christ is The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century, a work which has been in preparation for some time and a part of the material of which was run through the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the volume of 1899. It consists of a series of historical sketches dealing with the rise and progress of the religious movement inaugurated by Thomas and Alexander Campbell down to the close of the nineteenth century. The work is in an important sense a companion book to the "Old Faith Restated," issued by this company in 1891, under the same editorship. That work was a restatement of the doctrinal position of the Disciples of Christ, by some of the ablest writers of the brotherhood. The present volume is historical, rather than doctrinal, and yet of necessity it deals with the historical development of the doctrine as well as with the outward growth and development of the movement. This volume, also, is the product of men chosen for the work because of their age, experience and ability, and their special fitness for the particular task assigned them.

The whole volume, covering nine decades of our history, is divided into seven periods which, by coincidence, is the scriptural number for completeness, namely: I. The Introductory Period; II. Period of Organization; III. The Turbulent Period; IV. Transition Period; V. Period of Revival of Home Missions; VI. Period of Foreign Missions; VII. Period of Woman's Work. The closing chapter of the book, Lessons from our Past, by the editor of the volume, is an attempt to embody some of the lessons which are taught in our past history.

The Introductory Period is by Prof. Charles Louis Loos. This scholarly writer deals with such vital subjects as "The Beginning," in which the genesis of the movement is clearly and strongly stated, "Mr. Campbell's Connection with the Baptists," "Mr. Campbell and his Co-laborers," "The Union Principle Applied," "The First National Convention and the Formation of the Missionary Society." It is safe to say that no one living was better fitted to treat this introductory period than Prof. Loos, and, so far as we know, there has never been so satisfactory a statement of the chief events in the forty years covered by the period he treats, as that which is given in this volume.

The Period of Organization, by B. B. Tyler, deals with the First Mission Field and the First Foreign Missionary, and revives the memory of that first romantic chapter in our missionary history. It also deals with education as it existed among us in the decade beginning with 1850. Bro. Tyler has been a diligent student of our history. The Turbulent Period has for its historian W. T. Moore, and covers the years of the Civil War. It was also a period of internal controversy on many questions which are dealt with by one who is familiar with the events of which he writes. The sketch of Alexander Campbell, with which this period closes, is a most valuable portraiture of the great reformer by one who intimately knew him. The Transition Period, as the name indicates, was a very important period in our history, and is very thoughtfully treated by T. W. Grafton, whose historical studies have made him familiar with the events and controversies of that period. The history of Home Missions, by B. L. Smith, of Foreign Missions, by A. McLean, of Woman's Work, by Miss Lois White, now Mrs. McLeod, presents the period of missionary activity and growth down to the close of the century. This is the period of our greatest expansion in numbers, in organization and in practical missionary achievement.

We believe this book has a mission. In a little while the chief contributors to this volume will have passed from the church militant to the church triumphant. It is a matter for congratulation that they have left on record their contributions, based largely on personal knowledge, to the historical development of the chief religious movement of the present century. Whoever peruses this volume thoughtfully will see in it evidences of the guiding hand of Providence shaping its course, directing its development, widening its influence, deepening its religious spirit, and fitting it to occupy an important place and to be a potent factor in the religious progress of the twentieth century. It is of the first importance that the present generation of preachers and workers should have a clear knowledge of the remarkable history portrayed on these pages and of the men who under God have been leaders in this effort to restore the Christianity which Christ taught and exemplified, and to effect the unification of His church. (Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis. 1901. Edited by J. H. Garrison. $2.00.)

Christian Life and Theology; or, The Contribution of Christian Experience to the System of Evangelical Doctrine, is the title of an important new work by Prof. Frank Hugh Foster, of the Pacific Theological Seminary. It is an attempt to unfold the logical implications of those subjective conditions which constitute the essential features of Christian experience, and to show that Christian experience itself has logically an evidential value in establishing the truth of the great evangelical doctrines. It is the author's purpose, so he states, not to deal with the peculiar tenets of any particular denomination, but with the great doctrines which are common to all evangelical bodies. It is noticeable, however, that the doctrines for which he argues are such as would be entirely congenial to the atmosphere of Princeton, where the lectures which constitute the book were first delivered.

The evidential value of Christian experience is not a new idea. Schleiermacher's emphasis upon the subjective side of Christianity and upon the "feeling of dependence" as the essential feature of religion was based upon this principle and developed it to such a degree that the authority of Scripture was minimized. The school of Ritschl, while still emphasizing the subjective, has preserved a more wholesome and reverential view of Scripture by considering the New Testament as an embodiment of the experience of the Christian community in the apostolic age. But Prof. Foster is a follower of neither Schleiermacher nor Ritschl, and his conception of experience as evidencing the truth of the Christian religion has apparently not led in his mind to any reconstruction of the general idea of authority in religion, or of the relation which external authority and internal experience must bear to one another.

The method of treatment can be seen by following a single line of argument. The question, What makes a man a Christian? is answered by saying that "the ultimate fact in the Christian life is the New Birth, which upon its merely human side is the permanent choice of duty." The choice of duty logically involves four things: the supremacy of conscience, the faculty which deals with duty; the conception of moral responsibility; the sense of self-condemnation when there has been any departure from the standard of duty; and, since man is conscious that he has never before followed duty for duty's sake alone, the sense of being a sinner and wholly a sinner. It is obvious that these four logical consequences of the choice of duty can be considered as contributions toward the doctrines of anthropology, the last pointing clearly to total depravity.

The method of treatment is interesting and conspicuous ability is displayed in its application, but the effect which it produces is not without a certain confusion arising from the lack of a synthetic statement of the relation of the subjective and the objective in religious authority. The book embodies some of the principles upon which theological reconstruction must be based, but in the interest of conservative orthodoxy it shuns the thoroughgoing application of these principles. (Fleming H. Revell. $1.50.)

The passages of Scripture which bear upon the personality and work of the Devil are collected and arrayed in a little book called Satan, His Kingdom, and its Overthrow. It may be used conveniently as an index of the texts bearing on the subject. The interpretations are mechanical and literalistic. (Fleming H. Revell Co. 10 cents.)

Persons seeking information on Adventism will find considerable of it, together with much argument both pro and con, in the Debate on First Day Adventism between Albert T. Fitts and G. C. Minor. (A. T. Fitts, Kimberlin Heights. 50 cents.)

Found Out.

A Trained Nurse Discovered Its Effect.

No one is in better position to know the value of food and drink than a trained nurse.

Speaking of coffee, a nurse of Wilkes Barre, Pa., writes: "I used to drink strong coffee myself, and suffered greatly from headaches and indigestion. While on a visit to my brothers I had a good chance to try Postum Cereal Food Coffee, for they drank it altogether in place of ordinary coffee. In two weeks after using Postum I found I was much benefited and finally my headaches disappeared and also the indigestion.

Naturally I have since used Postum among my patients, and have noticed a marked benefit where coffee has been left off and Postum used.

I observe a curious fact about Postum used among mothers. It greatly helps the flow of milk in cases where coffee is inclined to dry it up, and where tea causes nervousness.

I find trouble in getting servants to make Postum properly. They most always serve it before it has been boiled long enough. It should be boiled 15 or 20 minutes and served with cream, when it is certainly a delicious beverage." Mrs. Ella C. Burns, 309 E. South St., Wilkes Barre, Pa.

Our Budget.

—Remember the offering for home missions next Lord's day—"or as soon thereafter as practicable."

—The greatest need of the age—consecrated teachers, prophets and laymen.

—The greatest hindrance to the progress of Christianity—the lives of unworthy professors.

—One whiskey-guzzling, dram-selling church member in a community can do the church more harm than a dozen worthy preachers can undo, unless he be disowned and his acts publicly repudiated.

—St. Louis is getting ready for the World's Fair in earnest. The material and intellectual sides of it will probably surpass any previous exposition. But what of its moral and religious side?

—As will be seen from the St. Louis Notes elsewhere the Evangelical Alliance of this city has taken the initial step towards making preparations for the religious part of the great exhibition.

—In our recent report of the Disciples' Club dinner in Brooklyn, we omitted to state that an excellent address was made by Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, who has been a frequent visitor and speaker at the club. J. M. Philputt reminds us of this oversight and says of Bro. Ainslie "no voice is more welcome among us than his."

—Readers of the "Hour of Prayer" articles may have detected a different author of late. Since the editor began his trip to the south, F. G. Tyrrell has prepared these articles and henceforth his name will appear in connection with them. He has demonstrated his adaptation to that kind of writing, and the arrangement gives the editor a little more time for other departments.

—A pamphlet entitled "Baptism in the Old Testament," comes to us from its author, Rev. Geo. W. Drake, of Lakeside, Mich. Its aim is to establish that the various sprinklings required by the Mosaic law are in reality baptism and that in consequence Christian baptism is properly performed by sprinkling. The argument has the double compound of the irrelevant and the erroneous.

—Stephen J. Corey, who has been acting as pastor of the Second Church of Christ at Rochester, N. Y., for the past two years while pursuing his studies at the Rochester Theological Seminary, has accepted a call to become regular pastor of that church. It is less than four years since the congregation was organized and it has already had to enlarge its house. Its membership has nearly tripled in the last two years.

—A. B. Kellogg, in a recent address before the Single Tax Club at Buffalo, expressed some new ideas about city government. The chief point was that the ward should be more emphasized as the unit government. Each ward should levy its own taxes, pay its expenses and control its own affairs. The taxes paid by people of one ward should not be used to confer benefits on another, and the financial burden of crime—for crime is always expensive—should be borne by those who permit crime and corruption at their doors.

—It is not too early for Christian Endeavorers to begin to think about the convention which will meet in Cincinnati, July 6-10. As the twentieth international convention, it will be something of a jubilee. Hereafter it will be remembered the conventions are to be held bi-annually. We have a larger representation on the program than we have ever had before. Among the Disciples whose names will appear on the program are Geo. Darsie, A. B. Philputt, J. E. Pounds, F. D. Power, J. H. Garrison, J. Z. Tyler, G. L. Wharton and H. L. Willett.

—Zwinglius Moore has been called to remain with the church at Milford, Ill.

—M. Ingalls, who is preaching every other Sunday at Princeton, Kan., announces that the other half of his time is not yet taken.

—We are informed that the Easter offering of the Central Church of St. Louis to the Orphans' Home was $170 instead of $127 as we announced.

—J. C. Coggins, of Decatur, Ill., will preach the baccalaureate sermon, May 19, at the School of the Evangelists at Kimberlin Heights, Tenn.

—H. E. Motter, who is now preaching at Peru, Neb., has accepted a call to Bradshaw. Peru is an important mission point and should be looked after.

—The Foreign Society has received in all $9,000 from the estate of the late Dr. Gerould. This is a permanent fund of which only the interest can be used.

—C. E. Stark, of Champagne, Ill., gave his lecture, "In the Midst," at Donovan, Ill., April 20th. It is spoken of as an able effort, both interesting and instructive.

—H. A. Davis has resigned the pastorate of the Highlands Church at Denver, to become state evangelist for Colorado. He enters upon his new work at once.

—R. W. Blunt, who has been for two years with the congregation at Humphreys, Mo., will close his work there in June and go to the newly organized congregation at Lucerne.

—G. E. Ireland, of Wabash, has been appointed evangelist for the fifth district of Indiana, to which work he will devote part of his time. He solicits correspondence in the interest of this work.

—District conventions will be held in Nebraska as follows: District No. 2, Greenwood, May 5-9. No. 3, Freemont, May 13-15. No. 5, Fairbury, May 21-23. No. 8, Beaver City, June 11-13. No. 6, Waco, the third week in June.

—The School for Pastoral Helpers will close its first year May 14. The closing exercises will be held in Central Church, Cincinnati. The address will be delivered by Prof. H. L. Willett, and the closing sermon will be preached on the Sunday morning preceding by J. A. Lord. Eight young women will finish the course at this time.

—Since the subject of evolution has been brought into discussion somewhat prominently by our last Congress, we remind our readers that Prof. F. M. Bruner wrote a book which is a strong presentation of the case from the anti-evolution standpoint. Those who wish to fortify themselves in this position cannot do better than to obtain this work. Address the Christian Publishing Company.

—We note the appearance of Volume 1, number 1, of the Revival News, a monthly magazine which will meet a long-felt want in devoting its space entirely to evangelistic themes and the reports of evangelistic services. The editor, Mr. W. M. Williams, promises that it shall be thoroughly interdenominational. The magazine is issued from Omaha, Neb., and its subscription price is 50 cents a year.

Dyspepsia

Is difficult digestion, due to a weakened condition of the stomach and its inability to properly churn the food; or to unhealthy condition of the gastric juice, too much or too little acid, too much or too little pepsin.

Hood's Sarsaparilla relieves all the distressing symptoms of dyspepsia because it promotes the muscular action of the stomach and intestines, aids nature in the manufacture of her own digestive secretions, which are far better than any artificial pepsin, unlocks the bowels, stimulates the kidneys and tones up their mucous membranes.

So prompt is its effect in many cases that it seems to have almost a magic touch.

Begin to take it NOW.

Suffered Everything—"I was troubled with dyspepsia, suffered everything but death, could not eat without terrible distress. Since taking Hood's Sarsaparilla I eat heartily and I am well." MRS. EUGENE MURPHY, Danbury, Conn.

Eat Three Times a Day—"Hood's Sarsaparilla has cured me of dyspepsia and I never felt better. Can eat three good meals every day." FRED POEHLER, 437 South Penna St., Indianapolis, Ind.

—Dr. F. E. Clark, of the Endeavor Society, is about to start on a six weeks' tour of the Pacific Coast.

—We regret to learn that Prof. Jabez Hall of Butler Bible College has been unable to meet his classes for several days, and is threatened with pneumonia.

—We are glad to be able to announce that Mrs. H. C. Patterson is rapidly recovering from her recent accident and will be able to be about in a few weeks. Bro. Patterson expresses sincere gratitude to the many who have so kindly remembered him and his wife in their affliction.

—The 8th Biennial Convention of the Young Women's Christian Association was held in Nashville, Tenn., April 18-21. Sixteen states were represented. It was the first time the convention has met in the South. Much interest was aroused by the report of work done during the past two years in the factories in the great cities. There are now local associations in 402 institutions of learning and in 70 cities.

—C. E. Wells, of Prairie City, Iowa, has recently recovered from a somewhat severe attack of the grip.

—The church at Orrick, Mo., is without a pastor. Correspondents may address A. B. Remmey, Fleming, Mo.

—L. H. McCoy, 2753 Caroline St., St. Louis, Mo., is ready to engage with some church needing his services, Missouri preferred.

—Herbert H. Moninger, formerly of Butler Bible College and more recently of Yale University, has accepted a call from the church at Tiffin, O.

—E. S. Stephens and family, including Miss Jessie Asbury, sailed from San Francisco on April 17 on the steamship "China" to return to their missionary work at Akita, Japan.

—The church at Hopkins, Mo., recently held an anniversary, at which time it was found that the congegation had more than doubled during the two years of Lee Ferguson's pastorate.

—The church at Norfolk, Va., of which Albert Buxton is pastor, has recently bought and installed a $1,500 pipe organ. The whole thing, from the initial suggestion to the last payment, was done in less than a week.

—The church at Cameron, Ill., will celebrate its 70th anniversary on April 30. The pastor, O. D. Maple, requests all persons who have at any time been connected with this congregation and especially those who having moved away have left their names on the books, to communicate with him.

—W. H. Boles recently held a two weeks' temperance revival in New London, Mo., under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. Crayton S. Brooks of that town says those temperance lectures contained, "more of the gospel than one usually hears even in a religious revival"

—Two eagerly-awaited volumes have at last appeared and are ready for delivery. These are "The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century," a history of our movement, and "The Spiritual Side of Our Plea," by A. B. Jones. Both books are advertised elsewhere in this —It is wonderful how some decisive action in relation to any enterprise quickens the zeal and liberality of its friends. The action concerning the Missouri Bible College, referred to editorially in this number, has already started new springs of action, and we hope to be able to report before long that some arrangement has been made for a suitable building to house this worthy institution. What better opportunity could one wish to identify his name and influence with a Bible work that will "tell on ages—tell for God"? Such doors of opportunity are not opened every day.

—In the three new books which have come fresh and clean from the hands of the binders during the past week, namely: "The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century," "The Spiritual Side of our Plea" and "The Young Man from Middlefield," the Christian Publishing Co. has made a notable addition to our literature. The first of these is noticed in our department of Literature this week. The others will be noticed in our next issue. They are by A. B. Jones and Mrs. Jessie Brown Pounds. "The Man from Middlefield" is pronounced one of the best stories written by Mrs. Pounds.

—The following note from E. S. Ames, pastor of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, may aid some churches desirous of having an evening's entertaiment of the best kind:

"We had an interesting digression from the usual Wednesday evening meeting last week. It was the reading of Ralph Connor's 'The Sky Pilot,' by Mrs. Lulu Tyler Gates, who is a member here. The story of the young minister's success in winning the rough ranchmen and building a church at "Swan Creek" was made vivid and touching through the rare genius of the reader. Mrs. Gates is rapidly rising in success and reputation, and ought to be heard in many of our churches."

—It is credibly reported that at a recent election in Concord, Neb., the successful ticket was known as "the Carrie Nation ticket," and that all the candidates were required to sign the following pledge:

"We pledge ourselves to use all honorable means to secure the services of Mrs. Carrie Nation as our sole adviser in our official duties, if elected, and to adopt no ordinance or measure of importance relative to the town's government without receiving Mrs. Nation's approval."

We are not surprised to learn that the saloon-keepers are leaving town. The only surprise is that any one would be willing to remain in a town that confesses itself incapable of managing its own business and must secure the services of a woman of another state, even, to advise them what to do.

—That Oklahoma is still holding out against imperialistic tendencies and is full of the spirit of independence and liberty, may be gathered from the following notice which a country postmaster recently sent to the postal department:

"Sur i wish to notify you that on next Wednesday this offic will be shet as i am gone dear hunt. You kin fire me if you see fit, but i'll give you apinter that i'm the only man in the nayborhood that kin rede and rite."—The Advance.

Oklahoma probably has as many college graduates to the square mile as any state. Whoever goes to Oklahoma to find suckers and simpletons will find himself lonesome. This is probably a joke which some humorous postmaster in that territory has played on the postoffice department at Washington. Or else some enemy of Oklahoma's statehood has invented the letter.

In a letter from Dr. D. R. Dungan, president of Christian University, Canton, Mo., replying to one from the editor in which we had expressed the idea that the Lord sometimes puts a man on his back to show him some things he cannot see so well otherwise, he says:

"If I have gotten any new vision by being placed on my back for these weeks, it is a new thought of the sweetness and blessedness of Christian fellowship. Tokens of kindness and kind letters have reached me from all parts of the country. My room has been full of the aroma of roses. But sweeter than all else is the fragrance of brotherly love. So delightful has this become to me that mismatched bones and ruptured ligaments scarcely count."

In spite of "broken bones and ruptured ligaments," he is teaching two classes a day in his own room, and hopes soon to be able to hear four classes daily! It's mighty hard to lay some men on the shelf.

Languor and weakness, due to the depleted condition of the blood, are overcome by Hood's Sarsaparilla, the great vitalizer.

LIFE SAVED BY SWAMP-ROOT.

The Wonderful New Discovery in Medical Science.

SAMPLE BOTTLE SENT FREE BY MAIL.

Swamp-Root, discovered by the eminent kidney and bladder specialist, is wonderfully successful in promptly curing kidney, bladder and uric acid troubles.

Some of the early symptoms of weak kidneys are pain or dull ache in the back, rheumatism, dizziness, headache, nervousness, catarrh of the bladder, gravel or calculi, bloating, sallow complexion, puffy or dark circles under the eyes, suppression of urine, or compelled to pass water often day and night.

The mild and extraordinary effect of the famous new discovery, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. If you need a medicine you should have the best.

Sold by druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes. You may have a sample bottle of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root and a pamphlet that tells all about it, including many of the thousands of letters received from sufferers cured, both sent free by mail. Write Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., and please mention that you read this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

The Call of the West.

The field is the world; but speaking of parts I believe that for us and our plea for the word and the unity that must win the world, America, all America, is the greatest mission field that God has ever made. I have seen the mighty old east with its millions of people, many of them tired of old forms, creeds and spiritless theories, and I have thought, "To-day is the day of salvation." I have seen the mighty young west with its hopes of millions yet to be, and I have exclaimed, "This is the hour of destiny." Our leaven is in the midst of the meal. The day of salvation in the east and the hour of destiny in the west ought to push the leaven out to the borders all around. I came to hold a meeting for the church here. By a unanimous vote on last Lord's day the church asked me to abide with them.

Walla Walla is the central city of the Columbia Valley, the "inland empire" of the northwest. Its mountains, valleys, rolling rivers and great natural resources remind me of the "Empire State," only these are greater. The multitudes are coming. The trains are loaded. New farms are opening and new cities are building. The people are building an empire in this valley.

The kingdom of God ought to be builded at the same time. Our money for home missions should flow like these rivers flow, like the people are flowing. No people ever heard the call of God to duty as clearly as a Christian patriot can hear it in America today.

THE SPIRITUAL SIDE OF OUR PLEA.

By A. B. JONES.

This new volume is a notable contribution to a better understanding of the spiritual significance and value of our Reformatory Movement. It accentuates a side of our plea which has been too much neglected by many. It deals, in a profound manner, characteristic of its author, with such questions as "The Letter and the Spirit," "The Real and the Formal," "Alexander Campbell on Remission of Sins," "The Word and the Spirit," and "Righteousness and Law." The views herein expressed are the result of long and mature deliberation by one of the clearest thinkers and writers in our ranks.

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING CO., - ST. LOUIS, MO.

Correspondence.

In St. Louis.

W. H. Kern, for a term of years pastor of the Fourth Church, is at present residing in the city at 2627 Gamble St., preaching as opportunity offers, and doing evangelistic work. He can be secured again for regular pastoral work.

Jesse H. Berry is supplying our vacant mission pulpits, and giving the same enthusiastic service he gave years ago in some of our strongest churches.

L. B. Coggins, formerly of California, visited Ellendale April 28th.

L. S. Cupp, of Huntsville, Mo., paid a fraternal visit to the metropolis recently. He is held in high esteem by the Huntsville brethren.

W. H. McClain, superintendent of the St. Louis Provident Association and newly elected president of the City Mission Board, is pushing the work at every point. The First Church, of which he is a member, has loaned its pastor, Frank O. Fannon, to the West End Church for a short meeting, greatly to the delight and encouragement of these worthy brethren. O. A. Bartholomew filled the pulpit at the First on Sunday night.

Benj. L. Smith, the promoter of American Missions, delivered a fine address at Mt. Cabanne Church on the morning of the 21st. On account of the illness of Mrs. Smith he had to hurry away without visiting anywhere else. He did us good.

The Christian Church Circle is a social and fraternal organization of St. Louis Disciples, but recently formed. W. Daviess Pittman, the friend and benefactor of the Second Church, is the inspiring genius who has been chiefly instrumental in perfecting it. The first public meeting was held about a month ago at the Central Church, T. P. Haley, of Kansas City, being the guest of honor and orator. His address dealt with plain facts in regard to our work in the cities. A chorus of one hundred voices from all the churches, led by Mr. Pittman, contributed largely to the pleasure of the meeting, and it was voted a most gratifying success. The circle will meet bi-monthly and seek to conserve the unity of the churches and foster brotherly love. Such an organization has a specific function to perform in any city where there are several churches. Under the auspices of the circle a meeting of the official boards of the various churches will be held Thursday, May 9th.

The Y. P. S. C. E. of Mt. Cabanne Church is being re-organized, with the purpose of making it a young people's society in fact. Like many other societies, those who entered it ten years ago have continued with it, and still older persons have been added, until the youngsters seem to have been crowded out. The older members have all withdrawn and will be actively engaged on church committees throwing the Endeavor Society wholly into the hands of the young people. The society of Fountain Park Congregational Church has also been re-organized for the same reason.

Jack Cook, the 14-year old preacher, has been holding forth at Union M. E. Church for several weeks, drawing great crowds. We must wait the proof of his work before passing judgment on it. One gentleman characterizes it as "sheer presumption," and many disapprove of the exploitation of infant precocity. W. R. Newell continues his peculiar work, sans intermission, though the pastors have abandoned him.

The paper at the Evangelical Alliance April 28th was read by Dr. I. S. Hopkins, of Centenary M. E. S. Church, "A Forgotten Philosopher and His Contribution to Christian Apologetics." The "Forgotten" is Chas. Babbidge, professor of mathematics at Cambridge. A special committee of one from each denomination was appointed to consider what representation of religious interests shall be made at the World's Fair: Presbyterian, S. Lindsay; Cumberland Presbyterian, B. P. Fullerton; M. E., S. B. Warner; Congregational, C. H. Patton; Christian, F. G. Tyrrell; Presbyterian South, J. F. Cannon; Baptist, W. W. Boyd; United Presbyterian, Chas. R. Watson; Evangelical Lutheran, M. Rhodes. This committee will meet to organize, Monday, May 6th. A letter to the Alliance from the American Society for Religious Education, proposing an Inter-Church Congress, was referred to them. FRANK G. TYRRELL.

Nebraska Letter.

A. W. Henry has closed his meeting at Dawson. No report of results.

The work at Hastings is in thriving condition. Audiences are growing until they practically fill the house. Several additions have been received lately. H. J. Kirchstein is serving them in his second pastorate.

E. S. Chamberlain preaches half time at Table Rock, and the other half at his home town, Johnson. He has sold out his store business.

Atwood has been appointed district evangelist for No. 1. Will begin work in the early fall. He reports 15 additions at Seward and the meeting closed. He was to spend Lord's day, 14th, at Exeter.

J. E. Wilson reports eight additions at Gordon in his meeting just closed. Bro. B. E. Wilkinson is the regular preacher.

District No. 1 has just closed a very successful convention at Salem. Brethren say it was the best. W. A. Morrison was re-elected corresponding secretary. Bro. M. gives half his time to the church at Salem and half to two churches in Missouri.

Bro. J. B. White has been called for his third year at Wakefield, which speaks well for church and preacher. Two additions to the church recently. They begin again their interrupted meeting, May 22.

Bro. Ireland, of Craig, was elected corresponding secretary of No. 4. They report a very pleasant time at the convention at Tekamah.

W. L. Harris has accepted a call to the pastorate at Valparaiso, and began his work on April 1st.

The Rising City meeting, held by the preacher in charge, Bro. R. M. Harris, assisted by Bro. Harmon, of David City, has closed with seven additions.

Wickham and Givens report stormy weather at Scott's Bluff. They will likely hold a short meeting at Mt. Zion Church near Alliance after the S. B. meeting.

The secretary visited Louisville, where Bro. Emmons has just closed a fine meeting, with 37 additions. The church was duly organized and has rented the little place in which the meeting was held. They are already planning for a building. It is a live little village of eight hundred people.

There is an opportunity for some preacher to do missionary work at South Bend. We have a half interest in a little house there, and I called there on my way to Louisville. Dr. Wm. Kirk has organized a little Bible-school, and will be willing to have preaching if any one will volunteer.

Committee on program has been appointed, and we hope to have it in shape early.

Bradshaw is seeking to get Bro. Motter as preacher.

The church at Peru is discouraged. We ought to build a house there as there are only a few resident members. The school is every year filled with our young people. They can not build of themselves, but we could if we would. W. A. BALDWIN, Sec'y.

Have You Got Rheumatism?

You Can Be Cured; FREE.

A Scientific Discovery Which Will Revolutionize the Treatments of Rheumatism.

It is now possible to be cured of any form of rheumatism without having your stomach turned up-side down or being half choked to death and made to vomit, and every sufferer from rheumatism should welcome this new and marvelous discovery with open arms and give it an honest trial. John A. Smith, Milwaukee, Wis., while apparently hopelessly sick with rheumatism, hit upon a combination of drugs and is generous enough to send it free to every sufferer who writes at once. It is a home treatment and will not keep you from your work.

As you know if you've tried them, every so-called rheumatic remedy on the market to-day, except this genuine cure, will cause you violent stomach pains and vomiting, and some of them are so dangerous they will cause heart trouble. And the worst of it is they never cure. When a person has rheumatism the constitution is so run down that he should be very careful what he puts into his stomach.

It therefore gives me pleasure to present a remedy that will cure every form and variety of rheumatism without one single unpleasant feeling. That remedy is

"GLORIA TONIC."

Before I decided to tell the world about the discovery of "Gloria Tonic," I had it tried on hospital and sanitarium patients with perfect success. But some people never will believe anything until they know it from experience, so the best and quickest way is for you to write me that you want to be cured, and I will send you a trial box of "Gloria Tonic" free of cost. No matter what your form of rheumatism is—acute, chronic, muscular, inflammatory, deformant, sciatic, neuralgic, gout, lumbago, etc., "Gloria Tonic" will surely cure you. Do not mind if other remedies have failed you, nor mind if doctors say you are incurable. Mind no one, but write me to-day sure. "Gloria Tonic" will stop those aches and pains, those inflammations and deformities, and cure you so that life will again be worth living. This offer is not for curiosity seekers, but is made to rheumatics only. To them I will send "Gloria Tonic" free.

Never before has a remedy been so highly endorsed as "Gloria Tonic." Among the eminent people who recommend its properties and say it positively will cure rheumatism is

DR. QUINTERO, of the University of Venezuela, whose endorsement of Gloria Tonic bears the official seal of the United States Consulate.

THE HEALTH DEPARTMENT of London, England, prior to sending it into that country, made a thorough investigation of its ingredients with the result that it is admitted without any restriction; thus it cannot contain poisons or worthless drugs.

A MEDICAL JOURNAL writes: Gloria Tonic possesses all the qualities desired by Dr. Haig t alter the uric acid and thus create a new epoch in the practice of medicine; hence Gloria Tonic should receive recognition from the medical profession and health journals throughout the United States.

If you are a sufferer, send your name to-day, and by return mail you will receive a trial box of "Gloria Tonic," and also the most elaborate book ever gotten up on the subject of Rheumatism, absolutely free. It will tell you all about your case. You get 'Gloria Tonic" and this wonderful book at the same time, both free; so let me hear from you at once, and soon you will be cured. Address, JOHN A. SMITH, 1973 Germania Bldg., Milwaukee, Wis., U. S. A.

No Tone so Sweet. No Work so Lasting. | The Estey is the Choice of the People.

The Kansas Preachers' Institute.

The Preachers' Institute was held at Herington, April 16-18. A goodly number, about fifty or sixty, met in that beautiful little village for study, investigation and free discussion of some important questions. Our church there is small, but it is thriving under the excellent leadership of Imri Zumwalt. All things were ready, both temporally and temperamentally, for a feast of good things.

Prof. H. L. Willett, of Chicago, was the guest and the chief speaker of the convention. He delivered six lectures covering the rise and first century of Christianity. The material furnished in these lectures was abundantly rich and suggestive; progressive in spirit, candid in expression and helpful to all. And they were received with heartiness and enthusiasm.

The first one indicated the conditions of the world at the time of Christ's coming, pointing out the conditions in government, politics, language, all which went to form the "logical time."

The three phases of Christianity—Petrine, Pauline and Johannine—were discussed. It was the view of the speaker that we are coming to stress the latter phase of Christian thought. First, there was the ecclesiastical development which ran to organization, then the doctrinal, wherein Paul was the great factor, now we are turning to John as the truest and the highest interpreter of the true life. But the synthesis of all these, Mr. Willett claims, will be necessary to the full statement of the content of Christian thought. He advanced the idea that Paul had begun to break down at the time of Stephen's stoning and from this time on he was "kicking against the goads." The early training and environment of Paul was very strongly put forth. Time will not permit details of these splendid and most invigorating lectures.

"The Forward Movement" was discussed by the writer, and the lines of advance emphasized were, missionary, educational and the revival. Bro. Priest led in the discussion of this subject. F. W. Emerson, of Topeka, read a paper on the "Preacher in Politics." It was forceful, and while it was sharply criticised it was backed up by good sense and sound principles. Mr. Emerson has figured in a very picturesque way in public affairs in connection with joint-smashing.

W. A. Parker, of Emporia, took up the thesis that the most liberal pulpit is the one which has the most comprehensive view of Christ, and is open therefore to the freest discussion and fullest acceptance of progressive thought. He indicated in this paper the unique freedom of the Disciples. The address was a fit illustration of the theme. It was bravely reviewed by Mr. West, of Wellington.

A striking feature of the institute was an address by Mrs. Clara H. Hazelrigg—herself an evangelist of no mean ability—on The Place and Power of the Evangelist.

Mr. C. M. Sharpe took up the subject of Poetry and Preaching. He urged that the preacher should pay heed to his literary style, that he should study the great poets for beauty of thought and felicity of expression.

Perhaps the most noticeable characteristic of the Kansas preacher is his alertness and eagerness of mind; he has not reached the state of cocksureness, but is hospitable to new truth, and wherein they differed it was done charitably. The whole body of them might be differentiated as an inquiring mind. And right hard working, aggressive, self-sacrificing men are these Kansas preachers too.

Prof. Wallace C. Payne has taken charge of the Bible Chair at Lawrence in connection with the State University at this place. Preparations are being made to begin regular class work in the fall. Things are very promising and hopeful. Many students and professors are expressing themselves as heartily in favor of the work and all realize that it is a much needed work. BAXTER WATERS.

Dogs and Oxen.

A Fable for Evangelists and Elders.

No doubt there is many a dog in the manger who is growling at the ox for fear the ox will eat his bed. The dog is selfish and so is the ox.

The dog wants the straw for a bed, the ox wants it to eat.

The dog would rather the ox would starve than be himself without a bed. The ox would fain eat the bed on which the dog lies, even if it left the poor dog without where to lay his head.

Hence, as to the motive of dog and ox, it is, I think, about a standoff. If the dog were to vacate the manger, and at the same time the ox were to spy better hay or green grass at another point, he would probably at once hie away to better hay or to pastures green.

On the other hand, if the dog should find a better bed it is probable that he would vacate the manger and allow the ox possession of the straw.

I knew a dog whose bed was rather hard, and he tried to induce an ox to do some needed work on his master's farm in hopes that it would result in more straw in his manger. The wise ox however made inquiry as to the amount of hay that he would receive in return for his labor, and finding that there was no hay in the manger, and that the crop which he produced by his labor would probably be used to make a good bed for the dog, he refused to be worked in any such way. He went, however, to a place where there was plenty of hay both for himself and the dog. The result was that he did some good work, was well fed, and left the dog with a better filled manger than at the beginning.

I knew an ox who intimated to a dog that he was anxious to do some work for him, that it was not hay that he wanted, but work. The dog accepted the proposition, and after the work was done the ox showed great anxiety for hay.

I did not blame him for wanting hay. He had earned it and he needed it. But I did blame him for ever intimating that he did not want the hay.

I knew an instance in which an ox wanted work and also hay. He thought there was hay in a certain manger, but the dog in the manger knew that there was no hay there. The dog gave him the facts in the case, and knowing as any sensible dog does that an ox cannot afford to work without hay, he would not invite the ox to that field.

The ox pawed the earth considerably and made quite a noise under the mistaken notion that there was hay there, and that the dog was keeping him away from it.

I have known instances too, in which several good oxen have wanted to work the same field, and the poor dog, having his preference, selected one of the oxen and the others became very belligerent.

Of course dogs have preference for certain oxen, and oxen have preference for certain dogs and mangers. I don't blame either for this, but still it causes a good deal of trouble.

Viewing the question from all sides as best I can, I have decided that dogs and oxen are about equally balanced so far as merit and demerit are concerned.

There are, of course, some selfish dogs and some selfish oxen. But then there are scores of good dogs and good, hard-working oxen.

Let us not muzzle a good ox, nor kick a good dog.

In conclusion I will say that the common saying that "the hit dog howls" does not prove that the right dog was hit. "Remember poor Tray." T. D. SECREST.

Consumption

Is a disease of civilization. When the Indian was a stranger to the white man he had no name in his vocabulary for this dreaded malady.

Without arguing as to the curability of consumption, it may be stated positively that Doctor Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures weak lungs, hemorrhages, bronchitis, deep-seated and stubborn cough, and other diseases which if neglected or unskillfully treated find a fatal termination in consumption. There is no alcohol in the "Discovery," and it is entirely free from opium, cocaine, and all other narcotics.

Persons suffering from chronic disease are invited to consult Dr. Pierce, by letter, free. All correspondence is conducted under the seal of sacred secrecy. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

In a little over thirty years, Dr. Pierce, assisted by his medical staff of nearly a score of physicians, has treated and cured thousands of men and women who had been given up as incurable by local physicians.

"Your medicine is the best I have ever taken," writes Mrs. Jennie Dingman, of Rapid City, Kalkaska Co., Mich. "Last spring I had a bad cough; got so bad I had to be in bed all the time. My husband thought I had consumption. He wanted me to get a doctor, but thought we would try Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and before I had taken one bottle the cough stopped and I have since had no sign of its returning."

Disciples' Divinity House Notes.

The attendance of our young men at the university during the summer quarter promises to be very large. Any one desiring a circular of announcements may have one by addressing the Dean or secretary of the Divinity House.

The Divinity House is in receipt of the entire library of B. B. Tyler. The peculiar value of this gift lies in the great number of books bearing upon the history and work of the Disciples of Christ. Let others follow this generous example. We would especially prize copies of journals that have ceased to be published.

A sister in Kentucky has generously provided for $5,000 toward the endowment fund.

Thos. E. Bondurant, of Illinois, has given $1,000 to the endowment fund.

We believe that many others would follow these worthy examples if they knew more fully the importance of the work for the Disciples and the unparalleled opportunity in connection with the great university.

$100 Reward $100.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

A Word From Upper Troy, N. Y.

Since the writer settled down for permanent work in this part of the city of Troy, a year has rolled around. Then the work was new. On the 18th of March, 1900, our house of worship was dedicated to the work of the gospel; 50 members were on the roll, and about 20 were in the Sunday-school. During the year the Lord has greatly blessed the work. On the 9th of March was closed a successful meeting of four weeks' duration. Evangelist E. O. Irvin, of Williamsville, N. Y., did the preaching for three weeks which resulted in 25 confessions; all of whom, but two, are identified with the work. Counting those who came in during the first week of the meeting and since the meeting closed, the total number of additions is 42, making an increase in our membership during the year of about 71 members. We greatly enjoyed Bro. Irvin's stay among us. He is a very acceptable preacher of the gospel and most agreeable in the home, and during his stay in Troy made many friends. Bro. Irvin's chart on baptism was an effectual means of convincing the most obstinate on that much disputed question, that there must be "water; much water; a going to the water; going down into the water; a being born of water; a burial in water; planted in water; a resurrection; a coming out of the water; having the body washed with water." Sprinkling or pouring requires none of the above, except water, therefore sprinkling or pouring is not baptism. The church succeeded in raising all expenses for the meeting. Bro. E. O. Irvin is a suitable man for the work of an evangelist and the New York Christian Missionary Society could not do anything better than to keep him in this great field.

The work has been quite prosperous in the city. The Jay Street Church of Christ, where Bro. G. B. Townsend labors, is having additions quite frequently. We have a union meeting of all the churches with the Jay St. Church on Thursday the 11th. An invitation has been sent to the churches at Eagle Mills, Poestenkill and Pittstown. Bro. W. F. Cowden will be with us and will address the meeting in the interests of the American Christian Missionary Society. At this same meeting we purpose to discuss the advisability of forming a Disciples' Union, for the purpose of pushing the work of our blessed Lord in this cluster of towns and cities—seven of them, all within a radius of six or seven miles with an aggregate population of nearly, if not altogether, 300,000 souls. The people are friendly toward us when we preach the gospel. The sky is brightening and we can hopefully look forward to a brighter day for the cause we all love.

Ohio Notes.

Buckeye Disciples have loaned S. H. Bartlett to our Hoosier neighbors for a month. He is speaking for the Home Missionary Society in the Indiana churches.

Alva W. Taylor has resigned as pastor of the church at Norwood, Cincinnati. He will spend some time in Europe in study and will pursue the vocation of teaching in the future.

Vernon Stauffer, who graduates at Hiram this year, will take up the work at Richmond Street, Cincinnati, the 1st of May. Bro. S. served the Eastern Avenue Church in Cincinnati for over two years, so is acquainted with the field. He will succeed Justin N. Green who becomes assistant secretary of the Foreign Society.

Victor G. Hostetter is doing a splendid work at Zanesville. He has been there a little over a year. He found 140 members and has added about 35 during his pastorate, and now has about 90 members. The church has had some valuable subtractions the past year. It has been held down for years by a few obstructionists, but they have been dropped

The church at Newark took about $500 cash offering on Easter Sunday, with which they struck a hard blow at their debt. For lack of room the Sunday-school now meets in the forenoon and afternoon. All over 12 years old meet in the morning and those under in the afternoon. Bro. Bates is a specialist in S. S. work and has the second largest school in Licking county. The Newark work demonstrates the fact that Ohio missions pay.

Frank F. Cook has resigned at Mungen and has become a state missionary and taken the church at Marietta. This would seem to be a good fit.

S. V. Williams has raised the white flag at Ashland. Here is another good church. A good place for some good man.

L. G Batman, of Mansfield, will lecture at Franklin Avenue, Columbus, May 3d on "Our New America." Those who have heard Bro. B. in this lecture pronounce it extra good

R. R. Bulgin has been in the capital of Ohio for some days in the interest of Bethany Beach. This is surely a great enterprise and will no doubt become a great Mecca for the Disciples of Christ. It will become a potent missionary center for the great east.

J. T. Bridwell has begun work at McArthur. The religious pulse is beating very rapidly in that city these days. The recent meeting by this scribe stirred up the populace considerably. The M. E. and Presbyterian preachers attempted to settle the minds of the people on some disputed questions after the first meeting, but they will not settle. Bro. Bridwell went into a meeting at once and is baptizing people every night. Miss Perrin has returned to lead the singing. The prospects for the second meeting are better than for the first one.

It is now only three weeks till the state convention at Akron. All things point to a great convention. The place is easy of access, and the four churches of Akron can well care for a large number. The program is a strong one. This has been a good year in Ohio missions. Much has been done. Secretary Bartlett says by a hard pull the ledger will balance. If you have not yet sent an offering for Ohio missions, send it by May 1st. We ought to have at least 500 visitors at this convention.

Alexander Campbell's Theology

By W. E. GARRISON. This book is a scientific statement according to the historical method of the religious and philosophical influences which molded the theological teaching of Mr. Campbell. Here are some extracts from reviews:

J. J. HALEY: "This book marks the beginning of a new epoch in our literature. . . . . I heartily commend it to the perusal of thoughtful men and women."

F. D. POWER: "A distinct and noteworthy contribution to our literature. It is a clear and comprehensive statement of a very important theme."

ERI B. HULBERT: "Readers whose desire it is to understand the theology which Mr. Campbell elaborated will find in this treatise exactly the information they are seeking."

A handsome volume of 302 pages, bound in cloth. Sent postpaid on receipt of price, $1.00.

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE?

A large interrogation, truly! It would be difficult to frame a more fundamental question than this, which has been chosen as the title of the new book by W. J. Russell. No more valuable volume for young people has ever been issued. What is Your Life? is easily worth $10,000 to any young man or woman who will faithfully follow its teaching. The general scope of the book is shown by the titles of some of the chapters: "The Value of Time," "The Body and Good Health," "Character Building," "Good Books and Good Reading," etc. The volume is not only helpful and profitable, but is also interesting and entertaining. Mr. Russell has avoided that didactic, dogmatic, prosy style so usual in works of this class. He has written in a bright, lively vein. His book will be read by young people who would refuse to read the average volume of advice to the young.

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE? By W. J. Russell. Cloth, 316 pages. Price, $1.00.

A Great Tract Offer.

For one dollar we will send, prepaid, thirty-five different tracts and pamphlets! We cannot here take space to give list of titles, but the set includes a large number of our very best pamphlets, on a great variety of topics. This is an exceedingly liberal offer. No preacher, or active Christian worker, can afford to disregard it. Just write a line saying you want thirty-five tracts, enclose a one dollar bill, and mail it us. In this way you get a great deal of first-class reading matter for little money. Many of the tracts in this set are booklets of thirty to forty pages.

Missouri Mission Notes.

The work of Bro. Joseph Gaylor, of Everton, was a splendid success. He went there and found a few disciples who were ready to make an effort to plant the cause at that place. He gathered together a band of 26, two of whom confessed the Savior while he was there. These were organized, with a temporary organization, that will be made permanent if the officers prove themselves worthy. Besides this he raised $450 towards the building of a house, a building committee was appointed and the work was practically begun before he left the place. Thus another church is added to our list and another house will be built. He is now at Linn Creek, county seat of Osage county, and the last word from him was that the house, which is already enclosed, will, under his leadership, be completed. He had been there four days and had already five confessions. The lumber was bought for the completion of the house and paid for and he is at work raising the money to pay for the work. Bro. Gaylor is proving himself to be one of the best evangelists ever employed by the board.

We are very sorry that sickness has overtaken Bro. T. H. Popplewell, whom we had engaged as evangelist for southeast Missouri, and that the illness is of such a character as compels him to vacate the evangelistic field for some time. We regret this exceedingly as we had built very largely on the success that would attend his labors in that field. We believe that he is especially adapted to the conditions existing in that territory. However, we are now in correspondence with some man whom we hope to put in that field at once. Southeast Missouri must have an evangelist.

A few weeks ago Bro. A. A. Beery, of Lebanon, wrote me that he was ready to hold a meeting for the board. I at once opened correspondence with the brethren at Clinton with the result that he is now engaged in a meeting at that place. The condition of the church there is bad. Three years or more ago they unfortunately employed a preacher who was not a good financier. He knew a great many things unknown to the average preacher; he could wade deep into the mysteries of the Bible, was deeply versed in its prophetic lore; its visions were as open books to him, but he lacked the one essential feature of knowing how to run a church without plunging it into debt and the result is that when he left it one year ago or more, it was $1,000 in debt, with interest at eight per cent., payable semi-annually, for which the house was mortgaged, all to pay that preacher's salary. Bro. Lockhart followed him but the good result of his work has been largely lost by the time that has passed since his resignation, in which the church has been pastorless. No wonder the church was in a discouraged condition, almost entirely out of heart concerning the future. Bro. Beery's meeting is now going on. What will be the result, the dear Lord only knows, but the last word from him is full of cheer. Let us all pray that he may be successful indeed.

Bro. J. R. Blunt—blunt only in name—has gone to south Missouri and located with the church at Richland. He belongs to that class of men that is needed in south Missouri. He is pushing, earnest, energetic, consecrated, living only to preach Jesus Christ and him crucified. We are trying to place him with the church at Linn Creek at the close of Bro. Gaylor's meeting. I find myself praying every day for the means to employ a dozen such men as he, and put them into that territory.

A number of church missionary rallies are booked for next month. Marshall the first week. Slater the second, California the third and also Monroe City and the First Church of Kansas City joining in the chorus. We are expecting great results from these rallying forces for the redemption of this world. Conventions also are beginning to make an appearance with the leaves and blossoms. We have the Cass county meeting the first week, also the S. W. Preachers' Institute at Neosho. The following week we have the Christian county convention at Nixa and the Sedalia district convention at Warrensburg. Will those interested in these matters take note of the time and let us have such gatherings as will be for the blessing of the counties and districts in which they are held?

The comparison of the receipts for the first five months of the fiscal year with the receipts for the same period last year is not very inspiring. There has been an increase, but the increase is altogether too small. We have received $108 more for the first five months of this year than the same period last year. We have already made arrangements that will cost us $1,000 more than last year, so you see there is need that every friend of state missions rally to its support. May we not ask, is it not right that we should ask, that every preacher in the state bring this great interest to the attention of his people at the earliest possible moment and in the most effective way? Surely there is no interest that should lie closer to the hearts of the Missouri brotherhood than the salvation of our own people. Shall we not hear from every quarter of the state that the churches are rallying to the assistance of the state board in this endeavor to widen the borders of the kingdom of Christ?

Yours in his name,
T. A. ABBOTT.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

In the matter of Normal work, we are to have the help of one of our very best, giving us lectures Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday morning during the Sedalia Bible-school convention. Name later.

Central, Moberly, is one of the schools that meets its apportionment with the recurring quarter, as do Marshall, Sturgeon and a few others, but you need only look at the records to see the lag-behinds and these are they that make our trouble for us, among the best in Missouri, too, otherwise.

The new house at Jacksonville is a delight, built at much sacrifice to some, and J. H. Copher is now seeking to revive all departments of the work. W. D. Coulter is one of the superintendents that does, while others talk.

At Cairo a school was organized years ago by your secretary and has never ceased its work from that day. The school is growing and Bro. Copher is appreciated.

Our evangelist, John Giddens, was forced into a debate some time ago, but it seems to have been a good thing in the end, for the disciples of another John have sold their house to our brethren, and we now have house and all. At Pleasant Hill, Texas, Bro. Giddens organized a new school.

Beulah, St. Louis, has one of the best home departments in Missouri, and the only one of our brethren in the city, and they report it as doing such splendid work that their wonder is, all the schools do not have them, and so the query comes to you, why not have a home department?

Decision day at Joplin was first-class, 225 being present, with an offering of $18.10 and 18 confessions of Christ. They are building right along, both materially and spiritually, and though the former is trying them, they send word that their $25 pledge will be paid in full, and that's the kind W. F. Turner and J. N. Baker are. Wish we had others of the same metal.

Another one of the firm and reliable schools s Paynesville, where W. O. Walton now ministers, and where J. T. Duval has superintended for 31 years, refusing re-election this last December, so that he is so far banner superintendent for years' service in Missouri, and has always been one of the most regular. Is there an older superintendent in the state than Bro. Duval? Give me name and service.

R. H. Fife, our Platte county superintendent, is to see every school in the county in the interest of exact statistics and co-operation with us, and this is to urge other county superintendents to do as well, promising to meet all your expenses in such an effort. Can I not hear from others immediately, and will ou not begin now soon, giving us the report for Sedalia? H. F. DAVIS.

Commercial Building, St. Louis.

GROWING TOO FAST

Children growing too fast for their strength need more than their ordinary food. Scott's Emulsion of Cod-Liver Oil with Hypophosphites supplies that need. It has the power to nourish and strengthen that does not obtain in their usual food.

All sickly, delicate children, who have no definable disease, are invariably benefited by the use of Scott's Emulsion.

A fifty cent bottle will prove to be the best investment you can make.

Whose Ox?

Sitting in the pulpit beside a distinguished Southern Methodist preacher, just before he arose to make a thrilling address to a crowded house, on "The Paramount Issue" (the destruction of the liquor traffic), he said this to me:

Can you tell me why your churches are always open to the W. C. T. U. women and other temperance agitators, and why is it that nearly every one of your preachers is outspoken in advocacy of the cause of temperance?" I replied: "Yes, I can. We, the Disciples, are not sectional. You Methodists (South) have to train with the Democrats as of old, and the M. E.'s must stand by the Republicans, and you noticed how the general conference in Chicago stultified itself before the world in its efforts to excuse President McKinley in ignoring the first canteen law. We do not belong to the North or South, the East or West."

He conceded, that there was much in what I said about it.

I was glad to see that the ministers of the Christian Church in Kansas City were ready to call attention to the quickness with which Mrs. Nation was arrested for violating the law in obstructing the streets and yet no arrest of the saloon-keepers who were violating the law. Mrs. Nation showed last Lord's day that the saloon-keepers in Kansas City and the officers of the law there are no more law-abiding than the jointists of Kansas.

What Christian man should care for party lash when such outrages are going on daily before his eyes?

In the address already referred to, it was clearly to be seen that this Methodist preacher, who carried the Confederate banner to the last ditch, is a staunch friend of the W. C. T. U.'s even if there are a few more of them in the North than in the South, and loves his country better than any party. May the Lord hasten the day when sectism and sectionalism shall have given place to the love of Christ and to true patriotism.

Evangelistic.

Special dispatch to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

FT. SMITH, ARK., April 28.—Closed last night; 160 additions, 26 yesterday, 18 last service. Greatest meeting ever held in Arkansas.—MARTIN & EASTON A. EDMUNDS.

ARKANSAS.

Hot Springs, April 22.—Two confessions so far and one by letter in the meeting here.—T. N. KINKAID.

CALIFORNIA.

Fortuna, April 18.—Evangelist Glen McWilliams closed a meeting of four weeks with our congregation, April 14, in which we had 65 additions, as follows: Baptisms, 55; letters and satements, 10, of which three were from the Baptists. Nearly the entire associate membership of the Y. P. S. C. E. became Christians and active members. All of some classes in the Sunday-school and some from all the classes above the primaries, confessed Christ. It was the glorious reaping of seed sown by faithful workers in former years. —ABRAHAM B. MARKLE.

COLORADO.

Golden, April 26.—On April 14, I closed one and one-half years of service with the church at Carbondale, Col. During the last two weeks eight were added to the church, three of these by baptism. Preached three evenings for the church at Aspen with two added by baptism. Whole number of additions not reported, 17. At a farewell reception the people of Carbondale gave me several beautiful presents, with many kind words of cheer. I began here on April 21. The church is one of the oldest in the section. The work starts off very encouragingly. Of the seven Sunday-schools of the city ours is the largest.—ROBT. W. MOORE, pastor.

IDAHO.

Genesee, April 19.—About five weeks ago there had never been but two sermons preached by our people in Genesee. We rented a hall at $8.75 per week and began the siege; at the end of two weeks we bought the hall and lot and all the fixtures; at the end of three weeks we had a baptistry in place, and three men and one woman were baptized, one of these a deacon in the Congregational Church. In all 16 have been baptized. We organized a church with 33 members and there are about 10 more who will take membership with us in the near future. We organized a Sunday-school last Sunday with 45. We are rapidly transforming the hall into a beautiful little church building, which we will dedicate the last Sunday in May or the first in June. We will remain here until after dedication and then go to the Washington State Convention and from there to the Oregon State Convention.—L. F. STEPHENS AND WIFE, evangelists.

ILLINOIS.

Barry, April 29.—We have had nine confessions during the past few weeks at regular services. Two yesterday.—F. M. ROGERS.

Bloomington, April 23.—I have accepted the call to work with the Christian Mission at this place and will preach Sunday evenings or the present. Commenced the work last Sunday; three added. Prospects are very encouraging and we hope to remodel the building and organize for genuine active church work in the fall.—JOHN D. AUSTIN.

Cairo, April 22.—On Sunday night I closed my meeting at Cairo, Ill., one of the wickedest towns on earth, with 29 additions to the church. Bro. Clark Braden is the minister there, and the church under his management has been very materially strengthened. My next meeting begins at Wyatt, W. Virginia, a mission point, April 27th, and from there I will go to New Matamoras, O. Churches wanting my services may address me at Lexington, Ky.—JAS. W. ZACHARY.

Fulton, April 26.—To-night closed a 17 days' meeting here with 20 additions. There were four at the regular Sunday services preceding the revival; these with others make 31 conversions and four letters since Bro. R. Tibbs Maxey took charge of this mission church with 60 members last September.—LEWIS P. KOPP.

Heyworth, April 22.—The church at Eldora, Ia., held a meeting of three and a half weeks with 8 additions, 4 by confession and baptism and 2 reclaimed and 2 by statement. An old debt of $175 provided for and salary raised to secure a pastor. The preaching was done by the writer, who will locate with them as pastor.—F. L. DAVIS.

Mattoon, April 25.—Miss Anna M. Hale spent Sunday, April 14, with us. Young ladies' auxiliary organized. Closed second year with church here April 7. Twenty additions not yet reported, making 283 for the two years. Over $8,000 raised for all purposes. A little over $4,000 of this amount was on the heavy debt of the church. The greatest development has been in spiritual things. We are getting ready to launch a mission in another part of the city. Our present quarters are entirely inadequate, and our building will have to be enlarged.—A. A. W., pastor.

INDIANA.

Elwood, Apr. 24.—All pastors and others knowing of members moving to Elwood please report the same to the undersigned. Work moves along flourishingly here. Additions at nearly every service. Sunday-school and various C. E. societies growing in numbers and interest.—L. C. HOWE, pastor.

Knox, April 19.—I have been here three nights in my second meeting; large audiences and three confessions. I go next to Sigourney, Iowa, and then back to Missouri.—H. C. PATTERSON.

Salem.—W. T. Brooks, of Ladoga, Ind., recently closed a meeting here with 81 additions; 48 confessions, 23 by letter, six from the Methodists, two from Baptists, one from Presbyterians, one reclaimed. We had eight additions the last day. The converts included a large number of our most prominent citizens and the town was stirred as never before.—W. H. ALFORD, minister.

IOWA.

Council Bluffs, Apr. 22.—One addition yesterday. We have just organized an auxiliary to the C. W. B. M. with 28 charter members. On April 25 we had a union missionary rally of our churches and auxiliaries in the Twin Cities. Let us have another general rally at Creston, May 6-9. Let every church rally $1.00 for district expenses and rally a good delegation to attend this convention.—W. B. CREWDSON, president southwest district.

Des Moines, Apr. 23.—We are in a great meeting with Bro. Scoville doing the preaching; 115 accessions to date; 81 in the last eight days. Bro. S. has been with us about a week.—E. W. BRICKERT, pastor East Side Church of Christ.

Des Moines, April 25.—East Side Church. We have been in this meeting (the third in Des Moines) only nine days and have had 100 added. The Central Church assisted us on Monday and the University on Tuesday night, coming on street cars with streamers flying at the sides of the cars and songs from consecrated voices from within. I have worked with this same pastor, E. W. Brickert, once before, at Washington, Ind., where with that good church we had 111 added in ten days. We lack but 14 of having reached 1,000 in this city with these three churches. There were 20 added last night and 27 Sunday. —CHAS. REIGN SCOVILLE.

Keota, Apr. 22.—One confession last evening. This makes 21 added here since our second year began with this church, Oct. 1, 1900. Two were statements and 19 baptisms. Also 12 added at Kinross not previously reported; seven baptisms, two statements; one from M. E. Church, one from Baptists and one from United Brethren.—GEO. C. RITCHEY.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

KANSAS.

Yates Center, April 22.—Nineteen additions in eight days.—R. A. THOMPSON.

Horton, April 22.—Two added yesterday by letter at morning service. One by statement two weeks ago not reported.—L. H. BARNUM.

MICHIGAN.

Owosso, April 22.—Two accessions yesterday and one Lord's day previous. Our two years' work will close with rally and supper. Church prospers.—S. A. STRAWN, pastor.

MISSOURI.

Bethany, April 26.—April 14 I immersed two at the East Side Church, Moberly, the prospect is that the East Side Church may do a good work. We have about 175 members, quite a number of young people.—W. H. HOOK.

Columbia, April 29.—Raised $16 at Millersburg yesterday for missions. Will divide this among the state work, the Bible-school work, A. C. M. S. and F. C. M. S. Amount raised last year $1.55. We have a flourishing Bible-school with 70 enrolled.—J. G. CREASON.

Elsberry.—One reclaimed at the Saturday night service. Two were baptized Monday morning. Our pastor, W. W. Rumsey, of Keokuk, Ia., begins a meeting with Bro. E. J. Lampton, May 4, at the Linn Knoll church.—PAUL H. GIBSON, Ass't. S. S. Supt.

Louisiana, April 29.—Since coming here in January we have had 18 accessions, five by letter, five by confession, eight otherwise. Bro. E. J. Lampton was with us Sunday and at night preached and took the confession of his little granddaughter. We are to have a rally and roll-call the third Sunday of next month. Bro. J. P. Myers, at Clarksville, is in a meeting not a week old and about 30 accessions reported. Prof. Wilson is helping. —F. A. MAYHALL.

Moundville, April 26.—Just closed a ten days' meeting here. Church board reorganized, 14 additions and money raised for preacher one-fourth time.—R. B. HAVENER.

Mountain View, April 23.—Our two weeks' meeting at Brown Hill, Texas county, Mo., closed with 36 additions, with the church wonderfully revived and public sentiment turned our way. South Missouri is a great mission field, but the laborers are few.—T. J. HEAD.

New Franklin.—There were 23 additions in the Fayette meeting.—ARTHUR N. LINDSEY.

New London.—One of the most fruitful temperance meetings ever held in New London was that recently conducted by W. H. Boles, of Alma, Ill. As an enemy to unrighteousness Bro. Boles is the most fearless and uncompromising we ever heard. He is a "hard hitter" and spares no one who needs attention. He is as true to the gospel as the needle is to the pole. The immediate and visible results of the meeting are quite satisfactory. Bro. Boles is a man of great ability and ought to be kept busy all the time in the gospel temperance work. — CRAYTON S. BROOKS.

Salem, April 23.—We have been here 12 days. Good audiences. The outlook is promising. Bro. G. B. Williamson is with me.—BEN. F. HILL.

Troy, Apr. 25.—Dr. W. T. Moore gave us a brief series of lectures from Sunday to Wednesday inclusive and was greeted by crowded congregations. His lectures were masterly deliverances and provoked universally favorable comment. So much so that his return in the fall is already anticipated. On Sunday, the 21st, we had the roll of the church called, at which the pastor was unanimously called without any limitation of time.—G. F. ASSITER.

NEBRASKA.

Danbury, Apr. 25.—Closed 10 days' meeting at Lenora, Kan. Eight additions last day. Go to Courtland, Kan., next.—W. R. BURBRIDGE.

Fairfield, April 26.—We were presented a "baptismal suit" by the church here on the 19th inst., and will labor to make much use of the gift. V. E. Shirley, of Nelson, was called to the bedside of his mother in Pawnee City, Okla., on the 24th. Elder C. W. Henny conducted the obsequies of Sister Mary E. Nixon here on the 21st. She died as a faithful mother in the church, 61 years old. Eighty people assembled here during the convention of Dist. No. 7, April 22–24. Three hundred and sixty additions were reported added to the church during the past six months.—L. Aa. HUSSONG.

Tekamah, April 25.—We had 15 added at Seward and left Bro. Beem in charge to continue a few days while we begin here. Bro. Reed is pastor. Meeting one week old and seven confessions to date here. We are arranging for dedication. Crowded houses. A. G. Smith is pastor.—ATWOOD AND WIFE, evangelists.

Ulysses.—Five additions recently at Shubert, where John T. Smith ministers half time. Twenty-one added to the church at Grand Island under Bro. Doward. G. M. Reed had 2 additions at Cordova April 14. He can be had for a regular pastorate soon. His address is Seward, Neb.—W. A. BALDWIN.

OHIO.

anseon, April 10.—My work here has been fairly prosperous. There have been about 20 added to the church since I came. Our Sunday-school is growing; the audiences are growing also. We have one of the best Christian Endeavor Societies I have ever known. I have been called and accepted the work for another year.—GEO. E. DEW.

TENNESSEE.

Pulaski, April 22.—We have just closed a two weeks' meeting here with 12 added. Meeting was conducted by home forces.—W. P. CROUCH, pastor.

TEXAS.

Cleveland, April 22.—We came here to spend the winter. We gathered together a few of our scattered brethren and organized a S. S. in the schoolhouse with six present; the attendance increased and we now have about fifty. Easter Sunday we organized ourselves into a church with 10 names, but we know of several more who will come in. A subscription paper was circulated; one of our members donated a lot, others labor and material, others money, and we are now in a fair way to have a church building of our own. Bro. Leak, our state evangelist, and Bro. Webb are to be here this week to hold a meeting.—MR. AND MRS. F. DARST.

UTAH.

Salt Lake City, April 22.—One added by letter here yesterday.—W. H. BAGBY.

WASHINGTON.

Pullman, April 20.—Just closed a 10 days' meeting at Chester with six confessions and organized with 15 members. The meetings I held for Bro. H. P. Peck at St. John and Thornton resulted in seven added. My meeting at Spangle the last of February and first of March was one of the best meetings for the cause of Christ that I have held on the coast, yet there were no additions. I return there first of June for a four weeks' meeting.—L. C. HAULMAN.

Truth Divine.

By William Morgan Cochran.

O Truth Divine, thrice welcome to our house,
Where much of care and much of pain has been,
And teach us how to trust in God's unseen.
Wake us from fear and doubt's benumbing drowse,
And tell us how to keep all holy vows,—
The vows that brew the soul God's holy balm,
And bring life's storm-vexed tides His holy calm.
Oh, let us feel His finger touch our brows,
And hear Him say: I am in Truth revealed.
In earth, in sky, and in the spirit clime;
In suns, in stars, and in the nebulous dust;
In sword, in spear, and in the burnished shield,
And in God's wondrous grace and love divine,
Truth reigns, and worlds and systems wait and trust.

Journalism as a Profession.

George Ade writes in the Saturday Evening Post some things which will be of interest to the young man who contemplates journalism as a profession. Mr. Ade is a journalist himself and thinks well of it as a calling. The newspaper business is not only good in itself, he says, but better still as leading up to many other things which promise more ample rewards and demand less arduous toil in middle life and old age. So, unless the young man has a tremendous vitality and a love for the work not lessened by years of hard endeavor, he will do well to make his newspaper career a mere preparation for another career. Time and chance very often will determine what this afterwork is to be. There is much to be said: The young man will not rust or retrograde while he is in active newspaper work, as he might if he were put into a sleepy, overheated office or crowded into a subordinate place in some commercial establishment. To be sure, there is the danger that he will fall in with a convivial crowd and stay up late, trying to be a "Bohemian," but this danger is minimized now that the editors discourage drinking.

Sometimes one is tempted to believe that an experimental season of journalism will lead any man to his predestined occupation. Newspaper work starts him in many different directions. He follows the most promising path and does not quarrel with fate. Once there was a young man who came into a newspaper office with a hidden determination to be another Chas. A. Dana, and today he is the successful manager of a comic opera company. Another thought he was to be a professional funny man. He is now a grave police magistrate. Another who hoped to fit himself to do ponderous editorials is now writing frivolous matter depending for its charm on the use of parlor slang. A youth to fortune and to fame unknown had desired to be the book reviewer of the century. He started in to do the preliminary "rustling," showed a quick grasp of financial reporting, and to-day is a stockbroker. And a great many, too many, in fact, get into politics. Yet who knows? They may take with them an antiseptic and clarifying influence.

In conclusion it might be said to the college man who is drawn toward newspaper work: If you feel a genuine craving for the fascinating toil, go into it—only when you have become a successful reporter and more or less deference is paid to you, and when over-enthusiastic friends try to spoil you by saying that you are a "genius," do not sit down and be content with the thought that you have arrived, for you have not. You are simply on your way. Keep cool, and discount flattery, and remember that nothing is more dead and cold than a yesterday's newspaper. Along in the thirties, if some one comes along and tries to steal you away from the newspaper office, don't resist.

A Minister's Bet.

Congressman Champ Clark, of Missouri, tells the following story of our venerable Brother Charles Louis Loos, in his book of "Cloak-Room Stories:"

Some savant once said, "Habit is stronger than nature," and there is a modicum of truth in his dictum.

Dr. Samuel Johnson, the great lexicographer, is said to have gone to see one widow for 20 years. A friend asked him, "Doctor, why don't you marry that woman and be through with it?" The gruff old Ursa Major replied, "My dear sir, if I married her, where would I go to spend my evenings?"

One of the most learned men I ever knew is Charles Louis Loos, at whose feet I sat when a boy at Bethany College to learn wisdom as Paul sat at the feet of Gamaliel. When attending college, he had a comfirmed habit of saying, "I'll bet you a dollar!" by way of emphasizing his propositions. He is an intensely earnest man. Among the first sermons he preached was one delivered at Wellsburg, W. Va. In the midst of his sermon he astonished his audience immensely, amused some and shocked others by laying down some proposition with great force and then, to emphasize it, leaned over the pulpit and exclaimed: "It is true! It is true! I will bet you a dollar it is true!" which cured him of using that particular phrase.

In a Japanese Railway-car.

The second- and third-class railroad-carriages in Japan give the foreigner a very favorable opportunity to study the life of the people. The glass windows are striped with white lines. The reason for this is that some of the persons who travel in the cars are unused to glass, which perhaps they have never seen before. They are therefore inclined to put their heads through if there is nothing to indicate that something bars the way.

In cold weather, says the New York Sun, all Japanese travellers carry rugs, for the cars are heated merely by long steel cylinders filled with hot water and laid on the floor. Spreading his rug out on the seat,—a Japanese never sits on anything not perfectly clean,—the passenger shakes off his geta, or wooden clogs, and curls his feet beneath him.

The next move is a smoke, in which both men and women indulge. A tiny pipe is commonly used, which never contains more than a wisp of tobacco the size of a pea, and affords not more than one or two puffs to the smoker. The ashes are then knocked out on the floor and another wisp stuffed in and lighted from the smoldering ashes just rejected.

At every station there are venders of the little mandarin organges. Every passenger buys a dozen or more, and eats them in a short time, throwing the skins about the floor. Boys pass by with tea in tiny earthen pots, a cup placed over the top. The price is three sen (a cent and a half). The teapot is left in the car.

The Japanese throw all sorts of refuse about, and the car soon presents a very untidy appearance, or would do so if it were not for the porters, who come in at odd stations and clean up.—Youth's Companion.

A Helpful Hint.

A careless laundress can ruin the daintiest of woolen garments—and since our dear little babes and delicate children have to wear them all often, it is the duty of every young mother to try to learn the best methods of laundering them so that they will not irritate the babes' little tender flesh, and make them fretful and eventually sick and feverish. Their flannels are usually of the softest and finest, and should be kept in the best possible condition; besides they are very expensive if we have to replace hem. Yet I have seen them so drawn up and shrunken in one washing that they had to be thrown aside.

There is an excellent method which has been used for years, and it is a great saving of money to have flannels properly washed and I wish to give the recipe here for the benefit of the young mothers—for I have known their dear babes' flannels to become a serious subject in a financial way—the mothers having to lay aside all the pretty soft flannels on account of the laundress having ruined them in the first washing, shrinking them and hardening them so.

First, you must use water that is as hot as you can bear your hands in, and flannels must never be washed on a board, and soap must never be put directly upon them; make a good cleansing suds of warm rain water and pearline; wash the flannels through two warm suds, rubbing them up and down with your hands until they look clean. A little borax is good to put in the water to soften it. Then rinse through two warm waters, clear, and of the same temperature as the first; then pass through the wringer. Before hanging out stretch and pull the garments into shape. If this is not done the tiny fibers interlace and cause them to become hard. Hang them out on a line in the sunshine. S. J. H.

Kitchen Expenses.

Reduced By Ready Cooked Grape-Nuts.

"Modern food saves gas bills (cooking), labor and doctor's bills, and the food I refer to is Grape-Nuts," says a Chicago woman.

"We have used Grape-Nuts over a year. I weighed, when I began using it, about 100 pounds, but have gained 22 pounds since. I have recovered entirely from dyspepsia since using this delicious food. My husband and children enjoy Grape-Nuts as much as I do, and they have all been decidedly benefited by its use.

My baby is very much healthier than my other two children were at his age. I attribute the difference to the use I have made of Grape-Nuts Food.

Of course it is a great advantage to have a food that is already cooked and sure to be in good condition. This is not always true of many cereals." Mrs. Geo. S. Foster, 1025 Wabansia Ave., Chicago, Ill.

How They Broke Up.

An amusing story is related in Canadian Savage Folk, of the manner in which an adjournment was taken by a mass-meeting. A missionary who had started a school among the Indians met with opposition, and the meeting had been called in support of the rival scheme.

There were several speakers who denounced the school in existence. We replied vigorously, showing the efficiency of the school, and denouncing in turn the methods adopted by the opposition. An Indian chief produced some specimens of work done at the school, and several speakers supported the work as it was being done. The climax was reached when a gentleman arose and said:

"I move the whole thing bust!"

The chairman put the motion:

"It is moved and seconded that the whole thing bust!"

The audience sprang to their feet, and waving hats, yelled, "Busted!" and made for the door. Thus ended the first and last opposition in that matter.—Youth's Companion.

The Belgian Hare.

By Mrs. Z. T. Spencer.

Although the Belgian hare has been advertised and written up by many people all over the United States for the past two years, yet there are very few people who have ever seen one, and still fewer who have ever tasted one properly cooked. Yet it is a fact that if people knew the value of the hare as a meat producing animal few homes would be without a small pen to raise the meat for home use. We believe we are competent to judge somewhat of this, and we unhesitatingly assert that there is no meat known to American cooks that equals a young Belgian hare properly roasted. It far surpassess chicken; tastes something like squirrel, but the meat is white and very tender. Then we have cooked an old hare; the oldest we ever had, and were surprised at the tenderness and delicious flavor. A pen of hares can be kept in a back yard too small to raise chickens. Two does and a buck would be a good start for meat purposes; $9 should buy a nice trio. There is nothing that will afford to youth or age so much real pleasure and profit as a pen of Belgians. A corner in the shed, carriage house or hen house, partitioned off so as to let each breeding doe have two and one-half feet square under a roof with a hole to give them access to a small yard, even two by ten feet, for exercise, will be ample to raise all needed for home use. If this is not convenient, a goods box two by three feet, with wire or slat door for each breeder. The same box will hold a dozen youngsters after they are weaned at six weeks old. The cost of raising hares is no more than chickens, and the pleasure and profit much more. The fur is very valuable, the skin being as strong as mink. The black Belgian skins are the most valuable, being shiny black.

The work of raising Belgian hares is the one work to which women and children are especially fitted.—Illustrated Youth and Old Age.

Extending the Telephone.

A curious feature of Professor Pupin's telegraph and telephone invention, (that of reinforcing a cable, however long it may be, by coils of wire wound around it, which take up and repeat the current so that it loses none of its propelling power), is that, contrary to every other form of electrical transmission, the electric waves are delayed. In all other cases, they are known to be practically instantaneous, but in this case there is a considerable hiatus. For example, in talking over a telephone between New York and San Francisco, there would be a considerable period of time—several seconds at least—before words uttered at one end of the line could be heard at the other end. But the method is, nevertheless, an undoubted success, and it is stated that a land line connecting the two extremes of the American continent, built on this principle, will work just as well and just as distinctly as do those which are now but a few miles in extent. Whether or not the system will become of immediate practical utility for transoceanic purposes, is doubtful. New York and London are, for instance, nearly five hours apart in time, so that business hours of each place do not properly overlap. It is more than likely, also, that the tolls over such a cable would necessarily be almost prohibitory in amount; but for long land lines the scheme is intensely practical.—Ledger Monthly.

The Most Unpleasant Person in the World.

In a book owned by the Queen of Greece are written the opinions and ideas on various subjects of nearly every crowned head in Europe, and also the opinions of the different members of the royal families. One of the questions asked in this book is: "Whom do you consider to be the most unpleasant person in the world to come across?" The King of Greece has written: "The most objectionable being in the whole world is, in my opinion, the man who will shake hands with you and say: 'Bless me! How very aged you are getting!'" The Duke of York has answered the question thus: "There is no more unpleasant man in the world than the one who will lend you a 'fiver,' and then expect to be paid back."

The Duke of Cambridge, who possesses a very considerable wit, has written: "The most disagreeable and unpleasant being to come across is the one who will suck peppermints and eat oranges at a public entertainment." The Princess of Wales has written as follows: "There are so many good and pleasant people in the world to speak and write about that it is unnecessary to speak or write about the unpleasant ones." The Duchess of York has answered: "I think by far the most unpleasant person is the one who points at you and cries out, 'There she is!'"

The Duke of Connaught says: "There are two kinds of unpleasant people in the world; those who are always inviting themselves to dinner; those who never think about inviting you to dinner."

Prince Adolphus of Teck, now the Duke of Teck, says; "Perhaps the most objectionable of all men is the one who will persist in wearing a frock coat with a little round hat; the next most offensive to me is the man who calls you 'old fellow' when he has only known you a few days." The Princess Christian writes; "The most objectionable woman in the world to me is the one who finds every one in the world but herself objectionable, and who, while 'pick-idg holes' in her 'dear friend,' calls her 'that poor woman'!"—Ledger Monthly.

The Parson's Choice.

The colored preacher in a Southern community is, in his limited jurisdiction, something more absolute than the Czar of Russia. To his flock he is not only a guide, philosopher and friend in all matters spiritual, but also in those important little secular affairs involving the disposition of his vote to the best advantage of his country and himself.

A heated campaign was in progress down in North Carolina, where, the negroes being exceedingly numerous, the only question between the two Democratic candidates was which one could control the colored vote.

In that country lived Parson Ephraim Marshall, a man equally renowned for his political wisdom and his elocution, which was entirely equal to a five-hour sermon, audible a mile away. In this campaign he had been seen—and gone one better—frequently by the opposing candidates for prosecuting attorney. Still, like the wise man that he was, he gave no indication of his choice. Every one realized that his indorsement was equivalent to an election, and when he finally gave notice that he would address his people on the night before election on the issues of the day, interest was intense.

When I arrived at the church the audience was already large and noisy; but suddenly the hush of the grave fell upon it. Looking up, I saw Parson Ephraim mounting into the pulpit. He was a rugged old fellow with gray hair, and a bald swath across the top of his head. He wore a long linen duster, and a collar so enormously high that the tops of his ears were just visible over it. Adjusting on the Bible-stand the battered old silk hat which he always wore rakishly on the side of his head, and biting off a huge chew of tobacco he thus addressed his audience:

"In 'suance on a call that I made ter 'dress mah flock an' feller-citizens on de perlitikel issuances ob de day, I is afore yo'. Now, brudders, Ise sorry ter say dat de perlitikel issuances up fur discustication hez done dwindled down toe Square Wallace an' Square Harper, an' I wants ter say right now you doan know what a tho'n in de flaish dem two white men's bin toe me. I disrespecto ter do my juty by dem, an' I 'poses dey shell do dar juty by me. Consequentimentally, dey hex come afore me—one at de time—an' when dey went away I rasseled wid de Lawd toe see whar I auter fall. At one time de Lawd he look like he done gwine ter throw me on de side of Square Harper, an' den Square Wallace he cum erlong an' knock de props squar out frum under me, an' den de Lawd he seem ter projecticate me into his vercinity. Sich a stribin' ob de sperrit Ise nebber expectorated afore. Howsunebber, Ise done s'arched de Scripturs, an' in de parable of de tablets Ise foun' de dissolution. De Lawd he nebber disrespected much ob de gentleman what got only one. All he axed him toe do wuz jist not ter plant it like he wuz droppin' co'n, but de man what got de ten ain't let off in no sich way. It do seem toe me dat in dis lessum de line of my axtivities am demarkased. Square Harper cain't shore dispect much fur his tablet, but wid Square Wallace it am different. He done tuck his ten tablets an' traded wid dem. I shore do like a public-sperrited man, an' Ise jist gwine ter vote fur him shore's yo' bo'n. But 'sides dis, brudders, dar's a cogious reasin why yo' auter vote fur Square Wallace. I done hurd Jedge Johnsing say dat Square Wallace cain't cornvict nobody ef he wants toe, an' yo' shore auter b'ar dat pint in mind when yo' 'members de partiality de cote hez fur tryin' ter trace de white folkses' hawgs toe de habitation of sum member of dis congregation."

Here an egg came hurling through the air and struck Parson Ephriam squarely between the eyes. Wiping it off with the tail of his coat and adjusting his glasses he said:

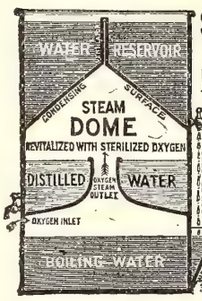
"Ise a man ob peace, brudders. I allus hez bin sense I done quit drinkin' toe much conlicker an' gwine ter dem deblish frolicks dat you fool niggers run arter. When I guv up de wurld, de flaish an' de devil I sed ter de Lawd dat Ise gwine ter forguv mah enemies, an' dat I'd nebber say nuthin' agin 'em what I couldn't say in mah pra'rs. I forgives that unknown inimy what throw'd dat aig, an' now let's pray. 'Oh, good Lawd, I cum hyar dis nite ter shed de light of my onderstandin' on de dark places of dese fool niggers' benited minds. In dy unscrewtible dispersion dow has also sint wid a pocket full ef stolen aigs dat triflin', good-fur-nuthin', lyn', thievin' nigger, Jim Jones. Oh, Lawd, I prays foh dat nigger! Joner in de whale's belly an' de Hebrew chilluns in de fiery furnace ain't nowhar ter whar he's gwine ter be ef I ketch him when dis meetin' am out. Oh, Lawd, may ebery one heah have de grace toe vote fur Sqare Wallace to-morrow; an' I axes de, oh, Lawd, ez a special dispensation, dat de kinky-heded Ferlistin', Jim Jones, doan 'scape me dis nite, fur I wants him as a warnin' an' a zample dat de anited hed of dis heah congregation ain't no scramlin'-pan foh no nigger's stolen aigs.'"

But before the prayer was ended the Philistine Jim Jones was in full retreat, and the next day he hired out for a year on a distant plantation.—Woman's Home Companion.

Not Guilty.

The following story makes one think of the old proverb about a "guilty conscience" and "no accuser:"

"Now, boys," said the patient Sunday-school teacher, "surely some one of you can tell me who carried off the gates of Gaza. Speak up, William."



"I never touched 'em!" said the indignant William, with a suspicion of tears in his youthful voice. "I don't see why folks always think when things get carried off that I've had something to do with it!"—Youth's Companion.

WONDERS OF THE SKY
There is probably no department of knowledge concerning which the average man or woman knows so little as astronomy. In this volume the author, W. J. Russell, imparts to the reader a great deal of elementary instruction in this science. This he does, not in the dry, didactic style of the text-book, but in a delightful manner, that makes his book as interesting as a work of fiction. The book is beautifully bound in cloth, silver and gilt. Price, 50 cents.

PETE.

"How do you play it?" asked Chalky. "I hate to learn new games." "You listen at me and I'll tell you," said Linda May, "and you boys quit a-fighting. Somebody's blindfolded, and while she is saying 'Silence in the courtyard after twelve o'clock, Silence in the courtyard after twelve o'clock,' the others hunt up places they want to stand in. But the second she says 'HUH!' real short and loud, nobody can take a single step. Then she says how many steps you can take when she is after you, like Three or Four, and she comes feeling after you. When she is purty near on you, you can take as many steps as she said, real easy, so she won't know which way you slipped; and when she does touch you, she has to feel you and guess who you are." "That's like Still Pond," said Chalky. "All right; who'll break up?" "You can blindfold me," said Madge. So they blindfolded her real good, so she couldn't see a thing. Then she chanted her lines and cried "HUH!" and told them they could take three steps. Of course she didn't know which way to go, but she started out, groping. Pretty soon she heard somebody stepping softly, so she knew she was near a player. She followed the sound. At last she said, "You've taken more than three steps!" No answer. Madge followed. The person began to run. Madge ran after him and caught him by the arm. Then the boy stood still. "I know you must have taken twenty steps," she said, feeling his hair. "I don't know who you are but you're caught anyway, because you cheated." "I'd think you could feel his hair burn you," spoke up a voice. "Then it's Jim Pimlins," cried Madge. (You see, Jim's hair was auburn.) "That ain't fair," said the prisoner breaking away. "'Tain't fair to tell on me. And I didn't take more than three steps, either, only I broke them up into small pieces." "Well," said Madge, "I'll be, once more. But if anybody breaks up into small pieces again, they can just piece this handkerchief over their eyes. And you can take five steps, so you won't have any temptation." She started forth with her arms outstretched. Arthur Pendleton was standing by a rose-bush, when he saw her coming straight toward him. When she was about to touch him, he stepped over the rosebush. Madge ran into it. "Oh!" she said. She circled around the rosebush, and Arthur stepped over it to his original position. Madge heard him and ran around so quick he couldn't step back. So he went to one side, taking such a gigantic stride that she missed him. She thought he had gone another direction, and he took one more step to be safe. He stepped on a twig and it broke. She came after him. He took one more step, and that made five. She was close to him now. He crouched down, and then lay flat on the grass and hugged the earth. She felt over him while the children giggled. Then she heard him breathe, and sank on her knees and grabbed his foot. He lay still, according to the law. She travelled up to his arms, felt his necktie, put both her hands over his face, examined his ears, then took off his hat and felt it all over. Then she jumped up and threw the hat on the ground, saying in great contempt, "It's him!" "You've got to say who!" cried Chalky. "It's that boy I have to eat supper by," said Madge evasively. "Name him! Name him!" "It's that Arthur Pendleton," said Madge taking off her bandage. At last they had supper. Arthur and Madge sat side by side, each pretending not to see the other. It was a long table and they had chairs. There was ice cream and lemon ice and bananas, oranges, and real high priced candy; and nuts of all kinds except peanuts. And five kinds of cake. And marshmallows. And chocolate to drink. And cocoanut, cut up into little squares, each square lying in a little bed made out of the hairy rind. Among the less important things were turkey, potato chips, celery, and other varieties of just plain eating. I call that a sure-enough party supper. They were ready for it, too, for Linda May had warned the girls not to eat much before they came and as for the boys—they are always ready.

Now Arthur kept looking slyly at Madge, and wishing to "make up," but he did not know how to go about it. At last he slipped her orange, thinking she would soften at this delicate attention. But she merely took another from the fruitstand. "Oh, say," he remonstrated. "Madge! What's the use to get ma-a-ad?" No answer. "I would get mad, fi was you!" he ventured. This had no effect. "Ev'rybody else at table's laughing and chattering and having good time 'cept youn me," he observed. "Just youn me! Just meen Madge, we don't speak any more!" No answer. "We've quit speaking, we have!" No reply. "Say, Madge, you try this piece of candy—Oh, you never tasted such deliciousness. I didn't bite off of it, I cut my half off. Want to try it?" "No!" said Madge. "Say, Madge, whatter you mad about?" "You know very well, Mr. Arthur Pendleton." "'Cause I didn't bring you to the party?" "I'd be ashamed to refer to it if I were you," said Madge with high indignation; "and telling ev'rybody about my note. You'll see when I write you another note!" "Oh, pshaw! Now, Madge! Say, look here, Madge! I had excuse. Lemme tell you." "I won't listen at you, Arthur Pendleton." "Yes, but lemme tell you my excuse." "I won't hear any excuse. I don't believe you have any. I'd like to know what excuse you could have." "Well, you listen. I got in a fight with two boys and they grounded me, and I had to tell 'em who wrote my note, or they said they'd take it away from me. It was two to one. You ask Jim Pimlins and Ned Thompkins and Freckle Ridgeway. And Chalky saw it, too. You ask Chalky. You made me mad saying I told Eliza Bimby a story 'bout you hiding in th' woodpile, so I told the boys I wouldn't take any girl. And they throwed up to me I didn't have a chanct. I said I had they said I hadn't I said I had they said to sight the note; I wouldn't and we wrastled and I got throwed down an' I had to tell. That's how come I to tell it was you. It was physical force wormed it out of me. Say, Madge! Ain't that an excuse? Madge, do you know you're the prettiest girl here tonight?" "Arthur Pendleton, you hush!" "You're the prettiest girl in town, that's what you are!" said Arthur. "You're awful pretty. Say, Madge, let's stop not a-speaking. I think it's an awful bore." "Well, you quit saying I'm pretty," was the conditional response. "Well, Madge, you see I guess living next door to you all my life kept me from ever thinking of it. But the way you are dressed up to-night—my eye! Say, Madge, I'll go home with you after the party if you want me to." "Well, I don't care," said Madge, "you can go along with me and Letitia if you want to." Arthur, in an ecstasy of delight at this reconciliation, punched Chalky who sat on the other side, "Pass it around the table!" he cried. So Chalky (who had intended at first to pound Arthur in retaliation) reached around his lady and punched the next boy. That next boy punched his neighbor, and so the punching was "passed." When the party broke up, Madge, Letitia and Arthur went home together. They met Mrs. Morris coming to meet them with a scared face. "O, Madge," she said, "have you seen anything of Pete?"

The Pre-eminence of Christ.*

TEXT: "And he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence. For it was the good pleasure of the Father that in him should all the fulness dwell." Col.1: 18, 19.

No topic of the times is commanding one-half the attention of this great theme. The thing which interests theologians most is the place of Christ in their theology. And in every department of human industry the question is being raised, "What would Jesus do?" "What is the attitude of Jesus?"

THE GREAT FACT.

Are there discord and tumult in the church? are the busy creed-makers and creed-revisers perplexed? are we in confusion over the problem of Christian union? is the church itself invaded by the spirit of barter and sale? Look to Christ. Put him in the midst, and he will drive out discord and envy and sectism, and bring all usurpation to an end. Christ is presented to us, not as a mere ideal; not as a great commander merely; but he is set forth as "the Author and Finisher of our faith."

"He that cometh from above is above all." "He is so related to the work of developing and glorifying the human race," says one of His disciples, "that He is all in all; that He meets every one of those wants in the soul which are necessary for that final disclosure of glory which is to bring us up into the presence of God. He is the Architect, the Engineer, the Leader, the Guide, the Schoolmaster; He is the Friend; He is the Father and Brother; He is the Rescuer and Savior; He is the great Artisan and Artist of all the things which are required for the education of the race, for the disclosure of the human soul, till it comes to its maximum power and beauty and symmetry and joyfulness in the heavenly land."

A TIMELY WARNING.

"Take heed lest there shall be anyone that maketh spoil of you through his philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ" (Col. 2:8). There have been false Christs in every age. Crafty, designing men—and women—have gone forth to prey upon their fellowmen, making dupes of them, and enriching themselves out of their deluded victims. We need not be suspicious and harsh in our judgments, for the impostor very shortly reveals himself. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Test the pretended revelations of spiritualism by comparing them with the teachings of Christ, and how they pale and dwindle! Whatever the teachings or the claims of any person, make your appeal to the Word of the Lord, for he alone is pre-eminent. Draw near to Him; walk with Him, "rooted and built up in Him, and stablished in your faith."

THE BENEFICENT PURPOSE.

"To the end that we should be unto the praise of His glory, we who had before hoped in Christ" (Eph. 1:12). The fact of the exaltation and pre-eminence of Christ is everywhere admitted. He is the dominant force in the life of the modern world. He has been the inspiration of art—painting, sculpture and music reflect Him, and literature is eloquent with the story of His love. The world bears willing witness to His power. And this crown of matchless beauty is placed on his brow because he works in us, "to will and to do of his good pleasure." The transformation of men is the constant purpose of Christ. You cannot see him and know him and obey him and be the same that you were before. If Christians are morose and sour and hateful, they misrepresent Christ. It is only as they become gentle, and true, and tender, that they deserve the name. Are you full of morbid passions? Then this lesson is for you. Pre-eminent in your affections, among your motives, and in your whole life is this Christ; and if he is indeed pre-eminent, then you can no more keep from grace and symmetry and sweet manliness than a rose can keep from blooming. Oh, for churches all over the broad land that have given way to the leavening, ripening, beautifying influence of the transcendent Christ! With him uppermost in your heart, you go along exhaling goodness as the mignonette exhales sweetness. In wisdom Christ is pre-eminent; in patience, in purity, in forbearance, in gentleness, in strength, in love—always and everywhere he is supreme.

"Christ! I am Christ's! and let the name suffice you,
Ay, for me, too, he greatly hath sufficed;
Lo, with no winning words I would entice you.
Paul has no honor and no friend but Christ."
—Myers.

PRAYER.

We confess our weakness, O Lord, and our inability to stand without thee. There is strength in thy name and pity and tenderness in thy heart for all the sin-smitten children of men. Have mercy upon us, blessed Master, and open our eyes to see thy glory. Be thou to each one the fairest, the strongest, the best, and keep us by thy power till we see thee face to face. Amen.

The Great Commission.*

The forty days of precious communion with the Master were drawing near their close. With each appearance the disciples found their joy in the wondrous fact of his resurrection abounding more and more, while their awe of his mysterious power, which seemed to defy all the ordinary laws of physical being, rested like a cloud over their spirits, so that they could but feebly comprehend his purposes for the future. It was difficult for them to realize that he would again leave them, never more to appear in the flesh. Meanwhile, it was manifest that the Savior still cared for the same things that were dear to him during his earthly ministry. Not only the truths he had taught and the friends he had drawn about him, but the very places he had loved were still precious to him. His beloved Galilee drew him back to its solemn hills, its quiet valleys, and above all its lovely lake. He told the women who first saw him after his resurrection that he would meet his disciples in Galilee. Matthew tells us that Jesus specified the mountain amid whose deep recesses he would meet with them, for the revised version correctly renders the first verse of our lesson, "unto the mountain." Many suppose this to have been the occasion when Jesus appeared to over five hundred of his disciples, as told by Paul in the 15th chapter of first Corinthians. This is confirmed, as we believe, by the language of our lesson.

The eleven apostles, probably soon after the incident of last Sunday's lesson, when Jesus appeared to them at the Sea of Galilee, made their way to the mountain where he had promised to meet them once more. It may well have been the Horns of Hattin, where the Sermon on the Mount had been delivered, and where he had often lingered with his disciples, in the happy days of yore. When they came into his presence, they fell at his feet in worship. "But some doubted," we are told. These we believe to have been some of the multitude that followed the eleven, for it is quite certain that these all were fully assured of the resurrection of the Master. Thomas, the only one who had held any doubts after that first day, had been re assured the following Lord's day and had accepted Jesus as "his Lord and his God." Evidently, some of the great company gathered at the mountain still hesitated to accept the fact, but even they became convinced of its reality before the interview ended, for Paul, in the Scripture already quoted, refers to the entire five hundred as "brethren," whose testimony was then available to establish the fact that Jesus did arise from the dead. These doubters became believers, in the presence of their risen Lord.

On this occasion Jesus gave to the whole company of believers the 'Great Commission," which has from that day to this been recognized as the marching and fighting orders of the Army of Immanuel. This marvellous commission comprises the reason for the church's existence and activity and the assurance of her final and complete victory. No church can rightly claim to be apostolic that ignores the terms of this imperial order. No preacher can assume to be a messenger of Jesus Christ who does not endeavor, so much as in him is, to carry out its high and holy aim. It is the charter of the Church of Christ and the program for the world's redemption. Let us study its pregnant words.

"All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth." When were such sweeping claims ever made by mortal man? Can he be a mere Jewish peasant, or a common rabbi, who thus asserts his right to command all intelligences, of earth and sky? His words are either the expression of an overweening vanity and a gigantic arrogance, or the calm utterance of One who knows that he speaks the very truth of the Infinite and Eternal God. Can we doubt which is the truth? Not when we remember the perfect self-poise, the beautiful humility and the "sweet-reasonableness" which characterized the whole of the life of the Son of man. It is not the voice of a slave, decked in mock robes of royalty, to which we listen, but the majestic accents of the king of glory, and they have rolled through the centuries like the thunders of Olympus, and are being heard in every corner of the broad earth and echo across every sea.

"Go ye, therefore, and make disciples of all nations." These are the marching orders of the great captain of our salvation. "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." What a mighty word is this "therefore"! Not because the harvest is ripe, or the way easy, or the home field all covered; but because all authority is mine, therefore go! The world is my field; all men are the subjects of my atoning death; there is no Jew or Gentile, Greek or Barbarian, before God; "every soul is mine, saith the Lord." All will prove accessible to my truth and grace. The cultured Greek, the haughty Roman, the dreamy dweller in India, the hordes of the hermit nation, China, the dark-skinned sons of the tropics—all, all are mine, and I claim them for my Father, whose children they are.

Under this commission, the apostolic preachers and their comrades went forth into a world that was hostile, or at least indifferent to their message. Like a fire on the prairies this message swept over all lands, climbing over mountains and leaping across seas, until throughout the known world the gospel of Christ had been proclaimed. Had the church continued faithful to her divine commission, long ago would the race have been evangelized. And if she could awake to her full responsibility to-day, the century on which we have entered would witness the whole world christianized. Whatever others may do, we may, each for himself, accept and discharge the duty that comes to us and receive the fit reward of faithfulness.

"Baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," is the manner in which the Lord directs his disciples to enlist their converts in open discipleship. Baptism is for the believer, for him who has been taught of God to trust in his divine Son, and to commit his way unto him. Following this act of obedience, the newborn child of God is to be instructed in all the commandments of his Master, that he may grow up into him in all things. And the precious promise, both to teacher and taught, is nothing less than the abiding presence of the Lord himself. "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world!" Even so, dear Savior; abide with us and we can bear life's burdens and perform its duties, since thy smiling approval and tender love shall be our exceeding great reward.

(1 John 3:14-18.)

Matthew Arnold said that "Religion is morals touched with emotion." Now emphasis enough has been laid upon the emotion. You must feel so and so, experience this and that, be able to testify to this great upheaval under the influence of the spirit, or that great stirring through the power from on high. And all this may be very well. But what we have not sufficiently emphasized is the calm, serious practice of morality and Christian ethics. We have, indeed, preached at times as if "mere morality" were of no value in a life. We have even preached against the "moral man" as if he were a reprobate, when the fact is "conduct is three-fourths of life." We need to emphasize good-doing as much as we have emphasized feel-gooding.

There is a great deal said these days about spirituality. And there cannot be too much spirituality, no, not enough. But there are some who do not understand that spirituality must be accompanied by, nay, must consist of, sweetness of temper, kindness of heart, temperance of language, charity of judgment, modesty of bearing, humility, truth and all the moral virtues of the Sermon on the Mount. All our agonizing, and all our heart-searching, and all our martyrdoms to our opinions, will be as soundig brass and cymbals unless we practice Christian morals.

Paul was able to say to the Philippians: "Do as I did, and as I do." So many there are who teach: "Do as I say; but as regards what I do, that is another matter." Paul lived in all good conscience, practiced Christianity, and so was able to ask others to do likewise. Jesus told his followers to be like him. So, in general, must Christians who indeed have assumed the position of teachers and preachers to the world be able to say, "Do as we do."

The passage from John which heads our lesson for this meeting is filled with the highest of all reaches of Christian practice, which is the love of one another. His message thrills and throbs with love. And the story never will grow old, that when John was far advanced in years, was a tottering, feeble old man, he used to be brought into the Christian assembly in his chair. Asked to speak to the congregation, which doubtless grew as still as death, the white haired old apostle, whose head, when brown, had rested on the Savior's breast, so many, many years ago, would gently and almost whisperingly say: "Little children, love one another." This was all he had strength for, and this was his last message to the world: "Little children, love one another."

Buffalo, N. Y.

Love, mercy, tenderness, purity—these are no mere names when we see them brought out in the human actions of our Master. Holiness is only a shadow to our minds, till it receives shape and substance in the life of Christ. All this character of holiness is intelligible to us in Christ.—Robertson.

The Reformation of The XIXth Century

A Series of Historical Sketches, dealing with the Rise and Progress of the Religious Movement inaugurated by Thomas and Alexander Campbell, from its Origin to the close of the Nineteenth Century.

Edited by J. H. Garrison

This great work, which has been eagerly awaited for some time, is now ready for delivery. It is truly a notable work—a splendid addition to the literature of the Disciples of Christ. It is the only complete and modern history of the current reformation, and therefore should at once find a place in the home of every earnest and zealous Disciple.

This history is divided into eight periods, as follows:

Introductory Period	Chas. Louis Loos.
Period of Organization	B. B. Tyler.
The Turbulent Period	W. T. Moore.
The Transition Period	T. W. Grafton.
Period of Revival of Home Missions	Benj. L. Smith.
Period of Foreign Missions	A. McLean.
Period of Woman's Work	Lois A. White.
Lessons from Our Past	J. H. Garrison.

Chas. Louis Loos was personally and intimately acquainted with the fathers of the reformation, and associated with them in their work. His statement of the origin of our movement, and of its early connection with the Baptists, is the most satisfactory which has yet been made. B. B. Tyler has for many years been an untiring student of the history of our movement. W. T. Moore was an active and prominent participant in the events of the period beginning with 1861. His sketch of Alexander Campbell is a masterpiece, and is alone worth the price of the book. T. W. Grafton, in his "Life of Alexander Campbell," and "Men of Yesterday" has shown his ability as an able historian. Benj. L. Smith, A. McLean and Miss White have been most conspicuously identified with the enterprises of which they write. The closing section, by J. H. Garrison, is the address delivered by him at the Jubilee Convention in Cincinnati, October, 1899.

"The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century" is a handsome volume of 514 pages, bound in cloth. It is an addition to that list of books which, whatever other books he may have, every earnest Disciple of Christ should possess. This history is not only a volume full of facts and information, but a story of absorbing interest.

CORD.

Mrs. Zerilda Cord passed to her reward in Warrensburg, Mo., April 17, 1901. About 14 months ago, the writer of these lines sent to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST a notice of the death of H. C. Cord, the aged husband of this good Christian woman. They were both born in Kentucky and journeyed together for more than 61 years as husband and wife. Sister Cord quietly passed away, aged almost 78 years. Our pastor, H. A. Denton, conducted the funeral services at the home of our beloved sister. Four Christian sons and four Christian daughters are left to love the memory of father and mother.

M. SHRYACK.

GEORGE.

Departed this life April 1, Maggie Taliferro George, of Gunn City, Mo., in the 44th year of her age. She was a faithful member of the Christian Church and for many years president of the W. C. T. U. She was everything that was pure and good, and when death came was ready to go. She leaves a husband and six children to mourn her departure.

E. G.

ST. CLAIR.

At his home in Humphreys, Mo., April 15, 1901, Jasen B. St. Clair, aged 82 years, 11 months and 17 days. He was a personal friend of the writer, who conducted the funeral at the Humphreys Christian Church at 1 o'clock Wednesday. Uncle Jasen, as he was familiarly known, has lived a very active life. He has filled the respective offices of contractor and builder, merchant and farmer. He leaves two brothers and a sister, his good wife and three children to mourn his loss. But we look on him as a ripe sheaf and think him better off, for he suffered constantly.

R. W. BLUNT.

TINKHAM.

Jasper N. Tinkham was born May 13, 1843, died April 12, 1901. He was married to Zodema Kenan in 1865. This union was blessed with three children, two sons and one daughter. The mother died in 1870 and the daughter, Altha, in 1888. In 1874 Mr. Tinkham was married to Maggie Foster, who survives him. In 1862 he went out in Company A, 83rd Illinois Volunteer, and remained until the war closed. Funeral services conducted in the Cameron (Ill.) Christian Church, April 14, by the pastor, O. D. Maple. Interment at Silent Home Cemetery.

TITSWORTH.

Burton B. Titsworth died of apendicitis at the Seattle General Hospital April 13. He lacked but three days of being 25 years old. He embodied all the elements of a strong, clean Christian young man. He was a faithful Christian Endeavorer, member of the choir, treasurer of the Sunday-school and loyal to every department of church work. He was loved and honored by us all. We laid his body to rest yesterday afternoon in the beautiful Lakeview Cemetery. His mother and sister have the deep sympathy of the church and community.

VERTREES.

Mrs. J. H. Vertrees, after a short but severe illness, departed this life Jan. 12, 1901, at the home of her son, Eli Vertrees, at Winfield, Mo. Her maiden name was Elizabeth Hart, she was married to J. H. Vertrees in 1846. To this union were born 10 children, of whom seven remain to mourn their loss, three having died in babyhood. The deceased was in her 77th year. She obeyed the gospel when quite young, and was faithful until death. Her remains were taken to Camden, Ark., and laid to rest beside her husband who died in 1896.

MRS. J. P. B.

ON THE FARM.

There's many a successful business man who sits in his city office and lets his mind slip back to his boyhood days on the farm. How good it felt to live! What an appetite he had! How good everything tasted! How sound his sleep was! How eagerly he rose with the sun and raced with him through the long day. And now he's a successful man. But he can't sleep. He doesn't enjoy his food. His stomach is weak, his nerves are shaken, and he no more rises with the sun to race eagerly against him. His vitality is low and now and again his heart seems to plunge in his breast as if it would break loose. That's the price he has paid for success.

The mischief of the whole business is that he buys "tablets" of one sort or another to "aid" his digestion, and indulges in bromides and other nerve stimulants, just to hold himself together, and wonders why he seems to be getting worse.

The whole trouble with such a man generally lies in what is called a "weak" stomach. The food he eats does not nourish him because it is only partially digested and assimilated. No man can be stronger than his stomach, because it is in the stomach and allied organs of digestion and nutrition that strength is made from the food which is eaten.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition. It restores the strength of the body in the only way strength can be restored, by food which is perfectly digested and assimilated, when the diseased stomach (with its allied organs) is cured of disease. It is a blood-making, body-building medicine, inasmuch as blood is made from food and the body is built up by blood. It is not a stimulant, containing neither alcohol or any other narcotic.

NO OTHER DOCTOR FOR ME.

"Last spring, early, I wrote you my feelings and condition," says Mr. A. J. Vanderwater, 873 West Division Street, Chicago, Ill., "and you advised me to take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery (a few bottles), and then write you how I felt. I am happy to say I am getting to feel fine. In all I have taken six bottles of the 'Discovery' and four or five vials of the little 'Pellets.' They have done me worlds of good. All my friends say: 'Vanderwater, how well you are looking. What in the world have you been doing?' I tell them I have been doctoring with Dr. R. V. Pierce, of Buffalo, N. Y. 'Why,' they say, 'you haven't been there?' No, I say, but I took his 'Golden Medical Discovery' and his little 'Pellets.' These medicines have wrought the great change in me. From a slow mope of a man that could hardly crawl, tired and sick all the time, and could do no work; to a man who can work, sleep, eat, and feel fine, and that tired feeling is all going away. I am very thankful that I wrote to Dr. Pierce. His 'Golden Medical Discovery' and his little liver 'Pellets' have almost made a new man of me. I feel young as I did at thirty years. No other doctor for me, only Dr. Pierce."

HAD GIVEN UP HOPE.

"I will express my thanks to you for the kindly advice you have given me in regard to my case," writes Miss Carrie J. Wharton, of Dunavant, Spottsylvania Co., Virginia. "When I wrote to you last spring I was in a terrible state of health. Had given up all hope of ever being better. I spit up my food all the time and it seemed sour as vinegar. I would have a bad sick headache every other week; in fact, my head never felt clear, and I was perfectly broken down under the strain of losing my food constantly. I had read a great deal in your books of what your medicine had done for others, so I wrote you and got your advice. Bought two bottles of 'Golden Medical Discovery' and the first dose I took I felt better. When I had finished taking the two bottles the spitting up had entirely stopped and my head was much better. I believe your medicines are just what you have said of them.

"I carefully read the books you sent me and shall always speak a good word for the 'Golden Medical Discovery' whenever I have a chance.

"You can publish this if you think it worth while. It might induce some one else to try your medicine who was suffering as I did. It was by the testimonials of others that I was induced to try it. I shall always rely upon your advice and feel safe to do as you tell me."

Book Notes.

Two notable books have just been issued from the press of the Christian Publishing Company. The literary standard of this house has been steadily rising of late, and these two new volumes are of a character of which any publishing house might well be proud.

The first of these new volumes is The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century. This book is fully described elsewhere in this paper. It is a history of the Disciples of Christ by Chas. Louis Loos, B. B. Tyler, W. T. Moore, T. W. Grafton, Benj. L. Smith, A. McLean, Lois A. White and J. H. Garrison, the whole making a handsome volume of 514 pages. It is not only full of authentic facts, many of which are now published for the first time, but is a narrative of most absorbing interest. The story of the rise and progress of our reformation has never before been told in such a complete, comprehensive, connected and accurate manner. This volume was promised some time ago, and the announcement that it is now ready will be hailed with delight by thousands. The price of the book is $2.

The second of these new volumes is The Spiritual Side of Our Plea, by A. B. Jones. It is a notable contribution to a better understanding of the spiritual significance and value of our reformatory movement. It accentuates a side of our plea which has been too much neglected by many. It deals in a profound manner, characteristic of its author, with such questions as "The Letter and the Spirit," "The Real and the Formal," "Alexander Campbell on Remission of Sins," "The Word and the Spirit," "Righteousness and Law." The views herein expressed are the result of long and mature deliberation by one of the clearest thinkers and writers in the ranks of the Reformation. The book is certain to attract attention, and deserves the careful consideration of the younger men in the ministry, whom the author had especially in mind when writing it. It is a cloth-bound volume of 394 pages. Price, $1.50.

Special Catalogue No. 31 is now ready for those who wish it. Everyone who saw our Special Catalogue No. 22 will, of course, want to see its successor. It is a 16-page pamphlet containing hundreds of attractive book bargains. We have taken care to differentiate the character of the books offered, so that everyone can find in this catalogue something to interest him. Theology, biography, fiction, art, poetry, travel—all are represented. You will do well to send for a copy at once, as it may be the means of saving you several dollars. If you pay somebody $2 for a book, and discover afterward that we are selling the same book for 75 cents, you will feel badly.

The Christian Worker, by J. H. Foy, is generally admitted to be the best book of its kind ever published. It is a complete manual for the preacher and church official, containing hints and suggestions for weddings, funerals, all manner of special services, organization discipline, etc., etc. No preacher or church officer can afford to be without this handy volume. Price, 75 cents.

Among Our Advertisers.

Barclay Meador, Advertising Manager.

The reduction on prices of cameras and supplies, announced in our issue of April 18, by H. A. Hyatt, 410 N. Broadway, St. Louis, affords a rare opportunity to those who will want to do snap shooting this season.

The advertisement of Dr. M. Ney Smith has, no doubt, been observed in our columns. Dr. Smith is a specialist who has maintained a very creditable record in St. Louis for a number of years. He is yet a young man and may be expected to add many years of usefulness to those already lived in the service of afflicted humanity. He is a member of one of our churches in this city and known to many of the brethren. Information concerning his treatment may easily be obtained from him direct or through us.

The "old line" firm of advertising agents, N. W. Ayer & Son, of Philadelphia, put out yearly a veritable encyclopedia of information within two covers, bearing the title "American Newspaper Annual." First and foremost it embraces a catalogue of American newspapers, and this is supplemented by a description of every place in the United States and Canada in which any one of the papers catalogued is published, including mention of railroad, telegraph, express and banking facilities. Then there are colored maps, the United States census of 1900, tabulated vote of states and counties at presidential election in 1900, and in addition to all a handsome lot of advertising, in which the publications, religious journals included, set forth their own merits. What N. W. Ayer & Son don't know about newspapers and advertising could be put in a much smaller book than 1,579 pages.

The use of extravagant terms is quite common among advertisers, for instance, "biggest," "best on earth," "none so good," etc. The Elkhart Carriage and Harness Manufacturing Co., who for several seasons have been using our advertising columns, employ such terms and throw out the challenge of inspection. Their claim is to being "the largest manufacturer of vehicles and harness in the world selling to the consumer exclusively." Visitors to Elkhart, Ind., will not fail to test the verity of the claim. Those who cannot can do no better than to write for a catalogue, which is sent free. They make 178 styles of vehicles and 65 styles of harness and insulate, as it were, every sale with a guarantee which is protection safe and sure. By eliminating the middle man they reduce the cost to the consumer to the minimum.

"AMERICA," said Emerson, "is another name for opportunity." The twentieth century is another name for the same thing. It is a day of stupendous enterprises. Combinations on a scale hitherto undreamed of are making possible achievements which aforetime lay beyond the reach of man. It is the province of Christianity to guide and control all the mighty forces of the age for the accomplishment of the greatest good to the greatest number. But it cannot fulfill this high mission while it presents to the world the spectacle of a hundred warring sects. The first great duty of a divided Church is to heal its divisions, and present an unbroken front to the powers of darkness. This does not mean uniformity of opinion, of organization or of methods of worship, but it does mean "one Lord, one faith, one baptism," and therefore "one body" animated by "one Spirit," even as we are called in "one hope" of our calling. Thus united, with all the diversity consistent with such unity, the Church would become the mightiest factor in carrying forward those great reforms for the welfare of the race which are now halting for lack of moral leadership. Does the Church know the day of its visitation and opportunity?

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE?

A large interrogation, truly! It would be difficult to frame a more fundamental question than this, which has been chosen as the title of the new book by W. J. Russell. No more valuable volume for young people has ever been issued. What is Your Life? is easily worth $10,000 to any young man or woman who will faithfully follow its teaching. The general scope of the book is shown by the titles of some of the chapters: "The Value of Time," "The Body and Good Health," "Character Building," "Good Books and Good Reading," etc. The volume is not only helpful and profitable, but is also interesting and entertaining. Mr. Russell has avoided that didactic, dogmatic, prosy style so usual in works of this class. He has written in a bright, lively vein. His book will be read by young people who would refuse to read the average volume of advice to the young.

Can You Write Shorthand?

DO YOU KNOW that there is a great demand for first-class stenographers? There are hundreds of "business colleges" and "stenographic schools" throughout the country that are annually turning out thousands of young men and women stenographers, and yet there is a constant call for really capable writers of shorthand. There is an over-supply of incompetents, but not nearly enough well-qualified stenographers to meet the demands of the business world, and consequently the young man or woman who thoroughly masters stenography can command a salary of from $75 to $150 per month.

PERHAPS you have thought that in order to become a first-class stenographer, it was necessary for you to leave home and attend a school, at a cost, all told, of several hundred dollars. If you have thought this, you have thought wrong. Many of the most expert stenographers in the country never saw the inside of a shorthand college, and had no other teacher than instruction books. If you have ordinary intelligence and a good knowledge of the English language, you can do as they did.

THE MORAN SERIES of Instruction Books in the Reporting Style of Shorthand is undoubtedly the best system ever offered. It is used in the best stenographic schools in the land. It is Thorough, Complete, Practical and especially adapted for self-instruction. If you secure this series of instruction books, all that is necessary to obtain a complete mastery of stenography is a reasonable amount of study and practice. There are seven books in the series, as follows:

The Reporting Style of Shorthand, Cloth, 312 pages	$1.50
Key to the Reporting Style of Shorthand, Cloth, 104 pages	2.00
The Shorthand Primer, Paper, 32 pages	.25
The Sign Book, Limp Cloth, 47 pages	.25
The Shorthand Dictionary, Cloth, 160 pages	1.00
One Hundred Valuable Suggestions, Cloth, 120 pages	1.00
The Students' Shorthand Manual, Cloth, 144 pages	1.00

Are you a student in some high school, academy, college or university? A moment's thought will convince you that a knowledge of shorthand will be of immense assistance to you, even if you do not intend to follow stenography as a profession. Why not secure these books, and put in the summer months learning shorthand? Are you engaged in business of any kind? Shorthand will save you a great deal of time and labor in the making of memoranda. Are you a preacher? Remember that the best authorities on sermonizing declare that all sermons should be written, whether the manuscript be taken into the pulpit or not. How easy to write your sermons if you can avoid the tedious, finger-cramping longhand!

A SPECIAL OFFER! While we will send any one of the volumes above mentioned on receipt of the price, we will, until further notice, make a special offer of the entire series of seven volumes, complete, for $5.00.

$5.00—The Complete Series—$5.00

This is a generous offer. These books cost far more to publish than the ordinary text-book, because of the special plates required, yet we make a very substantial reduction for the series, which, purchased volume by volume, would cost Seven Dollars. Send for the series, diligently apply yourself, and in three months you can equal the work of the average stenographer, and in six months will be expert. You will find that $5.00 thus spent will be the best investment you ever made.

Current Events.

Are Two and Two Four? During the past ten days the stock market has been the scene of such activity as it has never before witnessed. The bulls in Wall Street are holding high carnival. Immense sales are reported daily, breaking all previous records three or four times in succession and the prices are such as would have seemed absurd a month ago. Trusts and rumors of trusts are on every hand and a combination seems to have in some way the mysterious power of creating values. Two factories are worth $50,000 apiece. A combination is effected and the public is assured that the two together are worth a quarter of a million. The stock of a railroad is ten per cent. below par, but when the right master of railroad finance takes three or four such railroads in hand the price of their stock doubles. The ordinary arithmetic of finance is superseded. Two and two no longer make four. Instead of addition we have multiplication and instead of multiplication we shall perhaps soon have geometrical progression. Conservative financiers like Russell Sage look with distrust upon this sudden and apparently fictitious increase of values and maintain that a plant which is to-day worth a hundred thousand and can be duplicated for that, cannot have juggled into it to-morrow an honest value of three times that amount. There seems to be a good deal of hard sense in this observation of "your Uncle Russell" but perhaps it is not quite the last word that is to be said about stocks and values. It fails to take account of the cash value of brains.

2+2+Brains=10. It is sometimes said that this is a materialistic age, but it is not yet so materialistic that real estate, buildings and machinery are the sole factors in the creation of values. Brains count for something and the value of a railroad or a factory depends quite as much on the quality of the brains which direct it as upon the cost of the plant. It is entirely probable that a crash will come, as Mr. Sage predicts, in many of the stocks which are now soaring skyward. But if so, it will be because they are not controlled by the brains which seem to be on the point of controlling them or because those brains shall turn out to be less efficient than they were supposed to be. Even Mr. Sage admits that the most probable among the causes of a possible panic is the death of J. Pierpont Morgan or any one of the three or four other men whose reputations form the basis for this increase in the valuation of stock. We may not like to admit that Mr. Morgan and two or three others of his sort can command the financial situation to such a degree as practically to create values by the assurance of success which their reputation gives in any enterprise of which they take hold. It is a dangerous power to put into the hands of a few men. We do not like it and still less do we like to admit that it is not only a matter of money, but a matter of a particular sort of brains. If it were simply a question of money the situation would present no grave danger. We could amend the Constitution and confiscate their capital, but brains and financial reputation are an intangible asset which cannot be confiscated. Perhaps it will be better for us all, since combinations are inevitable, not to try to sweep back the ocean with our brooms but to let this inevitable tendency work out its equally inevitable result. If, through trusts and combinations, the ownership of natural monopolies is being put into a few hands, it will be only so much the easier for the government to get hold of it. The next step is public ownership.

America as an Enemy. Several of the European countries seem to have discovered within the last few months that the United States is in the field as a serious competitor for a large share of the world's commerce. They knew it before, no doubt, and some of them have from time to time shown signs of anxiety, but now there is a more vivid realization of what it means and it is seen, moreover, that America's commercial supremacy is not a possibility of the indefinite future but a certainty within a few years. Out of this new sense of the seriousness of the situation, has grown the talk of a general European alliance to make commercial war upon the United States without interfering with diplomatic friendship. While we are not prepared to suggest to the Powers any more feasible plan of accomplishing the end which they desire—even if they were asking for suggestions—it may be remarked that history has not shown that commercial wars against the United States are a wholesome expedient for the other party. There is the question of American meat, for instance, about which Germany has exercised itself much and to little purpose. Restrictive legislation has had but slight effect in checking the importation of our meat and fruits into Germany. France and Spain have adopted similar tactics in regard to certain American products, but the value of American exports to each of these three countries has more than doubled within the past eight years. It is not to be wondered that the foreign producers, who find American competition blocking their way in their own markets, should urge their governments to do something about it. But it does not seem that a tariff war is a wholly desirable method of procedure. Natural conditions give America an advantage which cannot be offset by little tariff regulations. European industries are no longer infants to be coddled that way—and our own are pretty well grown.

An International Reconciliation. The report that diplomatic relations between Austria and Mexico are about to be resumed after a lapse of more than thirty years, recalls an interesting chapter in American history, and an instance in which the Monroe doctrine was applied with important results. While the United States was engrossed in the Civil War, the French emperor, Napoleon III, seized the opportunity to establish in Mexico an empire under French control. Maximilian, brother of the present Austrian Emperor, Francis Joseph, was selected as head of the new empire and, with the aid of a French army, the weak Mexican government was overthrown and the imperial government of Maximilian I established in 1864. As soon as our war was over, President Johnson made a diplomatic protest to Napoleon III and sent an army to the Mexican frontier. The French forces which had supported Maximilian's throne promptly retired from the country, but Maximilian, with splendid daring, preferred to remain and try to maintain his empire without military force. The attempt was vain. In spite of the efforts of our government to save him, he was executed in 1867, and the present Mexican Republic was established. Since that time Austria and Mexico have been diplomatic strangers. Their representatives at Washington and the other capitals have no dealings with each other. After the lapse of a third of a century both countries feel that a reconciliation is not inconsistent with honor, but it will take longer than this for Europe to forget the lesson which it learned by this prompt application of the Monroe doctrine.

The Fire at Jacksonville. On Friday, May 4, a fire broke out in the chimney of a negro cabin in the city of Jacksonville, Fla., and soon getting beyond the control of the fire department spread rapidly, resulting in the destruction of 138 blocks, including the business heart of the city. The leading hotels have been burned and all the churches. It is probably the most destructive fire, in proportion to the size of the city, which has occurred in this country. The financial loss is estimated at fifteen million dollars. Ten thousand people were left homeless. The President and Secretary of War have telegraphed sympathy and the promise of government assistance in the way of providing shelter for the people. The city itself and the governor of the state are planning measures of relief for the destitute and homeless people. The misfortune of this fair city of the South will call out the sincere sympathy of the people all over the country, and if any general call for assistance should be made aid will be generously extended from all parts of the United States. A thousand dollars has already been sent by grateful Galveston.

The South American Manger. An influential British paper, The Spectator, in enumerating the several grievances which the European governments have against the United States, mentioned our attitude toward the South American states, which we "will neither take nor let any body else take." This attitude is described as a dog-in-the-manger policy. Perhaps it is not worth while to quarrel about a name, but it ought to be pointed out that our objection to the encroachments of European Powers in South America is not the result of sheer meanness, but is part of an intelligent policy to which we have hitherto adhered. Plainly our European friends do not appreciate the beauties of the Monroe doctrine, though they have come to understand its practical workings well enough to keep out of its track. The Spectator says: "There is no prize left in this rapidly dwindling little planet like South America," and it goes on to say how Germany has a covetous eye on Brazil, Italy on the Argentine, France on Guiana and Austria-Hungary on Uruguay. If all this is true, it is a lucky thing for South America that the United States stands as an exponent of the Open Door policy in that part of the world as well as in the far east. We do a little expanding ourselves on occasions when there seems to be no honorable escape from it, but we are yet far from the point of viewing any inhabited portion of the earth's surface as merely a "rich prize" to be grabbed without regard to anything but the satisfaction of our own appetite. We want no spheres of influence in South America but a fair and open commercial competition free to all comers.

The Opium Question Again Fifty-nine years ago occurred the Opium War, the first armed conflict between China and a western Power. The result of it was that Great Britain compelled China to open her ports to the opium trade, which has since been the worst curse of the Empire. It would be a fitting thing and an appropriate introduction to the better relations which we hope will be maintained between China and the western Powers in the future, if the cessation of the opium trade should be made a part of the settlement which is now being negotiated in Pekin. Upon Great Britain rests most of the blame for the ravages of opium in China, for it was she who demanded there a market for her Indian poppies. It would be a righteous act if she would, in making terms with China for the settlement of the present differences, undo as much as possible of the wrong which she has done. The Chinese government has repeatedly declared its desire to prohibit the cultivation of the poppy and the importation of opium as soon as the Powers will give their consent. Now is a better time than there has been since 1842 for Christian people and Christian nations to exert their influence in this direction. The Powers need not prohibit the opium traffic; all that is asked is that they shall allow China the privilege of prohibiting it. A memorial has been prepared and signed by representatives of most of the American mission boards urging our government to take the initiative in securing the entire cessation of the opium trade. By the treaty of 1884 American citizens and American vessels are already prohibited from engaging in this trade with China. The Powers have made a bad enough mess in the military part of their dealings with China in the present emergency and a provision of this sort would go far toward retrieving the situation.

The Buffalo Exposition. On the first day of May the Pan-American Exposition opened at Buffalo, though the formal opening of the buildings will be deferred until May 20, when the President will be present. The city of Buffalo is entitled to great credit for the generosity with which it has supported this project. As originally planned, the exposition was to have been held at Cayuga Island in 1899, but the war with Spain necessitated a postponement and when the plan was taken up again it was decided to have the exposition in Buffalo and plans were laid on a larger scale. The citizens of Buffalo and vicinity have contributed about $3,000,000. The Federal government gave half a million and New York state $300,000. It is estimated that the total cost of the finished exposition, including state and foreign exhibits, is about $10,000,000. Although not planned on so large a scale as either the Chicago or the Paris Exposition, it will in some respects surpass both, especially in the electrical display, in fountains and hydraulic effects, and probably in musical and athletic events. Those who are interested in the St. Louis Exposition of 1903 will doubtless have much to learn from this one, though the Louisiana Purchase celebration will be on a much larger scale.

The President's Tour. During the past ten days President McKinley, accompanied by his official family, has been enjoying a triumphal progress through the southern states. The prosperity argument upon which the last presidential campaign was won is still potent and particularly so in the south, and it has won for the President a warm welcome in the solid south. Whether or not the administration is at all responsible for the prosperity is, of course, another question and one over which the public mind will not greatly exercise itself so long as the prosperity continues. The President is showing exceptional ability as a maker of speeches at the stopping points along the route. Of all our presidents, it is generally conceded that President Harrison was the greatest success as a maker of short speeches on occasions of this sort, but he gave himself the advantage of making comparatively few of them and of never allowing his program to be disturbed and never making a speech for which he had not had ample time for preparation. Mr. McKinley's speeches are not on a par with General Harrison's but he makes more of them and always finds it easier to speak than to refuse. But even without making any allowances for these facts, they are very good speeches, with enough politics in them to make them worth reading and enough jollying to make them palatable to the local audience. The presidential party spent last Sunday at El Paso, Texas, where greetings were exchanged with the President of our sister republic, and the party is now rapidly nearing the Pacific Coast.

Brevities. The stock sales on the New York stock exchange averaged a million dollars a minute for five hours on Tuesday of last week.

It is reported that a movement is on foot to effect a combination of the Waltham, Elgin and other watch factories and that J. P. Morgan is back of it.

The American Cavalry force in Pekin has left the city for Tien-Tsin in compliance with the order for the recall of all American troops in China except a legation guard.

The Thirty-third Annual Convention of the American Women's Suffrage Association will be held in Minneapolis, May 30 to June 5. "All friends of truth and liberty are especially invited to attend."

The Duke and Duchess of Cornwall are making a tour of the British colonies and have arrived at Australia, where the heir apparent to the British throne will open the Australian Parliament in the name of the King.

Senor Capota, chairman of the Cuban Commission which was recently in Washington, says that General Palma is the most promising candidate for presidency of the Cuban republic. Generals Masso and Gomez also have hopes.

St. Louis real estate is beginning to boom in expectation of the World's Fair of 1903. The purchase of the Catlin tract, immediately north of Forest Park, for a million dollars by a New York syndicate, is a significant item.

The Taft Commission has made an appeal for teachers to go to the Philippines. Probably some of the teachers from the Indian schools will be sent and there will be an opening for a limited number of recent college graduates.

Count Tolstoy has published a lengthy reply to the edict of excommunication against him. He denounces the Russian Church and characterizes this decree as "illegal, intentionally equivocal, arbitrary, unjustified and full of falsehood."

The government of Colombia and the Panama Canal Company, which holds its rights under a concession from the French government, are renewing their efforts to interest our government in the Panama route. One drawback is that the company's rights as granted by France are in alienable.

The President is making friends in the South. The New Orleans Times-Democrat says that "he has obviously a large reserve power of strength," more firmness and willpower than he is generally credited with, and "a considerable amount of the stuff of which successful and popular Presidents are made."

According to the official statement of the British War Office, the total number of deaths in the South African war is 714 officers and 14,264 men. In addition to these many have returned home invalided and have subsequently died and many more have left the service unfit for further duty.

Surrenders in the Philippines have continued until apparently there are scarcely any genuine insurgents left to surrender. The surrender of General Tinio and his command is said to complete the pacification of northern Luzon. The insurrection on the Island of Marinduque is also said to be completely ended. The average number of surrenders during April was one hundred daily.

Why Some Preachers Fail.

We suppose it will be admitted by the most charitable critics that many of our modern preachers are failures in the pulpit. They may be good scholars, possess a faultless diction and elocution, but in spite of these adjuncts to ministerial success they are failures as preachers. What are some of the sources of this failure?

The Christian Commonwealth of London, discussing this subject in an editorial entitled, "The Old Bucket," thinks that "the failure of much of the pulpit work of our time lies not in the lack of truth, for love of truth is one of the master passions of the age, even though failure is often mistaken for truth by sincere minds. The misfortune is that many ministers insist on bearing the water of life to the multitudes in the bucket of a past generation." It is probably true that the bucket used by certain ministers in conveying the water of life to the thirsty multitudes is slightly antiquated and might be easily improved. But we fear the criticism does not go to the root of the matter. There is, in our judgment, a much deeper cause of failure in many of our modern preachers than the kind of vessel they use in carrying the water of life to the people. Is it not true that this very water of life has been adulterated, and the people refuse to drink because they recognize the taste and odor of foreign elements which they instinctively feel that their spiritual systems do not require? This seems to us more than probable. It is absolutely certain that such is the case.

Nothing is more common than for preachers to offer to the people certain ecclesiastical nostrums and theological mixtures labeled "The Gospel," which have in them a large admixture of human error and false philosophy. When the people reject these nostrums they are set down by many of the clergy as being totally depraved! Consider for a moment, without our taking space to specify, what absurd and unbelievable doctrines and dogmas have been promulgated in the past in the name of Christianity, the belief of which was held to be essential to salvation. Think of how many irrelevant doctrines and speculations, which have no relation to character, have been foisted upon people as an integral part of the gospel. Is it any wonder that the people have been slow to receive without question these so-called gospels?

Another fruitful source of failure on the part of many preachers is that they do not adapt their message to the needs of the times. Each age has its own problems and its own obstacles. The successful preacher is one who puts himself into sympathetic relation with the present needs of the age or people to whom he ministers. He does not waste time in fighting the battles which the fathers fought and won, and which do not need to be refought. He ascertains where the enemy is to-day and directs his pulpit batteries in that direction. He studies what are the real obstacles in the way of right living among the people with whom and for whom he is laboring, and earnestly seeks to remove them. The preacher who does not do this is a ministerial misfit. He may preach truth, but not the particular truth which the people of his parish or community require. Every successful preacher must understand the age in which he lives and must be able to read the signs of the times.

Another cause of ministerial failure is still more fundamental; it is the preacher's failure to realize, in his own experience, the truth which he preaches. His gospel is a second-hand gospel which he has not lived and which has not been passed through the crucible of his own personal experience. Such a gospel lacks power. It lacks the element of vitality. It does not come from the heart. It is only an echo. Men cannot preach above their own spiritual level with any degree of success. Paul had a right to say "my gospel," because he had not only received it from Christ, but had ratified it in his own experience. He knew in whom he believed.

But all these causes of ministerial failure point to one underlying cause, namely: arrested mental and spiritual development. When a man ceases to grow intellectually and spiritually he soon finds himself out of touch with the people and incapable of ministering to their real needs. These are they who pass the "dead line" at forty or fifty and even at an earlier age. It is not so much a matter of age as it is a matter of failing to keep the mind and heart open to all the truth that God is making known to us in this wonderful age, and to keep step with the march of the divine purpose as it is unfolding itself in human history.

No, we think it is not so much "The Old Bucket" which preachers use that is the cause of failure as the contents of that bucket. Too many of us fill our pails away down in the muddy stream of tradition instead of going to the pure fountain of the water of life. We may not ignore the bucket, but we do well to give special heed to where we fill it.

A Journalistic Tendency.

Among the literary tendencies of the present day none is more striking than the development of the weekly paper. However marvelous may be the recent increase in the circulation of novels, and however striking may be the growth of the daily with its enterprise, its zeal for "stories" and "scoops," its colored supplements and the bewildering miscellany of its Sunday edition, still more significant is the growth of the weekly paper. And the development of the weekly is not only more significant than these, but more sane and healthy and permanent. That a piece of commonplace fiction should catch the public fancy and find half a million buyers who read it and talk about it to-day because everybody else is reading and talking about it, and (very wisely) forget it to-morrow, is surely no sign of expanding intelligence. That daily papers should seek—and, more's the pity, find—popularity by exalting trivialities into sensations, by appealing to blind political partisanship, by publishing hasty guesses and superficial estimates as authentic news, is not a flattering commentary on our times. There is no canon of taste or intelligence which the average Sunday edition does not outrage; yet its circulation is always greater than the daily.

But when one turns to the field of weekly secular journalism, an encouraging spectacle is presented in contrast. For many years Harper's Weekly, the London Graphic and the London Illustrated News seemed to supply the entire demand for weekly papers of their high class. Now these are but three among a score of equal magnitude and the immense prosperity which has attended such weeklies as Collier's and the Saturday Evening Post, proves that there is an increasingly numerous public which appreciates genuine artistic and literary merit in a newspaper and can distinguish between enterprise and yellowness. The modern illustrated weekly, commanding the services of the ablest writers and illustrators and exhibiting taste in every feature of its make-up, is as unlike the old weekly with its rehashed news, its copious clippings, its dull type and gray paper, as the metropolitan daily is unlike the cross-roads journal with its patent inside. It is an instrument of civilization, a disseminator of intelligence and a cultivator of public taste. Its popularity indicates one line along which a successful appeal can be made to public favor without encouraging degeneracy.

Has this triumph of the illustrated secular weekly any significance for religious journalism? Yes. A religious paper to be successful must meet two conditions: First, it must secure the favor of a sufficiently large constituency to make it worth while. Its main object is not, of course, to make money, but it must be self-supporting. If it is not, it is a fair sign that it is not keeping in touch as closely as it ought with the people whom it aims to influence. Sir Henry Irving says of the theatre that it must succeed as a business or it will fail as an art. The principle applies to journalism. Second, it must stand for some definite religious ideas, the inculcation of which it believes will be beneficial to men. In other words, it must first get an audience and, second, deliver a message.

Obviously it is at the first of these points that most religious papers fail, relatively if not absolutely. They have a message, more or less true and important, but they do not get the public ear. This means failure, both financial and religious. From the point of view of the publisher, a subscriber is a person who has one, two or three dollars to contribute toward paying expenses and a possible profit. From the point of view of the religious editor, a subscriber is a person to whom the message can be spoken and who can be helped by it. In either capacity he is as indispensable as the printing press. Without him, the continued publication of the paper is, on the one hand, impossible, on the other, useless.

Anyone who is at all acquainted with the field of religious journalism knows that, as a rule, it does not pay expenses. There are probably not half a dozen denominational weeklies in the country which can show an even balance sheet at the end of the year—not to mention profits—and they, with one or two shining exceptions, are the ones which are cheap in price and far cheaper in quality, and which hold their subscribers only by appeals to denominational loyalty. This appeal to denominational loyalty, which assists the survival of many which are otherwise unfit, is the counterpart of the party loyalty which preserves many political papers from merited extinction. To say that the denominational paper does not pay is only to say that it does not reach the people as it should. Now the illustrated secular weekly does pay, because it does reach the people. The question is, Can the religious weekly adopt the same methods for reaching the people, without interfering with the delivery of the message when they have been reached?

It all depends on what the message is, and here differences of opinion arise. There are many truths to be spoken. But is there a message more fundamental and more needed to-day by the religious and the irreligious alike, than this: That religion is not a section of life set apart by itself, but a way of living and of looking at the whole of life; that it is the possession of a truth which furnishes not only a stimulus and a guide to action, but a point of view from which to look at the world, and a scale of values by which to estimate men and events. The religious man of to-day is in the world in a very real sense. He recognizes that he has a place and a duty in politics, in business, in social and educational movements, and he is no less religious in these than in attending the services of the church. This conception of religion as applied to the individual has already won such wide acceptance among thoughtful people that the statement of it seems almost commonplace, though it is far from finding universal application. Why should it not be embodied in the religious paper? Why should not a Christian weekly have as broad a field for its subject-matter as a Christian man has for his interests? If Christianity means looking at life in all its phases from Christ's standpoint, as near as we can get at it, a Christian paper does only a fraction of its duty if it confines its view to theological, ecclesiastical, devotional and evangelistic topics.

There is a well-defined class of journals which are technical in their character and make their appeal only to men of a single craft. The Shoe and Leather Gazette, for example, treats only of shoes and leather and is read only by dealers in leather and shoes. Most religious papers are constructed on a similar principle, as if religion were like a trade which one could work at certain hours in the day or certain days in the week and beyond that his time was his own. Few intelligent people seriously hold to such a view of religion to-day, and with the passing of this conception there passes also the Augustan age of the old-fashioned religious weekly.

In this transition period, those papers which refused to make a readjustment have dwindled and many have died. Some have become the property of denominational societies which support them as organs. Many have put off the evil day by introducing, as a subsidiary feature, brief notes on general current topics, book reviews and an occasional literary article, and this has been explained by saying that the purpose was to make it a "home paper" with "something for every member of the family." As a makeshift, that has done very well, but what is needed now is a thoroughgoing reconstruction of the whole make-up of the religious paper and a frank recognition of the underlying principle—that it is not a question simply of furnishing "something for every member of the family," but of setting forth a conception of religion as involving the whole man and the whole world of human life.

If a religious paper should adopt this as its message, why should it not be able to employ successfully and consistently those methods by which secular papers have won the "seven-day fight"? Such a paper would have to stand ready to compete with the established weeklies, just as these competed with those which were already established when they began. It would live or die on its merits. It would lose the stimulus of denominational pride and could no longer appeal to denominational loyalty to "rally around" it. But it would gain the privilege of exhibiting a practical form of undenominational Christianity, even though the subject of Christian union were seldom mentioned in its columns; and it would be free from the denominational limit which hedges about the circulation of the religious paper of to-day and prevents it from going to those who, if its peculiar message be true, are most in need of it. It would lose the precarious friendship of the man whose continued patronage depends solely on the frequent mention of his name in the paper. But it would gain the space now devoted to such gossip, and the favor of the multitude of sensible people who want the world's news and not the gossip of the cross-roads or puffs of self-important people. It would be less exclusively a paper for the preacher and would appeal more strongly to the layman. Let the preacher have his special periodicals, his theological and ecclesiastical trade-journals; he needs them, but the public does not.

Such an enterprise certainly would not succeed unless it were backed by capital and pushed with genuine journalistic ability. In short, it would not succeed on any terms except those which command success in the general field of journalism. To predict failure as the necessary outcome of such a project, is to say that Christianity does not command the service of first-class brains. It is to ascribe mediocrity and inefficiency to the men who view the world's truths from the standpoint of the eternal truth, and prevailing excellence only to those who know not the verities of God.

The possibility of a religious daily paper has been somewhat generally discussed. We believe in it and hope for it. The daily paper certainly needs some sort of transformation. But the tendencies of our time point to the improved weekly, upon the broader lines here indicated, as the next forward step in religious journalism.

The Contagion of a Good Example.

The generous liberality of Mr. Carnegie in founding so many libraries throughout the country is attracting very general attention and from most persons is receiving the heartiest commendation. It is certainly a remarkable incident in the history of rich men. It is so unlike what we have come to know of rich men's methods. Of course, there have been others besides him who have shown a generous liberality in dispensing their wealth, even before he became prominently identified with the library movement which is associated with his name. But no one in all the past, so far as we remember, has so distinctly placed himself on the side of a great benevolence as Mr. Carnegie has done.

We do not now care to discuss the wisdom or unwisdom of his plan for distributing his wealth. Some will no doubt think that his money might be given to a better cause, but there will always be a difference of judgment with respect to matters of this kind. We are not now concerned with the question that might be made at this point. Our main thought is to impress a lesson which Mr. Carnegie's conduct clearly teaches to all who have a surplus of this world's goods. That lesson is the widespreading influence which benevolent action exerts. While Mr. Carnegie is giving so bountifully it should be remembered that even his generous beneficence must not be measured by simply the amount which he invests in public libraries, nor even by the good that these libraries in themselves may accomplish. A still greater power is exerted by what he is doing. His example has become contagious. Others are unlocking their coffers, and just now there is a remarkable outpouring of wealth in two benevolent channels. Perhaps no other age in the world's history has shown this fact so distinctly as the present. The amount of contributions to benevolent institutions within the last year has never been paralleled in the history of the world. It is estimated that at least $80,000,000 has been given to colleges and universities alone, while large sums of money have been contributed to various charitable institutions.

No doubt the example of Mr. Carnegie and a few other wealthy men such as Dr. Pearson has contributed largely to the development of this marvelously generous outlay. And in this fact we see how a good example is contagious. This is as it should be. Nevertheless it is precisely this side of things that seems to be overlooked by our ethical philosophers. We at once recognize the contagious character of evil. Even diseases are contagious. Why should not good be contagious also? We know that a healthy atmosphere is conducive of good health. We know also that a healthy constitution has by its association a certain amount of power to vitalize other constitutions. This law is everywhere seen in nature. It ought to become prominently recognized in all the affairs of the world. It certainly ought to be strongly emphasized as regards the influence of example.

After all this is only another way of stating a law which was written upon the whole creation at the very beginning. That law was that "everything should produce after its kind." Stated in New Testament phraseology it is as follows: "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." In our judgment the power of Mr. Carnegie's example upon the rich men of the world will be much greater for good than any good, however great it may be, that will come out of the libraries which he has founded or may found. We are glad of this epidemic of giving which seems to have dawned with the closing of the nineteenth century and is just now making itself so decidedly felt at the beginning of the twentieth. Surely we are living in a wonderful age. It really seems that wealth is no longer a thing that can be hoarded without utterly ruining men who use it in this way, while if generously dispensed it becomes a blessing not only to those who receive it from the hands of benefactors, but it is also a great blessing to those who give. And in this respect we are illustrating the saying of the Lord Jesus that "it is more blessed to give than to receive."

Notes and Comments.

"There is not," says Prof. George Fisher, "enough effort in the pulpit to produce an immediate decision on the question, 'Whom will you serve?'" Prof. Fisher is not alone in this belief. It is perfectly certain that in the recent mission many more converts would have been made had the preachers pressed home from the pulpit this question, instead of relegating it to the managers of the inquiry room. In a measure we attribute the great success of the Disciples of Christ in America to the custom of their preachers giving the gospel invitation at the close of each sermon they deliver.—Christian Commonwealth.

No one acquainted with the character of preaching which prevails in this country will question the truthfulness of Prof. Fisher's criticism, that there is "not enough effort in the pulpit to produce an immediate decision on the question, 'Whom will you serve?'" The real end of preaching seems frequently to be lost sight of, namely, the bringing of men to a decision concerning Christ and the building up of Christian life and character in the disciples thus made. No doubt the Commonwealth is right in attributing the success of the Disciples in this country to their custom of pressing the question of a decision home on the minds of their hearers at the close of each sermon. The first thing is to convince men of sin and the next is to press upon them the importance of accepting Christ at once as their Savior. We may have laid too little emphasis upon the first of these points, but not too much upon the last.

One of our well-known preachers, in reporting a meeting recently held by another well-known brother, said, after speaking in flattering terms of his work: "If he would realize that doing a thing half an hour after it was promised does not enable him to do more work and would cease to annoy by tardiness, and would not try to preach two sermons in one service, thus detaining the audience too long, and would be more careful to ask what the audience needs rather than to preach on favorite themes, it would add materially to his success." These criticisms may well be given a wider application than their writer intended and we merely mention them as food for reflection for evangelists and preachers generally. Is it I?

In a recent sermon T. P. Haley voiced the sentiment of most honest people in denouncing the abusive treatment which the Kansas City police gave Mrs. Nation on the occasion of her last visit to that city. The police always exercise their own discretion in determining what constitutes an obstruction of the streets, but the arrest of Mrs. Nation on this ground gave too clear evidence of malice on the part of the police. They were looking for a chance to arrest her. They would have been better pleased if she had smashed something to give them an excuse, but since she did not accommodate them in this respect, they seized upon obstruction of the streets as a pretext. It was a disgraceful procedure, an attempt to wreak vengeance on her in Kansas City for what she had done in Wichita and Topeka.

The government of Peru is said to be anxious to have Harvard University locate an observatory within her borders and Prof. Pickering, Harvard's chief astronomer, is equally anxious to have this plan carried into effect, because there is at present no large telescope in the southern hemisphere and there is much unexplored sky which may be full of "finds." Peru offers to give as much land as is wanted and to allow free entry for all the equipment. This contrasts with Cuba's apparent unwillingness to either grant or sell harbors for naval stations. But then, foreign telescopes are less apt to be dangerous than foreign ships, and Peru doubtless expects to keep the eyes of her invaders so firmly fixed on the heavens that they will not have time to cast a covetous glance on her section of the earth. Cuba might take the hint and preserve her independence by building observatories.

Rev. Judson Smith in the North American Review for May defends the missionaries in China against the criticisms of Mark Twain. His exposition of the case is luminous and convincing. Mark Twain's many admirers regret that he has made such a spectacle of himself. It illustrates the wisdom of a specialist sticking to his specialty—humor in his case. The humorist was so loaded with ignorance about China that even his sprightly spirits could not jump, and he encountered a defeat comparable to that of his own famous shot-weighted jumping frog.

Editor's Easy Chair.

There are two ways of looking upon every question of importance, and it makes all the difference in the world which view we take. There are, for instance, two ways of looking upon the matter of becoming a Christian. One way is to think of it as complying with the regulations which some church has established, accepting its creed and attending with reasonable regularity upon its services. The other way is to think of it as accepting Christ as Savior and Lord from a personal conviction of our need of a Savior and of His ability to save. This view involves a complete surrender of the life to Jesus Christ, to be guided, molded and used by Him. The latter seems to be the original New Testament idea of becoming a Christian. The former was at one time the almost universal idea of becoming a Christian, and still prevails to a large extent. It is easy to see what a vast difference it makes in one's character which one of these views controls him in his religious life. The one makes Christ prominent, lifting Him above all creeds and dogmas and organizations, while the other makes the church the main thing, obscuring Christ and His teaching by its dogmas and traditions. The one looks to a renewed, cleansed and consecrated life; the other involves no radical changes in the aims, plans and pursuits of life. Which one of these views have you accepted and acted upon?

There are two ways of looking at life. One way is to regard it as an opportunity for sensual or physical enjoyment. The person holding this view asks, "How can I get the most enjoyment out of life?" and his idea of enjoyment consists in the indulgence of his lower nature. He covets wealth, social position and power, for the opportunities they offer for gratifying his appetites, his pride and his selfish aims. The other way of regarding life is to look upon it as an opportunity for service; as a period for mental and spiritual development, for self-discipline, for the building up of character, all of which are to be used for the benefit of our fellow men. The man having this view asks, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" "What service can I render that will most honor Thee and elevate my fellow men?" These two views of life issue in very different kinds of character. The one is self-centered, selfish, worldly; the other is self-surrendered, Christ-filled, unselfish, and reflects the beauty of the divine life. This was the life that Jesus Christ lived. He sought neither the world's wealth, nor the world's honor, nor the world's ease, but the world's salvation. "He saved others; Himself He could not save." Which one of these views of life is yours? If the former, why call yourself a Christian? "Why call ye me Lord, and do not the things I command you?" A Christian is one who makes Christ his pattern and strives honestly to follow Him. No other life is properly called a Christian life.

There are two very distinct ways of regarding death. Some people regard it with horror and dismay, and often call in question the goodness of God in permitting it. The grave to them is a symbol of gloom and despair. When their loved ones depart, their names are avoided and everything associated with them, because the mention of them recalls feelings of sadness and gloom. This is the pagan view. There are others who look upon death as the gate-way leading out into the larger and better life. Those who pass through its portals are not dead but alive forevermore. Those who hold this view of death, regarding it as passing out of the mortal into the immortal, out of the corruptible into the incorruptible, while they sorrow for the loss of loved ones, sorrow not as those who have no hope. They speak the names of their loved ones fondly in the family circle, and think and talk of them as having gone on before. This is the Christian view. It is strange, however, what a marvelous hold the pagan view has among professed Christians. Many of our funeral customs tend to foster this gloomy and false view of death which Christ came to banish. Is your view of death pagan or Christian?

Who can look upon the rejuvenated earth, which these glorious May days have crowned with life and beauty, and not feel assured that the God who works in nature and who revives the germs of life of buried seeds and giveth them a body, will not also clothe with forms of immortal beauty and vigor the spirits of His beloved children who once wore the vestments of clay, but who have passed out from them into the unseen? Are not ye of more value, O ye doubting souls, than all the manifold forms of vegetable life which are now putting on their beautiful garments? It must be so! God speaks to us in nature, as in revelation, of that life beyond this vale of tears.

"There is no death; the stars go down
To rise again on some fair shore;
And there, in heaven's jeweled crown,
They shine forever more."

"The New Epoch For Faith"

By JOSEPH F. NEWTON

A new book by the author of "The Christ of To-day" is both a literary and a religious event, and his readers and admirers will find good reason for their appreciation in his latest volume, "The New Epoch for Faith." Our enjoyment of this noble book is increased by the promise of another volume to follow as a sequel, in the near future, upon "'Ultimate Conceptions of Faith' and dealing with the theology that rises out of this day of crisis, freedom and necessity." The breadth of view, the inclusiveness of sympathy, the splendid scholarship, the depth and vigor of thought, the literary power and beauty which mark all the writings of George A. Gordon are here in uncommon richness; and the whole is informed with the tonic of a rational optimism and the enthusiasm of an elevated spirit. The title of the book, "The New Epoch for Faith," which has not been selected without care, and the reputation of the author indicate that it is an interpretation of the religious conditions and influences of this epoch from the point of view of a strong and progressive religious thinker. Unlike "The Gospel for an Age of Doubt," the study commences with an endorsement of the observation that the religious reformation of the last third of the nineteenth century has been more remarkable than that of Luther's time, because it has been a transition, not "from one form of the letter to another," but a "transition from the letter to the spirit." If it is true, as history and experience seem to teach, that an exacting and exaggerated emphasis upon the forms of religion is always symptomatic of a decline of faith in the spirit of religion, we may interpret the modern unconcern about the details of faiths and forms as an evidence of a deeper and more reverent concern for the ultimate truth of the living God. Thus we find that we live in an age

> "Whose faith hath center everywhere,
> Nor cares to fix itself in form."

Every preacher should read the opening chapter in which the eternal realities of religion are assumed to be in accord with the universal intuition and right reason of humanity. Among the "Things Assumed" as a basis for the study of the religious significance of modern thought are: that the religious view of the universe is true; that the eternal is present in human life; that the divine will works for ends; that the progress of man onward and upward is real; that the finite world of man has enduring worth and is not simply a passing phase of the Eternal Existence as affirmed by Pantheistic Philosophy. The fundamental ideas of religious faith are found to be of the same origin and order as the basic premise of science—the reality of the external world. Their reality for man is discovered by their own light as they stand in the service of human life. "God is not reached as the last conclusion of the intellect from premises that exclude him. No logical flight of stairs can convey the mind from a godless earth to anything other than a godless heaven."

Assuming this great background of universal principle which gives dignity and amplitude to human life, we are led to contemplate the immanence of God in the advent and evolution of humanity as revealed in the mighty movements and characters of the last century. If human freedom was the central message of the old century, human fraternity will be the keynote of the new century. This growth of pity and of love is recorded in the life, literature and legislation of our age, in the political independence, the intellectual hospitality, the social sympathy and service for which our generation is distinguished. Naturally this enthusiasm for humanity leads to a "new appreciation of Christianity." This fruitful and inspiring acceptance of the religion of Jesus is manifested in the disintegration of old orthodoxies and the vanishing of old heterodoxies. For this emancipation from dogmatism, both liberal and orthodox, we are indebted to "the Discipline of Doubt." Formerly doubt was looked upon as something to be overcome by force, essentially dishonest, a mean logical strategy, a sign of weakness and perversity; but the persistence of doubt upon the great issues of life and its services to faith in the elimination of superstition and the reorganization of knowledge have given honest doubt a place of honor in the temple of religious thought. An interesting study of the presence of doubt in the great system of historic theology, from the profound and anxious questioning in the apostolic age to the tormenting uncertainty of the best minds of Puritanism concerning their own election, is followed by an instructive analysis of the different phases of modern doubt. Scientific, sentimental and philosophic doubt are described and discussed with abundant insight and eloquence. The pathos and nobility of modern doubt may be seen in the statement of its causes. (1) The desperate inequality between the intellectual ideal and the intellectual achievement of mankind. (2) The seeming conflict between the ethical ideal of man and the great order of the world. (3) The failure of the negative mood to look through humanity up to "the human life of God" and the sad sincerity with which its advocates wrought for the education and elevation of the race.

The "Return of Faith" is attributed to the natural resurgence of conscious religious need, due to the fact that man is essentially a religious being and to the law of action and reaction by which one exhausted mood is succeeded by its opposite. Growing weary of the barren waste of agnosticism, the modern mind "came to itself" and returned to pastures that are green with hope and to waters that are still with the peace of the eternal. Fortunately we had a "New Help from History" in this return to the faith of humanity. The appeal to history has revealed the spiritual value of humor—the sense of perspective and the sense of incongruity. History is also a revelation of divinity and of humanity. Religion is found to be instructive and universal. History shows that the highest instincts and aspirations of humanity always point to eternal truth. "History implies that the progressive rise in the character of religious conception is the result of the pressure of the Infinite upon the spiritual nature of man;" that universal human experience attests the reality of religion; that the religious instinct is an elemental influence in the evolution of man; that religion is the supreme interest of human existence.

The book closes with a chapter on "Things Expected." Experience justifies expectation. Here the optimism of the author finds its noblest expression. It is expected that the sense of humanity will envelop all human interests and activities, and among them the faith and forms of religion; that the humanity of Jesus will become more and more controlling in all thinking about the character of God and the nature and destiny of man; that the idea of human life in this world as an education will take the place of the idea of probation; that an ethical view of life of the utmost vigor, combined with an unrestricted life for man, will more and more dominate the Christian mind; that the fundamental assumption of religion will find progressive verification in the future experience of mankind; that all the contradictions of human hope will prove but mightier fulfillments of its expectations.

Perhaps it is impossible for any individual to give an exhaustive account or an adequate estimate of the intellectual situation of any epoch, but this noble thinker and keen observer has seen and said enough to show us that the currents of modern religious thought are moving away from "The Age of Doubt" toward a freer, fuller and more confident faith in the eternal verity of religion. If our era is not "The Age of Faith" it is at least "The New Epoch for Faith." Without doubt Dr. Gordon has given us the deepest interpretation of the religious significance of modern life.

III. The Junior Tree.

It was an unwritten law that if the Juniors, after planting their tree on the campus, could keep it in the ground three nights, the Freshmen must hold it inviolable. If, however, the Freshmen could, by force or stratagem, secure hand-hold on that tree within the limit, they might do with it what they liked. Since that tree was necessary for the class-day exercises at graduation the Juniors always made heroic efforts to defend it; and since the glory to the Freshies was great whenever they could pull up the sapling, they, in turn, made heroic efforts to destroy it.

Naturally the Junior class was almost always much smaller than the Freshman, and naturally, therefore, the Juniors had to resort usually to artifice, rather than brute force, to win their fight. Great were the campaigns planned and carried out in that little realm of war. Many were the advances and retreats, feints, flankings, and disasters. Great was the expenditure of muscle and brain-power, and great, let us hope, the development of manhood.

Traditions were many as to triumphs and defeats in the heroic days of old, and as to the shrewd means employed by either side to accomplish its purposes. Once a stalwart band of Juniors, twenty strong, but equal to forty, had encamped the three days and nights about their sacred emblem, eating food brought from the boarding-halls, and by sheer force repelling charge after charge of swarming Fresh. Once the tree had been planted under a pile of rail-fencing, left by workmen for a few days on the campus, and had remained undisturbed the necessary length of time. Once again, in early spring, a dead sapling that had proved too puny for the winter blasts was rooted up, and a new tree planted in its place; that night snow fell, the marks of digging were covered, and the innocent-looking tree, on the third day, waved its triumphant head, and was garlanded with bunting, flags, and mottoes, to the huge chagrin of Freshmandom.

These experiences of the ancient days furnished ideas for the days of Alphy Barton, and, of course, it was the part of the Freshmen to take all possible precautions. The class was organized about March, squads selected for every duty, each tree on the campus was thoroughly examined and marked, each foot of ground platted, mapped, and closely watched. Sometimes for a week at a time, when Juniors were thought to be active, Freshmen patrolled the campus all night long.

It was in the spring of their Freshman year when the maneuvering had been going forward for some time, and no progress was being made, that Chuffy Waite, Buck Elmer, and some others, thought to vary their monotony and shake off their spring fever with a lark at the expense of Alphy Barton. Accordingly a coon hunt was organized—"Even Alphy wouldn't bite at a snipe hunt," said Chuffy,—and a glorious moonlight night it was.

Marvelous were the yarns narrated as the men sat on the top rail of a fence far up on a noble hill, smoking their pipes, and expectorating at the tails of their uneasy dogs. Far beneath them thin lines of village smoke, whitened by the moonlight, hung like cobwebs from heaven down to earth. The old college turrets, Gothically grand, loomed up from the shoulder of the hill at the right. The clear stream, full from melted snows, wound round the whole scene like a zone of silver. The West Virginia night seemed trying herself, and she conquered all that little circle of men.

At last Alphy Barton, who had been mildly wondering at the inaction, exclaimed,

"Well, fellows, this is fine, but it isn't coon hunting. Why don't we hunt?"

"Just like you, Alphy," said Chuffy. "Haven't you ever hunted coons before? Don't you know they won't stir out in the moonlight?"

"Oh!" said Alphy, not particularly ashamed, but as if musing whether his other coon hunt had been in darkness or moonlight.

"We must wait t-t-till the moon sets," added Buck.

Alphy looked at the moon sailing far above the valley and said:

"She's pretty high."

"O, no, she'll drop fast in a little while," said "Judge" Storey, puffing calmly at his pipe.

"Tell you, boys," said Chuffy Waite, as though "stung by the splendor of" a sudden thought, "We might scatter, each with one of the dogs, and see if we can't start a trail, so as to be ready as soon as the moon's gone."

"To be sure," said Buck. "S-s-save time. But one of us ought to stay here, for there's always a coon coming to drink at that spring there. I see tracks every time I come here."

"Well, Alphy, you stay. But I'll tell you, old man, you ought to hide yourself. See if you can swing up into that tree. Good. That'll do."

"Come on boys, let's scatter now," said "Judge," yawning himself off the fence.

"Here," called Alphy, from amongst thick green leaves, "aren't you goin' to leave me a dog?"

"O, to be sure," said Chuffy as though he had forgotten, "I'll leave Bull with you."

"O not that surly brute," said Alphy. "He's no good hunter."

"Why he's the best coon dog in the lot," said Chuffy injuredly. "Poor old fellow! Does he malign my Bully!" The ferocious creature wagged his stump and then snarled.

"Well, all right then," called Barton, and Waite brought his bull-dog to the foot of the tree, showed him Alphy's trail on the ground and bark, and whispered one word in his ear. Then "Good-bye, Alphy." The dog sat down with upturned nose, and seemed made of stone. A yoke of oxen, apparently, could not have moved him.

How long Alphy sat there before attempting to descend nobody has ever learned, for no coons were started that night when the moon went down, so far as anybody knows. How many times he made ineffectual attempts to come down, only to be met by that snarling dog, how many oaths he swore and pipes he smoked, and thoughts he thought, he has never told the world.

Two Juniors paused under that same tree near midnight, and one said:

"Whose bulldog?"

"Chuffy Waite's, I think. What's he got up that tree?"

"I can't see. Here Bull, here Bull." But the dog budged not.

"Well, he'll never worry us, that's evident," said one.

"Here's the sapling, Tom," said the other. "Isn't it a little beauty? Sugar maple. It's just about the height of the hay-stack."

"Right you are, old man. Now fall to." And the spades struck gravel.

Alphy feared that his heart would also be heard striking something, but he swallowed it deep as he could. Soon the talking ceased, and Andrew Jackson Putnam Barton smiled, crossed his legs as comfortably as possible and filled a new pipe.

Chapel bell rang, and at roll call, Chuffy was compelled to answer "Present," at the name of Andrew Barton. Coming down the stairway afterwards, he laughed as he said to Buck Elmer,

"What'll you give me now for my Bull?"

"Any p-p-price you ask. He's a jewel."

Chuffy soon stood under the tree by the spring and said, "Bull, where's Alphy? Why, what in—? What're you doing there?"

"Smoking," said Alphy. "Is it chapel time? Come on, let's go."

Chuffy pshawed and swore tremendously about the dog's mistake; but Alphy only smiled. As they turned to start down the hill, the latter said:

"Wait, Chuffy. Here's something that may interest you," pointing to the hole where the tree had been.

"What is it?" asked Waite. "Who's been here?"

"Juniors."

"Juniors! Get their tree? Did they plant it?" he gasped.

Alphy nodded and said nothing.

"Where?"

"I think I know."

"O, Alphy, your luck! Dear old boy! I'll make you a present of Bull!"

"No, thank you," replied Alphy.

"Where'd they plant, d'you think?"

"I'll show you to-night. Let's be awfully still to-day."

They did their best; but mysterious whisperings among the Freshmen showed the Juniors toward night that something was wrong, and their secret was not safe. Barton slept nearly all day; and when, at seven P. M. he awoke, he found his room full of smoke and Freshmen, and heard his room-mate, Chuffy, declaring:

"I tell you, Alphy's off. They haven't planted it. I'll bet he dreamed, up in that tree."

Alphy stretched and got up, but said nothing. He doused his head with cold water, and listened to innumerable questions. Finally, in response to the reproaches that he ought to be loyal enough to tell, he only replied,

"No. If I tell, we'll all betray that we know where it is, and will put them on their guard. They're nearly or quite as strong as we are, and we might not win in a straight fight."

"That's right," said Buck, who was captain of all military operations of the class. "Alphy's right. It's best for only him to know, unless we find that we have to fight for it. Besides, he found it out, and ought to have the glory."

"No. No. It's not that," said Alphy, and everybody knew him sincere. "Not that, but just to do our best to win. Besides, I'm not absolutely certain that I know, and," glancing at Chuffy, "I don't want to make a bull of it."

There was a roar of laughter at Alphy's attempt to joke—the first and last of his life.

It was agreed that the whole force should march at 10 o'clock to the campus, determined to scour it from end to end if necessary to clear it of its interloping shrubbery. They were all to stay close by Buck Elmer, save Alphy, who had license to roam at will. Old clothes and slouch hats were the order. Some wore padding and bandages over knees and elbows.

The Juniors were on the alert, and soon got wind of this reconnaissance in force. Both classes, therefore, in battle array, appeared upon the campus chessboard. There was marching and countermarching, eyeing and threatening. Wherever the Freshmen carried their line, the Juniors followed or had preceded. It was noted that Alphy Barton often drifted along alone, quietly smoking a cigar; but no particular suspicion was aroused, as Alphy was known to have an absent way of his own.

At last, as the two hostile forces edged round towards the President's gate, the whisperings and nervousness in the Junior ranks betrayed to the Freshies that the hunt was warm. Alphy had made a flank movement and now stood, with hands behind him, ten feet away from a small stack of last autumn's hay, made from the campus grass, and not yet used. He had observed that this stack seemed a little taller than the sapling he had seen in the moonlight. He had also detected the aroused suspicion of the Juniors as he approached it.

Suddenly, his cigar bitten tight in his teeth, he made a dash for the hay, and scattering it as best he could, grasped at the branches of the little maple within. But instantly four powerful hands that had known the football tackle, hurled him twenty feet away; and instantly a cordon of Junior warriors was drawn about the little stack, and the precious treasure it contained.

The Freshmen held a council of war, and, upon Barton's advice, it was decided to carry the citadel by storm if possible. "If not," said he, "then I have a last resort ready," and he puffed calmly away at his cigar.

Once, twice, thrice, the attack was made. Splendidly did the solid wedge batter at the stubborn band. Muscle and brain were being made for the great civil strife that was soon to split the nation. But there stood the dark group of Juniors unconquered; some bruised, some bleeding, but unconquered all.

"One last charge, eh, Buck?" said Alphy, as he puffed his cigar alight, and drew a small package from his pocket.

"Forward!" shouted Buck, and led the assault again. Alphy walked quietly after, adjusting the fuse. He lit it while the fight was fast, then, waiting till the fuse burned to within a quarter of an inch of the package, he tossed it over the struggling heads, within the circle, and into the hay.

A puff of flame, and of white smoke, a slight explosion—then the burning hay fell all around, disclosing the little tree in a circle of fire.

The Juniors ceased all effort and stood aghast, one instant only off guard. But it was enough. With a wonderful leap, Alphy cleared the cordon of defenders, dashed through the burning hay, tore the class-tree from the ground, and raced down the campus with the rout at his heels.

Next morning, for an hour, Alphy was carried on the shoulders of his class, up and down the corridor, with serious face, bearing aloft the Junior tree. When the Freshmen went into chapel, each displayed a sprig of maple in his coat, which sprigs many of them keep to this day. They also keep the memory of Alphy's coon-hunt.

Calcutta Letter

BY W. M. FORREST.

The government of India is in full flight from the capital. Does that sound startling? Well, it creates no surprise here, for it is a thing of annual occurrence. The enemy that is driving it out is not the Russians, but merely the heat. Every year it takes its departure from Calcutta by the first of April, and does not venture back until the first of November. It goes from the steaming heat of Bengal, hundreds of miles to the northwest, to Simla. There at an elevation of some seven thousand feet above sea level, it refreshes itself and prosecutes its work, while the breeze from the perpetual snows of the Himalayas keeps it cool and healthful.

Think of what it means for a country to maintain a summer and a winter capital. It is as though the United States should have the residences and great public buildings of Washington duplicated in some city in the Rockies, and should transport its hundreds of officials and clerks, together with their families, thither. India pays the expenses of conveying its hundreds of government employes and their families to Simla every spring, and back to Calcutta every fall.

This army is heartily glad to run away, for the enemy that drives it forth is a most relentless foe. During these closing days of March the town has been glowing like a furnace wherever the mid-day sun falls. And even in the shade of a broad verandah the thermometer has ranged above ninety. The large fans that are suspended from the ceiling of houses, and kept in motion by the "punkah wallas," have been endeavoring to keep people cool for several weeks. I have not found the heat very trying as yet. But through April and May the city will glow like a furnace, and during the rainy season which follows, it will steam like a Turkish bath. Men will go about dripping with perspiration and gasping for breath. Women will grow wan and languid. And the children of the poor Europeans who are doomed to remain here will have the faces of dead children, as they drag themselves listlessly about in the morning and evening hours, or lie prostrate and suffer during the heat of the day.

The government employes are fortunate to get away from all this with their families. And this year they will be doubly glad to go on account of the ravages of smallpox and bubonic plague. The former has been unusually bad all winter, and the latter has increased at an alarming rate during this month. An American city would be driven wild if it knew that a fatal pestilence was working through it at the rate of perhaps one hundred and fifty new cases a day. All schools would be closed, all public meetings adjourned, all business paralyzed, and everybody who could would flee the city. But here everything goes on as usual. One reads of a motion introduced into the city council looking toward some special sanitary measures that come to naught because it was discovered that there was not a quorum present! A man feels a little queer, perhaps, when the native clerk who shared his desk in office fails to appear one day, and it is told the next day that he has died of plague. And a woman is rather alarmed when she hears that the dread disease is in the hut where the nurse lives who looks after her child.

Or, again, when one reads in the morning paper that four men have died of plague in a hut within a stone's throw of his own house, and next door to the school where his little girl goes daily, it seems to bring the matter rather close home. All this is so far from being merely a fancy sketch that one of the gentlemen in our own boarding house reported to us the death of his deskmate from the prevailing infection; one of the nurses employed here was said to have the malady in her hut, and only three days later she herself was dead and buried, and only this morning we heard of the cases and deaths a short distance from this house. We realize how true it is that "no one liveth to himself;" what affects any man is of interest to all. In the crowded native district where I carry on my work, one continually meets men hurrying along with dead bodies lying on the low cots whereon they died. Mohammedans are covered with a pall that hangs down over the sides of the cot, Hindus are swathed in a cloth which but imperfectly covers the emaciated forms; the former go west to their burial ground, the latter flow past them to their burning ghats on the river bank. "Man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets." But, for the most part, it is all regarded as something that belongs to India and cannot be helped. The Europeans do what they can to help the wretched natives, and console themselves with the thought that plague seldom advances against the cleanliness and sanitation of the white man's home.

The annual financial statement and budget of the government of India has recently appeared. It shows some interesting facts and figures. Despite the fact that money has been poured out like water for famine relief, the fiscal year has closed with a surplus of a million and a half sterling. No inconsiderable part of this handsome balance is due to the government of India having loaned England the large Indian contingents despatched to South Africa and China, and so being relieved from paying them. But this profit from war is not to be an unmixed blessing to India. It is claimed that a re-armament of forces is made expedient by the lessons learned in South Africa. Hence it is proposed to make a military expenditure of sixteen million pounds this year, as against fourteen million pounds for each of the two preceding years. The total expenditures by the government for the past year were 73,525,600 pounds; while the estimated expense for the coming year is 71,501,000 pounds.

For railway construction there was an expenditure of 83,075,000 rupees (a rupee is about one-third of our dollar) and for irrigation, 9,008,000 rupees. For famine relief there was an outlay of 139,995,000 rupees. When it is remembered that a native can be kept alive on about four cents a day, it will be appreciated how many were aided by this money. Besides this direct government expenditure, vast sums were sent into the country from all over the civilized world. Moreover, the end is not yet, for continual grants are demanded for districts that are still suffering beyond their power of recuperation. In its efforts to mitigate the multiplied miseries of its famine-stricken subjects, the government seems to be above reproach.

Glancing at the economic situation of the land, it is remarked that there is a serious depression in the three important industries of tea, cotton, and indigo. The difficulty in the indigo trade is due to competition with a cheap foreign chemical product. The tea industry is apparently suffering from over-production. The cotton manufacturing interests are, by far, the most important in the country. They have been depressed for more than two years. It is thought that only a general improvement in the factories, and a consequent output of higher grade materials, can lead to a revival of the trade. India is predominantly an agricultural country; hence the unprecedented famine of the last season has well-nigh ruined everything. But, driven by their stern necessities, the swarming and frugal population labors so diligently on every foot of available land that India can make a comparatively rapid recovery from its economic downfall. When this great land, with its 300,000,000 people, becomes generally civilized and has its enormous agricultural and mineral resources developed, its annual financial statements will assume vaster proportions.

The Calcutta colleges are conducting their final examinations, and will soon close for their summer vacation. Many students have already left the city. My work is nearly over for the season. I shall soon take my family and follow the good example set us by the Viceroy and the government. But instead of fleeing to Simla, we shall go to Landour—a much less pretentious but equally cool and healthful resort.

What Most Interests Me Now.

By J. S. Lamar.

IX. The Mystery of Sin.

We now come to something that every serious and thoughtful mind must have deeply pondered. And respecting this, perhaps very few persons have reached an entirely satisfactory conclusion. In most cases much is left out, unexplained and inexplicable, and men are happy if they have come to a sort of working result, or so to speak, modus vivendi—something in which mind and heart can quietly rest for the present, trusting that hereafter the inscrutable will be revealed and the darkness give place to the light.

As already intimated, we must not think for a moment that God is the author of sin, or that he approves of it, or stands related to it otherwise than in positive disallowance and direct antagonism. Possibly, to some extent, this is concealed from our view by the fact that the Scriptures often speak of it, as indeed I am now doing, as though it were a thing apart—a something with an abstract and separate existence. The apostle even ascribes to it attributes of personality: it is a "body"—it is "deceitful"—it "rules" and "reigns"—it may be "loved," or "feared," or "served." The term may thus convey, with more or less distinctness and fullness, the Miltonic conception of a real person; a conception which I believe is wholly absent from the words "transgression" and "disobedience," though these together may express all that we mean by "sin." I do not for a moment pretend that these terms exhaust all that may be involved in sin, but I do say that when construed with the divine law, they constitute the scriptural definition of it—and are abundantly sufficient to show how impossible it is for God, consistently with his nature and authority, to do other than hate and condemn it. And yet from the beginning of the human race till now, it has been in all the world. Notwithstanding the absolute purity and holiness and wisdom and knowledge and power of God, he permitted it to enter in and he has permitted it to remain. This is a much deeper mystery than that which shrouds the ordinary providences which often seem so dark to us. Many of these very speedily show, in the partial development of their consequences, the blessing that is in them and what may be expected in the season of their full fruitage. And then everywhere in history we can see in their final outworking the good that was in things evil. Hence we are always able to believe that behind the providential clouds which overshadow us the bright sun is shining. But sin is different. Wrong cannot bring forth right; corruption cannot give birth to purity; sin, even when it is finished, cannot bring forth life. I am well aware that in seeking to account for the presence and universal prevalence of sin, many wise and reverent men have held and do hold that the devil, impersonated in the serpent in the garden, contrived to interfere with the eternal purpose of the Allwise God, by inducing our first parents to sin, and thereby introducing into their nature an element of corruption which was not there before—an element which speedily pervaded their whole nature, both mental and physical, rendering it "totally depraved and corrupt in every faculty and part of soul and body." This view of the subject is so inwrought into the literature and thought and worship of the Christian world, and is so universally recognized as orthodox, that it is not likely to be soon displaced. For myself, however, I do not think it properly represents the facts in the case, either those of human nature or of biblical teaching. But I shall not here elaborately discuss the subject, and must content myself with a brief presentation of what in my own judgment is a better view. Let me call attention, then, to the following points:

1. That in the history of the first sin, or the "fall" as it is called, no intimation is given that its commission had any such reactive effect as is attributed to it.

2. That the supposed resulting "depravity" which is assumed to be the cause of all other human sins could not have caused that sin—being at the time nonexistent.

3. That the apostle, in attributing the seat and cause of his warfare against sin to his flesh, to the motions of sin in his members, to the lusts of his flesh, really occupies the same ground which I attempted to occupy in accounting for the struggle of the undepraved Eve against sin.

4. That from the first the moral trouble always has sprung from the same source, namely, not the preternatural and corrupt, but the natural animal being, just as God made it.

5. That we may suppose, upon general principles, that the resisting power of the human spirit has been enfeebled, and the strength of the animal appetites and passions increased, by the hereditary transmission of ancestral habits and tendencies; still, the controlling fact is that no human being has ever yielded more readily and weakly than did Adam and Eve.

Of course, the number of these points might be enlarged, but these will suffice to show the ground of my contention—that from the beginning till now, human sin has always resulted from the conjunction in man of two opposing natures, the animal and the spiritual—a result which is unnatural to them both, and to one of them impossible. I put it thus because in some remote time in the eternal past we are taught that angels did sin, and hence it is within possibility to conceive that a purely spiritual nature might sin, though it is unnatural and altogether abnormal—but an earthy, animal nature, having no moral or spiritual faculty, can not be brought under moral obligation, and hence cannot sin. Speaking generally, the one nature is above it, the other, below it. It may be inexplicably mysterious to us why the Infinite Wisdom and Goodness, with perfect foreknowledge of the consequences, should have decided to create man with these two opposing natures. But I can and I do most reverently believe—not simply, as theologians say, that it was better to create thus than not to create at all, for that is really not the question, as he might have created in some other way,—but I believe that this was the very best of all possible ways, the absolutely best; that this creation was the darling of his heart, to which he had looked forward from all eternity, and toward which he had moved through all antecedent creations. This moral antagonism of forces in humanity—whether we understand it or not—is destined, like the centripetal and centrifugal forces of the Solar System, to result in the most perfect orbital movement, and a harmony of spherical music that shall be without one discordant note. Here and now we are but tuning our harps for the music of the spiritual sphere, and already we begin to see that the struggle of the spirit against the fleshly appetites and passions is developing it into grander and more Godlike proportions. Let it not be said, then, that God is the author of sin. He hates it, he forbids it, he condemns it, and yet he so made us that, in opposition to his will and to the promptings of our own better nature and highest happiness, we all do sin, and he knew beforehand that we would. He so made us because he saw and knew that, though we might often yield and suffer for it, the agonizing struggle would be good for us. On the other hand those that refuse to strive against it, but basely yield themselves to the degrading slavery of the flesh, are lost and, without a special interposition to rescue them, lost forever.

This, therefore, is but another exemplification of the truth of the text already quoted: "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord." We, in our short-sighted wisdom, would fain have man without fleshly lusts, above the reach of temptation and the liability to sin, and so have deprived the world of its highest revelation and greatest glory in the coming of God as our Savior in the person of Jesus Christ. Man, too, in this case, would have remained innocent, harmless, unperturbed and ignorant—ignorant of himself—of his latent capacities and undeveloped powers—and ignorant also of the pity and forbearance, the infinite condescension and love, and the boundless wisdom and power of his Creator.

It follows, then, that the conflict between flesh and spirit, notwithstanding its awful consequences, was wisely and benevolently predetermined and fixed upon by the Divine Mind as absolutely best. Only thus can the truest, manliest, most positive and Godlike virtues be developed. Man will be certain to yield and to fall, it is true, but still it is best to make him free, and make him fight. However enslaved he may become, however low he may sink in corruption and sin, he cannot get out of his Maker's sight—beyond the sphere of his Maker's love—beyond the reach of his Maker's arm. And in due time he will come to him to reclaim and to save, to pardon, to uplift and to glorify.

How the Church Divided

By W. J. WRIGHT

1. The church was originally a unit. In the history of the church there was a time when sects and denominations were unknown. So accustomed are we to both of them that we can scarce imagine any other condition in the church. Yet the earliest mention of this divine institution and its earliest history reveal it as a harmonious unit laboring for the glory of God in the edification of the saint and the conversion of the sinner. The church is first mentioned by name in Matt. 16:18 in this language, "Upon this rock I will build my church." This language of our Master implies the unity of the church. He used the singular number, but we cannot faithfully represent the modern aspects of Christianity without using the plural number. We are compelled to think and speak of Methodist, Presbyterian, Lutheran and other churches, and these designations represent divisions in the church of Christ. In Paul's letter on Christian unity, Ephesians, he tells us that there is one body, 4:4, and in 1:22 he tells us that the church is that one body. In the two chapters just cited, the church is represented under the figure of a human body, in which Jesus Christ is the head, 1:22 and 4:15, and the church the body. That one head and one body are found united throughout all the orderly course of nature goes without the saying. The perfect harmony and co-operation of all the parts of the body should teach us the perfect unity which our Master impressed upon his spiritual body, the church.

2. It was the will of Jesus Christ that his church should ever remain united. In the New Testament the church is variously represented as a body, bride, family, etc. Every such figure is robbed of a portion of its meaning by the divisions in the church, thus confounding the wisdom of God with the folly of man. Jesus said: "There shall be one flock, one shepherd." He is the one shepherd and the church the flock which he meant should be one. For the unity of this flock he prays, see John 17:11, 20-23, "That they may be one, even as we are"; and "That they may all be one; even as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee." . . . "That they may be one, even as we are one." "That the world may believe that thou didst send me." Paul, speaking for the Lord, commanded that all men who caused division in the church should be marked as disturbers and withdrawn from. He said that to glory in men or in divisions was a certain mark of carnality. He beseeches men by the authority of the Lord Jesus that they "All speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfected together in the same mind and in the same judgment." He who would seek justification for the divisions in the church must look elsewhere than in the Bible.

3. But the church is divided. Sing though she does,

"We are not divided, all one body we,
One in hope and doctrine, one in charity."

Her divisions are everywhere apparent; moreover they are numerous, persistent, foolish, unscriptural, inexcusable. The census of 1890 gave proof that in this country about 150 divisions calling themselves "denominations" exist in the "one body," the church of Christ. Should we carry our investigation to all lands, it is said that we would find not less than 600 such divisions or denominations, which, however, should be known as "sects." These sects exist not simply in the so-called Christian lands, but have been exported in our foreign missionary activity to heathen lands, where in seeking to perpetuate themselves, they are a serious obstacle to the conversion of the heathen. "That they may all be one, that the world may believe that thou didst send me," acquires new force and meaning on the mission fields.

4. How the church divided. The story of her division is a long one, embracing a large part of her history, and cannot be related in detail without writing many volumes. Enough, however, can be told in a few paragraphs to give one an idea of the process, though for a full understanding of the subject one must read widely in church history and compare all with the writings called the New Testament.

All the divisions in the church have been brought about by men departing from the "simplicity and purity that is in Christ;" most of them by men erecting false standards of faith, and imposing on their fellow men unscriptural tests of fellowship. To the simple faith of the apostolic church, additions were made from Judaism, philosophy and heathenism; and from this simple, original faith subtractions were made, so that a corrupt and emasculated gospel was presented for the acceptance of the people. Against such corruption and departure, some good men have ever protested, and these protestants have invariably been cast off from the body which they have sought to reform, and thus another division has been made in the church.

At either end of her history one can discover the tendencies which result in divisions. Look for instance in the first chapter of First Corinthians. Instead of the Corinthians "looking unto Jesus, the author and perfecter of their faith"; instead of seeing "no man save Jesus only"; instead of considering Paul, Apollos and Peter nothing, and Christ "all in all," they were glorying in these men and were at the point of division. Thus the church has sometimes divided by making too much of a man.

Distinct divisions in the church can be traced back to about the second century of the Christian era. By this time the simple faith of the apostolic church had been corrupted by speculations and by importations from heathenism. It was believed necessary to erect safeguards against such corruption, and one of the proposed protective agencies was the general adoption of a "rule of faith" as a means for the detection of heresy. When this rule of faith was drawn up there were numerous persons in the church who could not subscribe to it. The result was that they were forced out from the main body of the church. The rule had been adopted to preserve unity, but it resulted in division. This is the history of all such tests of faith; their purpose was unity, their product division. Moreover, it has sometimes been the case that those thrust out were as pure as or even purer in faith than those who remained within.

Early in church history there was made the unscriptural division of the church into "clergy" and "laity"; then came the increased authority of the bishops who soon put forward the claim of being successors to the apostles. Those who would not admit these claims were counted heretics, and ere long, all such were punished.

As often as it was thought necessary, the leading spirits in the main body came together to settle such questions as arose in the church. These great gatherings were called "councils" and generally made a creed to which all must subscribe or leave the church. There were always numerous dissenters. Sometimes these were brought into line by such arguments as the thumbscrew, rack, dungeon and wheel; sometimes these failed and the sword, stake or gallows were used; sometimes the heretics were banished, while again they were excommunicated and permitted to live at home where they were victims of petty persecutions. It is almost a safe assertion that every new council and creed resulted in one or more new divisions.

Some of the existing divisions in the church have come out of efforts to reform certain corruptions and abuses in the church. This is true not only of the great body of Christians known as Protestants, but also of various divisions among them. No religious body has ever desired its own reformation. The leaders of the opposition are always the priesthood who perceive that their craft is in danger (Acts 19:27.)

Martin Luther, a Roman Catholic monk, undertook the reformation of his church as the result of his study of the New Testament. Soon he nailed to the door of the church where he preached 95 propositions which he expressed his willingness to defend against all dissenters. These propositions dealt with false doctrines and corrupt practices in the Roman Catholic Church. The church did not wish reformation and as a body would not tolerate it. Martin Luther and his followers were thrust out of the church, and there was another division.

The work of division continued among these reformers; they separated because they did not agree about the Lord's Supper, the manner and extent of the atonement, the sovereignty of God and numerous other non-essentials which were made tests of fellowship.

The Methodist Church came out of the efforts of John Wesley to reform the Established Church of England, or the Episcopal Church. Finding himself unable to carry on his work of reform as a member of that communion, his efforts to carry it on from without resulted in another division called Methodists, who in turn have divided many times about matters of doctrine, polity, expediency, governments and political issues. In America they separated on the issue of slavery, those favoring that institution becoming the Southern Methodists, whose separate organization is kept up despite the fact that slavery is no longer an issue either within or without the church.

The Presbyterians have divided on such questions as the kind of hymns to be sung in worship, the authority of elders, slavery, oaths required of public officials, and the amount of education necessary in order to be ordained a minister of the gospel.

In addition to dividing on some of the foregoing issues, the Baptists have divided about the freedom of the human will, the communion, the observance of the seventh day as Sabbath, missionary societies, missionary enterprise, and the "decrees of God."

Rarely has a division in the church involved any of the essentials of Christianity. Generally both the parent body and the offshoot have held vital faith in the Messiahship, Lordship and Sonship of Jesus of Nazareth. These divisions have been brought about and are perpetuated by men assuming authority where they have none, and arrogating to themselves the prerogatives of lord and judge, adding to what our Master requires of a man in order to his becoming a Christian, and making unscriptural tests of fellowship; they have been brought about by intolerance displacing the love which covers imperfections; by the prince of this world displacing the Prince of Peace; by men aiming at uniformity rather than unity; by the use of men's plans instead of God's, and by the church rejecting men whom the Lord receives. Thus has the church divided. How and when shall it reunite?

Washington, D. C.

American Christian Education Society.

By F. D. Power.

The committee appointed by the general convention of the American Christian Missionary Society at Kansas City in October last "to formulate a plan of organization for an educational society among the Disciples of Christ," and authorized to report to a special convention called for that purpose, "either in connection with the next annual convention of the A. C. M. S., or with the Congress of Disciples in 1901," submitted their report at such a meeting during the recent Congress at Lexington, Ky. They recommended that the convention proceed to organize "The American Christian Education Society," and submitted the following constitution, which was unanimously adopted:

Article I. This society shall be called the American Christian Education Society.

Article II. The object of this society shall be the promotion of Christian education among the Disciples of Christ by aiding collegiate institutions, academies, and other schools in which children and youth are trained under Christian teachers; by assisting needy young men and women of piety and ability in acquiring an education for the gospel ministry and the mission field; and by the employment of any kindred agencies which may be deemed desirable to further the cause of education.

Article III. The members of this society shall be life members and annual members. Those contributing $10 a year for five years to the work of this society shall be constituted life members, and those contributing $5 a year shall be annual members. Any church among the Disciples of Christ which has within the year contributed to the funds of the society may appoint one delegate to the annual meeting of the society.

Article IV. The annual meeting of the society shall be on a day agreed upon in connection with the annual Congress of the Disciples of Christ.

Article V. The officers of this society shall be a president, a vice president, a secretary, a treasurer, and twelve directors. These officers shall be chosen by ballot, and the election shall be annual. At the first election four directors shall be chosen for one year, four for two years and four for three years, and thereafter all elections of directors shall be for the term of three years. The president and vice president and treasurer shall perform the duties usually assigned to such officers, and shall be members ex officio of the board of directors. The secretary shall have charge of the correspondence and keep the records of the meetings, shall make known by addresses, correspondence, and otherwise to associations and conventions, churches and individuals, the objects and claims of the society and prepare an annual report of its work. The treasurer shall have charge of the funds of the society and shall give bond for the faithful discharge of his duties.

The board of directors shall have charge of all affairs and manage all business of the society. It shall determine what institutions shall be aided and maintained, and grant such aid as the state of the treasury may permit. They shall appoint committees to examine and recommend students for assistance. They shall also have power to appoint district and field secretaries or establish any agency they may deem necessary. They shall hold regular monthly meetings at such time as may be agreed upon, and seven directors shall constitute a quorum.

Article VII. This constitution may be changed only by vote of two-thirds of the members present and entitled to vote at a duly called meeting of the society.

In addition to this form of constitution, the committee said: It is certain we have reached a crisis in our educational affairs. We occupy advanced ground in everything but the work of education. We are top-heavy on "our plea," and our educational work has run down at the heel. We are making our ablest and most aggravating mistakes in the field of education.

Something must be done. Some among us have long felt that our educational interests demanded a separate organization, a society with a paid secretary like our foreign and home societies, with its annual convention in connection with our general missionary conventions, and which shall have general supervision of all our educational work; raise funds, foster colleges, academies and schools; raise the standard and improve courses of study, and increase the efficiency of our present institutions; encourage the consecration of talent to the work of education, and the patronage of our own institutions of learning by our own people; hold educational meetings and stimulate the educational spirit among our churches; publish educational tracts and statistics, and furnish in every way a suitable arena for the consideration of facts and questions pertaining to education.

We may learn here from our religious neighbors. They are far ahead of us in this work, and every one of them has some such general organization.

The oldest is the Congregational Education Society. It has issued its eighty-fourth annual report. Its ablest men are connected with this society. It received and appropriated the past year $134,000, aided 138 ministerial students, and gave assistance to 22 colleges and academies.

The Presbyterian Board of Aid for Colleges is seventeen years old. Its province is to secure annual offerings from churches for this cause, to co-operate with local agencies in determining sites for new institutions, to decide what institutions shall be aided, and assign institutions seeking endowment special fields. It received last year from churches, individuals, legacies, interest and miscellaneous sources $145,429, and aided 29 institutions. It has a special education day in which over 3,000 churches took part. Its funds are devoted to either the current expenses of struggling institutions or to permanent endowments. Its growth has been from very small beginnings.

The M. E. Church Board of Education, organized by Bishop Simpson and other leaders of that body, has been thirty years in operation. Its object is to diffuse more generally the blessings of education and Christianity throughout the United States and elsewhere under the direction of the M. E. Church, to act as a general agency of the church in behalf of ministerial education, for communication between teachers and those needing their services, collecting and publishing educational statistics, furnishing plans for educational buildings, giving counsel in regard to the location and organization of new institutions, promoting the work of auxiliary educational societies, and exercising general supervision over the educational work of the church. It has aided no institutions, but has collected over one million dollars and aided over 10,000 students, or an average of 1,850 a year. It shows the number of institutions sustained by the M. E. Church to be 175, with over $17,000,000 invested in buildings and grounds, $16,000,000 endowment, 3,000 teachers, and 46,000 students, and an annual income of $2,404,349.

Shall we be behind in this work any longer? Can we hope to make our great plea felt as it should be if here we are weak? Educated mind controls the world. Christian education is the need of our time. The Christian College evermore has its place, but it must be mightily reinforced if it would hold its own.

John Harvard on the shores of Massachusetts Bay started his young college in 1636 for "the education of the English and Indian youth of this country in knowledge and godliness." Its overseers were charged with "furthering the college in piety, morality and learning." Among its rules was this: "Every one shall consider the main end of his life and studies to know God and Jesus Christ which is eternal life." Its motto was Christo et Ecclesiae.

But twenty-five colleges were opened in America before the opening of the last century and not a woman's institution among them. Our Commissioner of Education lists at the opening of the twentieth century 480 universities and colleges for men and for both sexes. Brown University has had 5,250 graduates and has productive funds amounting to $1,297,227; Columbia, 17,050 graduates and $10,400,000; Dartmouth, 9,000 graduates and $2,300,000; Harvard, 22,670 graduates and $12,614,448; Yale, 19,645 graduates and $5,000,000. Brown has an annual income of $176,923; Columbia, $922,834; Dartmouth, $105,000; Harvard, $1,376,672; and Yale, $770,000. Thirty other institutions report productive funds amounting to $1,000,000 and over, and five others an annual income of over one-half million. Forty-seven different nstitutions report having received in their history gifts of $1,000,000 or more, the largest being the gift of $25,000,000 by Stephen Girard to Girard College and $15,000,000 given by Leland Stanford and wife to the Leland Stanford Jr. University.

It is the day of great things in Education. We are a great people. Shall we abandon the day of small things?

After middle life Peter Cooper, of New York, ceased to devote his whole attention to glue and erected Cooper Institute where the poor youth of the city who had no helper could become able to help themselves. For many years the white haired old man sat in the halls he had built and saw thousands graduate with honor. Strong men and beautiful maidens took his shriveled palms in theirs, looked in his kindly face and said: "Father Cooper, all I have of worthy life I owe to you." No wonder he lived to be ninety-two years of age.

Titus ravaged Jerusalem and left behind a million corpses and salt-sown ruins. He thought he had made an end of the hated nation, but before he sailed from Joppa a rabbi obtained permission to gather a few boys out of the desolation and teach them the law. It was a concession fatal to Roman supremacy. That school was the cause of the recovery of the amazing vitality and persistence of the Jewish people. It built law, national spirit, consciousness of being a peculiar people, into mind. That abides.

This report was signed by the committee: F. D. Power, J. H. Garrison, W. F. Richardson, A. B. Philputt, George Darsie and F. M. Drake. The convention unanimously approved the report and action was at once taken in accord with the constitution which resulted in the election of officers as follows: President, F. D. Power, of Washington, D. C.; Vice-president, Carey E. Morgan, of Richmond, Va.; Treasurer, Andrew Wilson, of Washington, D. C.; Directors, one year, B. A. Abbott, Baltimore, Md., W. E. Garrison, St. Louis, Mo., E. V. Zollars, Hiram, O., E. B. Bagby, Washington, D. C.; two years, Dr. E. E. Montgomery, Philadelphia, Pa., R. E. Hieronymus, Eureka, Ill., W. S. Hoye, Beaver Creek, Md., C. A. Young, Charlottesville, Va.; three years, B. C. Deweese, Lexington, Ky., Peter Ainslie, Baltimore, Md., H. L. Willett, Chicago, Ill., and A. B. Philputt, Indianapolis, Ind.

About thirty persons enrolled as members of the society and the first cash subscription was received from a woman, Mrs. Artie Ashbrook, of Cynthiana, Ky. It will not be possible for the society to successfully enter upon the work planned for it without funds to employ an efficient secretary who may give his whole time to its interests. The enthusiasm which marked its organization was gratifying, but little opportunity was given during the congress to advocate its claims or to secure memberships. We trust that the friends of education everywhere among us will see the importance and practical value of such a general movement in behalf of our educational interests and will send their names in as charter members of the society, either to the headquarters at Washington, D. C., or to any member of the board of directors. God speed the cause of our schools and colleges.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

In my letter of April 25, attention was called to Prof. Clinton Lockhart's book on "Principles of Interpretation." The book, as you may remember, was commended. The author was spoken of as "the trained scholar, thinker and teacher." The notice said: "It is well that in this period of reviving interest in Bible study this book is given to the public." Reference was made to the story of Jonah and the whale with the remark that there is nothing in the book on the subject! The opinion was expressed that one could probably infer from what the author said about Job, the Song of Songs and the story of the sun standing still, about what he would say concerning the historic character of the book of Jonah, if he would speak on the subject. The story of the sun standing still is used as an illustration of one of the principles of interpretation. Then the questions were raised:

"Is Professor Lockhart a higher critic? How does he stand on the questions of inspiration and the inerrancy of the Bible?"

You were advised to buy the book and read it. In this way you may be able to determine where the author stands on these questions. A friend who read what I said writes:

"Does a man require this or that position on those questions in order to write a scientific work on interpretation? Again, what position must he take on inspiration, inerrancy, or criticism, to be a scientific interpreter? How are such questions to be settled? Who will settle them?"

My reference to the topics named was for the purpose of exciting in the minds of some an interest in this excellent little book.

For myself, I am glad that Prof. Lockhart does not appear in this volume as the advocate of this, that or the other theory of Jonah and the whale, the inspiration of the Scriptures, or the inerrancy of the Bible. To have done so would have materially diminished the value of his work. In fact to have done so would have changed the character of the book. In that case it would not have been a scientific treatise on the principles of interpretation. The number of partisans and special pleaders is now sufficiently great. Nor are we assisted to any considerable extent by their denunciations and arguments. The fact is, Prof. Lockhart moves on a higher plane than that occupied by the disputatious partisan.

To be a scientific interpreter a writer need not take a position openly in fellowship with any existing school of thought on the subjects named. Let us have correct principles of interpretation regardless of results in relation to the theories of men. It is refreshing to open a book written by a man who seems to be supremely devoted to the discovery and elucidation of truth.

"How are such questions to be settled?" By pursuing the method more than merely hinted at by Prof. Lockhart in his book. "Who will settle these questions?" The men who are large enough, and strong enough, and brave enough, to dig deep and uncover principles that are fundamental and then proceed to apply them regardless of consequences! Such men will settle these questions as far as it is possible to settle them.

Certain questions were raised, questions of popular interest with a certain class, in the notice of "Principles of Interpretation." There are men who will open Prof. Lockhart's book, nor are they few in number, to find out what his position is on inspiration, inerrancy, the historical trustworthiness of the book of Jonah, etc., etc. These with them are test questions. If one thinks as they think on these subjects he is orthodox—if not he is heterodox. Such a course is more common than you suspect unless you spend much time with the masses of the people.

The preachers will never settle the literary and critical questions, in relation to the Bible, now under discussion. They are questions for scholars to discuss and, if possible, settle. The average preacher is not a scholar. The man who is doing the work of pastor or evangelist is incapable of engaging with profit in the current discussion. This is the rule. Here and there a man may be found in the pastorate, or in the evangelistic field, capable of discussing intelligently the questions mentioned in this letter—but the number of such men is exceedingly small. The writer of this letter belongs to the class of incapables. He is not a scholar; has never claimed to be a scholar. No person whose judgment on a matter of scholarship is of any value has ever accused him of being a scholar. But I am interested in the great debate. To read after the scholars and thinkers in this department is a privilege. Now and again to be thrown into their company is a treat; but this is the limit of the ability of yours truly.

Even if you feel that you are capable of an intelligent discussion of the critical questions now in debate do not discuss them before a promiscuous audience. You will probably do more harm than good if you attempt it. The people do not know enough about the Bible to be profited by critical discussions. Find the message in a given fact or group of facts, in a given passage of Scripture, or book of the Bible—discover the practical message for the plain people, make sure of it—and then give it to the men and women who come to hear you, in the purest, simplest, most direct English that you can command. Preach positively. Preach dogmatically. Preach what you believe. Preach with a note of certainty. If you have doubts—and who has not?—keep them to yourself. Faith is not generated by a discussion of doubts. Doubts are not necessarily sinful; but they are not to be exploited in the pulpit. Your commission and mine says: PREACH THE WORD. To do this will keep us busy all our days.

Meantime read. Meantime think. Paul said to the pastors of the church in Thessalonica: "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." He would have the preachers to be alert, wide-awake, courageous, up-to-date, thoughtful; but he would have them in their ministry make known only Christ and him crucified. If ever there was a time for this character of proceeding on the part of those who are ministers of Christ that time is this year of grace 1901.

Current Literature.

A Book for Young Ministers.

When a thoughtful man, near the close of a life which has been devoted to the cause of Christ, writes a book in which he embodies the results of his best thought, and from no motive but the advancement of the kingdom of God, his message is apt to be worthy of careful perusal. Such a book is The Spiritual Side of our Plea, by A. B. Jones. The author says, in his introduction, that he "has been a semi-invalid for fifteen years, wholly incapable of regular active labor of any kind. This enforced retirement from all public official relations to society has placed him in a position of immunity from the influences of popular clamor, partisan prejudice and sectarian bias, has brought to him a rest from the usual conflicts of society, and given him a season for reflection and meditation. The result has been a careful review of Christianity as set forth in the New Testament scriptures, and as advocated by Alexander Campbell and those associated with him in his effort to restore to the world a pure apostolic religion. And the result of these investigations and studies is in a large measure expressed in this book."

The conviction of the author is that many writers and speakers among us have neglected, or given far too little emphasis to, the profounder spiritual meaning of those truths, principles and ordinances for the restoration of which the Disciples of Christ have been pleading since the early part of the preceding century. In his introduction he quotes from "one of the strongest preachers that ever occupied a pulpit among the Disciples, or among any other people for that matter," who said to him a few years before his death, "I doubt whether the first half of my ministry did more harm or good." In his "early preaching he was severely legalistic and literalistic; in his later preaching he was intensely spiritual and religious." To aid other young ministers in avoiding this mistake, the author declares to be one of the strongest incentives in the preparation of this book.

The first chapter of the book deals with "Authority in Matters of Religion." His conclusion on this subject is that "human consciousness as the resultant of intuition, reason and emotion, is the supreme court to which the Bible makes its appeal. In the use of it every man sits as the arbiter of his own spiritual fortune and destiny. He must decide on the claims of the Bible for himself. Man has authority, then, to sit in judgment on this divine authority of the scriptures."

Other chapters of the work are entitled: "Without and Within"; "The Letter and the Spirit"; "The Real and the Formal"; "Alexander Campbell on Remission of Sins"; "The Word and the Spirit"; "Alexander Campbell on the Word and the Spirit"; "Righteousness and Law." Throughout the book there are quotations from the writings of Alexander Campbell. This is not because the author believes Mr. Campbell's statement on any subject is an end of argument, but his aim is to vindicate the great reformer and theologian from what he believes to be a perversion of his teaching. This perversion relates especially to Mr. Campbell's teaching on the subject of the relation of baptism to remission of sins and concerning the office and work of the Holy Spirit. That Mr. Campbell taught that Christian baptism administered to a penitent believer is for the remission of sins, and that this position of his was distinctly different from that held by the majority of the orthodox teachers of his day is not denied but affirmed and proven. The author claims, however, that Mr. Campbell distinctly and repeatedly made the distinction between what he called formal and actual remission of sins. Christianity with him involved both an inner spirit and an outward form. It would not be adapted to human beings, such as we are, if it did not possess this twofold character. Mr. Campbell never held for a moment, nor has any representative teacher among us held, that baptism has anything to do in bringing about those internal or psychical changes involved in what is called conversion, or becoming a Christian. Baptism, it has always been held, is only for those who by faith and penitence have been brought into a subjective condition, qualifying them for citizenship in the kingdom of God. As an outward act it is the formal expression of this actually existing internal and spiritual condition. The contention of the author is that Mr. Campbell held and taught that actual remission of sins—that is, putting away of the love of sin and the purpose to sin from the heart, and the consequent change in God's attitude toward the sinner growing out of that fact—precedes baptism; but that the formal forgiveness takes place in baptism. That is, as we understand it, baptism is the divine pledge and assurance of forgiveness of sins to every believing penitent who submits to it.

It is not denied by any one that Mr. Campbell made this distinction, but it is held by many that he afterwards in his maturer years, taught differently. It is easy to quote statements from Mr. Campbell, which, taken alone, would seem to be inconsistent with this distinction, but it seems to us that the author makes good his claim that Mr. Campbell never consciously repudiated this position and that he never made an utterance on the subject that is not capable of being harmonized with this distinction.

Whatever may be the truth, however, concerning Mr. Campbell's attitude to this question, there is a very general revolt among the most spiritually minded and the ablest men among us against such an interpretation of Acts 2:38, and kindred passages, as excludes from the blessing of actual remission of sins all those who have for any reason failed to be baptized. Such an interpretation is wholly inconsistent with our general attitude toward that large part of the religious world which has never submitted to baptism as we understand it. Whether we use the terms actual and formal, or some other terms, there is a distinction, grounded in the very nature of things, between those internal conditions which determine character and the soul's attitude toward God, and those ordinances of an external character which express these internal conditions. And there is a distinction between the actual putting away of sin from the heart and life and the formal forgiveness of sin.

Mr. Campbell is quoted also on the subject of the operation of the Holy Spirit to show that he repudiated both the "word-alone system" and the "Spirit-alone system." "The former," he said, "is the parent of a cold, lifeless rationalism and formality. The latter is, in some temperaments, the cause of a wild, irrepressible enthusiasm, and in other cases of a dark melancholy and despondency." Mr. Campbell's view was that the word and Spirit are not to be separated. Mr. Campbell has, perhaps, been more misrepresented on this point than on the preceding one, and by many, too, who profess to revere his teaching. The author's treatment of this subject is clear and convincing.

The closing chapter on "Righteousness and Law" is a very thoughtful differentiation between a mere outward conformity to law and that real righteousness which springs from a renewed heart and an obedient will. "Righteousness imputed, in the sense of being bestowed upon a man from without, is unreal and without moral value. Righteousness that grows from within, under the inspiration of faith in God, is genuine, and all its works have a real value." (Page 392.)

The work is one that will be read with profit by those who have a desire to get beneath the surface of things to their deepest meaning and inner substance. It will no doubt meet with honest criticism from those who believe differently from its author, but that the discussion pro and con will result in permanent good we cannot doubt. (Christian Pub. Co., St. Louis, $1.50.)

Night Luncheon.

All Right if of the Right Kind of Food.

The difference brought about by the use of well selected food, as compared with ordinary food, is well shown in the experience of a girl attending high school and boarding herself.

She says: "My 'housekeeping' compelled early rising, and I used to become very sleepy over my books. To keep awake, I resorted to the use of strong coffee, and in a short time I began to have a dull, stupid feeling. No appetite, but a feeling of 'goneness.' I realized that I must eat something or faint in the class room. I would wash down a little breakfast with another cup of coffee.

I began growing thin, pale and nervous, and made very unsatisfactory advancement in my studies.

One day the good wife of one of our Professors asked me if I felt well, as I appeared so weak and nervous. Between my sobs I managed to relate my woes. She saw where the trouble lay, and advised me to leave off tea and coffee and take up Postum Food Coffee and Grape-Nuts Food.

I followed her advice and found the Postum a delicious beverage, and the Grape-Nuts just what I wanted. So my breakfast consisted of a little fruit, a saucer of Grape-Nuts and a cup of Postum, an ideal breakfast.

If, at night, I felt the need of something to eat before retiring, I ate a little Grape-Nuts.

My head grew clearer, my cheeks rosy, and I gained so rapidly in health that all my acquaintances remarked upon it."

There is a reason, for both Postum and Grape-Nuts contain the elements from Nature's store house that the body uses to rebuild the brain and nerve centers throughout These wonderful food elements are presented in such a fascinating form that users stick to them year after year, and very greatly to their benefit. The name and address of this young lady can be given by the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., at Battle Creek, Mich.

Our Budget.

—Did you take the May offering?

—That remains the first duty until it is done.

—What a glorious month is May for Home Missions.

—This strenuous age demands strenuous efforts in behalf of the kingdom of God.

—While men of the world are planning to capture the earth for trade, shall Christians not attempt to capture it for Christ?

—Churches are languishing and Christ's reign is hindered because there is lack of large plans for advancing the kingdom.

—As the great artist wrote amplior across the picture of his pupil, so our divine Master is writing amplior on the aims and plans of the church.

—The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST pleads for a large offering for Home Missions, and for the general widening of all our plans for church work, and the deepening of the life to make these plans effectual.

—W. H. Bagby, of Salt Lake City, was elected president of the Interdenominational State Sunday-school Association of Utah. The annual convention of the association was held last week in Salt Lake City.

—E. R. Edwards, pastor of the Christian Church in Syracuse, N. Y., and vice-chairman of the New York State Endeavor Convention, is to give a series of Sunday afternoon talks at the Syracuse Y. M. C. A. during the present month.

—The First Church, Birmingham, Ala., O. P. Spiegel minister, determined last Sunday to begin the erection of their modern church edifice on their centrally located lot at an early date. A finance committee was appointed for that purpose.

—J. B. Sweeney, our pastor at Gainesville, Texas, is preparing for a three months' tour to Europe, Egypt and the Holy Land, to start next February, attended by several brethren and sisters. Any one wishing to join the company or learn the particulars, address Bro. S. as above.

—The Redwood Christian, Eureka, Cal., announces a reception tendered Bro. A. Sanders, the new pastor of the church in that city, and his wife, recently, which was participated in by ministers of the various religious bodies represented in the place.

—The members of the official board of the church at Stanberry, Mo., announce the resignation of their pastor, G. E. Shanklin, who has accepted a call from the church at La Monte, Mo. The officers express their high appreciation of both Brother and Sister Shanklin and commend them highly to the brethren in their new field of labor.

—A correspondent who does not give any name asks if some of our readers can furnish the poem of Whittier which contains the lines:

"O friends with whom my feet have trod
The quiet isles of prayer,
Glad witness to your zeal for God
And love of man I bear."

If any one has the poem and will furnish us a copy, we will be glad to publish it for the benefit of our correspondent and others.

—M. J. Ferguson, of Los Angeles, Cal., notifies us of his purpose to come east and to spend some time in preaching and teaching in many of the churches in Kentucky and adjoining states. He will leave California about the first of June and desires to be continually employed in presenting to the churches "the things that in recent years have so richly blessed" his own life. Bro. Ferguson is known as a preacher of character, scholarship and ability and we trust that his time may be fully employed. He may be addressed at 661 W. 28th St., Los Angeles, Cal.

—The receipts for foreign missions for the week ending April 26th amounted to $4,104.31. or a gain of $924.60 over the corresponding week one year ago. Thousands will rejoice over these encouraging figures.

—The conference of the Disciples of Christ in the middle Atlantic states will be held at Plymouth, Pa., May 21-23. The program, which reached us too late for publication in this issue, will appear next week.

—Dr. J. W. Lowber, of Austin, has just completed his annual course of lectures at Add-Ran Christian University, his topic being "The Origin and Growth of Civilization." This is the twenty-fifth course of lectures Bro. Lowber has given in this institution and none has proved more interesting.

—J. C. Reynolds writes of the Third Illinois District Convention, which was held at Galesburg last week, that it was almost three times as large as last year and that the quality was to match. H. L. Willett delivered six lectures on the life of Christ during the convention, of which our correspondent speaks in terms of the highest praise.

—Robert Perry Shepherd, pastor of the Park Avenue Church, Disciples of Christ, East Orange, N. J., announces the dedication of their new chapel which was to take place on last Lord's day. In the invitation the pastor says: "We hope to make our home the center of wholesome friendship and hearty sympathy with all mankind. Our only strife is against evil and discord."

—Rev. William Baier, pastor of the Free Will Baptist Church in Winona, Minn., and his wife were received into the Church of Christ in Rochester last Sunday. Mr. Baier has been a reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the past year and attributes his change of views chiefly to this fact. His present pastorate terminates about June 1, after which he would like to locate with one of our churches.

—The handsome new church at Bedford, Ind., was dedicated last Sunday by Z. T. Sweeney. This congregation, founded in 1846 by John O'Kane and L. H. Jameson, has had a notable history. Its membership of about 600 received additions to the number of more than 200 in a meeting held two years ago by James Small, the present pastor. Preparations had been made for a meeting to be held by S. M. Martin and J. E. Hawes which began on the afternoon of the dedication day.

—Dr. Edwin A. Layton and wife, of Chicago, missionaries of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, sailed from New York on April 27th in the "Umbria," for Bolengi, Africa, their new field of labor. Dr. Layton stands high in his profession. Besides, he is a preacher of the gospel. Mrs. Layton has spent a number of years teaching in the Chicago schools. It has been their purpose for many years to give their lives to the mission field. They will be associated with E. E. Farris and Dr. and Mrs. Royal J. Dye, at Bolengi, Africa, which is in the Congo Free State, about 800 miles from the mouth of the Congo river. On his way Dr. Layton will spend a few weeks in London in some special medical preparation.

An Honest Tired Feeling

There is an "honest tired feeling," caused by necessary toil and cured by natural rest.

But very different is "that tired feeling," from which so many complain and which may even be classed as a disease.

That tired feeling takes you to bed tired and wakes you up tired.

You have no appetite, have bilious taste, dull headache, are nervous and irritable, blue, weak and discouraged.

In such conditions Hood's Sarsaparilla does a world of good.

It begins in the right place—in the blood, purifying it and imparting vitality, then its tonic effect is felt by the stomach, kidneys and liver; appetite comes back, all waste is removed naturally, headaches cease, that tired feeling departs and you feel like a new person.

This has been the experience of thousands.

It will be yours if you take

Hood's Sarsaparilla

—In a letter from J. T. Ogle, now of Guthrie, Okla., he writes: "Above all things we should endeavor to be grateful, and I wish to express my gratitute for the splendid series of articles from the pen of Bro. J. S. Lamar, now running through the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I have enjoyed them exceedingly. I now wish to ask if the splendid visions of Bro. Lamar are to be published in book form." Bro. Ogle is delighted also at the announcement that we have some sermons from Bro. Procter and other matter from his pen, which will appear in due time in book form. Concerning the inquiry as to the publication of Bro. Lamar's articles in a more permanent form, we would say that this is to be determined largely by those who read them in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. If the requests for their publication in such form would seem to justify it, they will be revised by the author and put into a book for the benefit, not only of the present but of succeeding generations. We are sure that very many of our readers share with Bro. Ogle in this high appreciation of Bro. Lamar's articles.

—C. A. Young is holding an institute this week at the West End Christian Church, St. Louis.

—Clark Bateman has been called to continue his labors for another year as pastor of the church at Keosauqua, Ia.

—George A. Miller, of Covington, Ky., will preach the commencement sermon to the High School of Ashland, Ky., on May 19.

—The Ministerial Institute of the Seven th and Eighth Districts of Illinois is being held this week at Centralia, Ill.

—L. B. Coggins has accepted a call to the Ellendale Christian Church, St. Louis, and is pleased with the outlook of the work there, upon which he has already entered.

—J. N. Crutcher, of Paris, Texas, has been called to the Compton Heights congregation of this city, and it is understood he will accept and begin the work soon.

—The new Christian Church at Villa Ridge, Franklin county, Mo., will be dedicated May 12, by H. F. Davis. This was formerly the old Pleasant Hill congregation and the old friends of this congregation are urged to be present at the dedication.

—To the profound disappointment of the church we have been obliged to release Bro. Scoville from his proposed meeting here on account of his physical exhaustion incident to the three months' campaign in Des Moines. We were ready and a great meeting was practically certain, but we must wait for him till fall. SUMNER T. MARTIN.

Omaha, Neb., May 1.

—The convention of the Sixth Missionary District of Illinois will be held at Danville, Ill., June 18-20. The secretary, A. R. Spicer, urges all preachers within this district to see that their churches are represented. Among the names on the program are those of J. I. Gunn, W. B. Taylor, F. W. Burnham, J. W. Kibbourn, J. Fred Jones, J. C. Coggins, A. A. Wilson, William Drummett, Prof. Silas Jones, Miss Anna Hale, C. C. Smith, R. L. Brown and A. C. Roach.

—President Ashley S. Johnson, of Kimberlin Heights, Tenn., writes that since the beginning of the present year they have set apart from that institution eighteen young men to the work of the ministry. The majority of these preachers have worked their way up from poverty. Recently they have added two years in Latin and two in Greek to the course. The enrollment this year has been over 100, representing 27 states and countries. There will be room for 140 at the fall opening.

—The Central Christian Church, St. Louis, has extended a call to Howard Cree, of Maysville, Ky., to become pastor not later than October 1. The present pastor, James McAllister, was unanimously requested some time ago to continue his work for the church until that date. He has rapidly come into recognition not only among our own ministers, but among the preachers of all the denominations in the city, as an able and consecrated man of God, foremost in every good work. He has won the love of all who have come to know him —Sister Charlotte S. King, of Allegheny, Pa., writes us that two sisters there wish to contribute $5 each to assist Brother Jeu Hawk in his work in China, and inquire as to his address. Hoping that others may follow their example, we give the address below. Dr. Jeu is known and loved by many brethren in the United States and we trust that several of them will grant him some assistance in his good work until he has opportunity of making his mission self-sustaining by the practice of medicine. Address Dr. Jeu Hawk, Care Ye Yee, 192 Wing Lock Street, Hong Kong, China.

—C. C. Redgrave, Adrian, Ill., generously proposes to deliver his illustrated lecture "In the Footsteps of the Pioneers," for the expenses, for the benefit of Christian Endeavor societies, Sunday-schools, or district, county and state conventions. The pictures he exhibits in connection with the lecture are an interesting and instructive feature.

—The Jacksonville (Fla.) daily papers announce the erection of two new Christian churches in that city in the near future. The First Christian Church, under the pastorate of J. T. Boone, has accepted the plans for their new building on the splendid new lot recently secured, and the Adams Street Christian Church, of which T. H. Blenus is pastor, has arranged to begin the erection of a new brick building at once. We are glad to notice these signs of growth and prosperity in our cause in Jacksonville. We learn too, from the same source that the First Church has passed some resolutions looking to a union of the two churches. This is undoubtedly the wise thing to do, and if the spirit of unity is allowed to have its way, this will be the outcome.

—In regard to the terrible fire in Jacksonville, Fla., last Friday, J. T. Boone, pastor of the First Christian Church, writes as follows: "Almost the entire heart of the city is burned to the ground and hardly anything but the suburbs left. About half of our members are without homes and almost without clothes, as the flames spread so fast that the people had to flee for their lives. Nearly all the goods that were moved from the houses burned where they were moved to. Nearly all the business houses were burned and the people are not only homeless but will be without work. Our members are bravely bearing it and are in good spirits. The city will be rapidly rebuilt and it is necessary that we push our new building as fast as possible. We had expected to start on it next Monday and it is lucky for us that we did not start sooner. There is no hall of any kind to meet in, but we are trying to get our members together to-morrow in one of our suburban parks, taking along lunches and spending the day. We are making an effort to get the tent owned by our people in the state." No suggestion of an appeal is attached to Bro. Boone's letter, but it would be an appropriate thing to send contributions to aid in the erection of the new church which was projected and is now more than ever needed.

—There are in Hiram College, O., two Japanese girls who are educating themselves for work among their sisters in Japan. Their names are Kumi Sato and Yao Tarada. They were brought to this country more than a year and a half ago by Mrs. Dr. E. S. Stevens, who, with her husband, Dr. E. S. Stevens, went from Cleveland as missionaries to Japan a few years since. On their arrival in this country these two Japanese girls were brought to Cleveland and sent to the Medical College, but their limited knowledge of the English language made it necessary for them to take a course of study in the English language after which they are to take the medical course. Mrs. H. E. McMillin and Mrs. H. Gerould, two of our prominent sisters in the Euclid Avenue Church at Cleveland, have assumed the financial responsibility of educating these two Japanese girls and looking after their welfare. The Cleveland Leader recently gave a sketch of these girls together with their pictures and copies of letters from them to Mrs. McMillin. These letters show an unusual amount of intelligence and a profound gratitude to their lady benefactors. Our space forbids our giving copies of these letters which are occupied chiefly with descriptions of Japanese customs and with bits of their own personal history. We are not surprised to learn that they are general favorites at Hiram, and judging from their faces and the character of their letters, we have no doubt these sisters are making an investment which will pay an hundredfold in the influence of their Christian lives in Japan.

How to Find out.

Fill a bottle or common glass with your water and let it stand twenty-four hours; a sediment or settling indicates an unhealthy condition of the kidneys; if it stains the linen it is evidence of kidney trouble; too frequent desire to pass it, or pain in the back is also convincing proof that the kidneys and bladder are out of order.

What to Do.

There is comfort in the knowledge so often expressed that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney and bladder remedy, fulfills every wish in curing rheumatism, pain in the back, kidneys, liver, bladder and every part of the urinary passage. It corrects inability to hold water and scalding pain in passing it, or bad effects following use of liquor, wine or beer, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to go often during the day, and to get up many times during the night. The mild and the extraordinary effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. If you need a medicine you should have the best. Sold by druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes.

You may have a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a book that tells more about it, both sent absolutely free by mail. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. When writing mention that you read this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Lanceford B. Wilkes.

A note from Mrs. Edmund Wilkes from California, Mo., announces the death of Lanceford B. Wilkes, age 77 years, 1 month and 6 days, at his home in Stockton, Cal., on the 1st inst. It has only been a few weeks since we announced his serious illness and asked his old friends to write personal letters to cheer him in his closing hours. Bro. Wilkes was widely known throughout the brotherhood as a preacher of marked ability, of profound convictions of truth, of pure life and of the most incorruptible integrity. Men might differ from him, but if they knew him well they could hardly fail to love him. He had, beneath a somewhat rugged exterior, as warm and tender a heart as we have ever known. He was born in Maury county, Tenn., March 24, 1824. When a child of five years of age his parents moved to Miller county, Mo., where his boyhood years were spent. While attending an academy at Springfield, Mo., the mind of the young boy was greatly influenced by the preaching of Joel H. Haden, or Father Haden as he was familiarly called. He entered Bethany College in 1849, but left there in the following summer and returned to Missouri where he graduated in 1852 at the State University, then under the presidency of James Shannon. He was widely known as a preacher both in Kentucky and Missouri, and has always occupied a high place in the esteem of the brotherhood to the principles of which he was deeply attached. He loved his brethren devotedly, but above all he was an ardent advocate of the principles of religious reform advocated by Mr. Campbell and his compeers. He leaves behind him the legacy of a spotless life and a noble character, and an influence which will go on working for the world's betterment through all the coming time. He had finished his life-work and like a ripened shock of grain was ready to be garnered. Our sympathy is extended to the two surviving sons, one of whom is a faithful and useful minister of the gospel.

Now is a good time to begin taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, the medicine that cleanses the blood and clears the complexion.

Correspondence.

New York Letter.

Archbishop Corrigan, of the Catholic diocese of New York, is much stirred up over the future of the Catholic Library of the Cathedral, in view of the possible changes contingent upon the Carnegie proposition to this city. The Roman Catholic Cathedral of St. Patrick maintains a library of 50,000 volumes under Roman Catholic supervision. They select the books and of course see to it that literature favorable to the Catholic religion is supplied. This library gets its share of the state library funds. The archbishop in a recent address before the Cathedral Library Reading Circle at the Hotel Majestic, expressed his alarm at the prospect. He protests against the idea of their library surrendering its charter and its distinctive qualities in order to become a beneficiary of the Carnegie gift. He claims that this library is property of the church; and further, that one-half of the population of New York is Roman Catholic, and therefore their request should have some weight with the Public Library management. They want the full pro rata benefit of the Carnegie fund, but they wish to use it to foster the Catholic faith as such. He also said other libraries deal out many books that they would not think of allowing in the Cathedral Library, such for instance as "The True Life of William Penn" and the "Political Growth of the United States," which he declared are full of insults to the Catholic faith. This shows the true spirit of Roman Catholicism. They want the benefit of public funds and generous gifts for the support of the Catholic religion; but they wish to surrender nothing. The recent Association of Catholic Colleges passed resolutions in accord with this spirit, calling on their people to beware of legislation looking toward state control of education, protesting against what they call discriminating legislation and asking their constituency to form a more perfect system of educational organization for protection and aggressive work.

The dignified Brooklyn Presbytery got down from their pedestal of learning, courtesy and reverence for the sacred Scriptures a few days since, and became common babblers and mockers at one of the most sacred institutions of the Christian Church. A young Baptist preacher by the name of Watkins, who had been instrumental in building up a certain Presbyterian church, wished to accept a call to become its pastor. He came before the presbytery for examination, and on the question of baptism he said immersion for himself was necessary because he believed in it, but he was willing to sprinkle or pour water upon others if they wished him to do so. After much discussion pro and con, in which the younger men wished to receive him, and the older men were more cautious, the Rev. Mr. Warren exclaimed, "Why should we object to his Baptist origin or his Presbyterian progress? Nothing but pressure will ever make people submit to immersion in an indoor tank of still water." (A voice, Hot water! Much laughter.) Mr. Wilson continued, saying, 'The candidate is so open that the general trend will lead him along the right road and soon he will be doing like us all, as the people want our way of baptism." And after much of just such talk, that august body voted the candidate into the Presbyterian Church and into the Presbyterian ministery. It is difficult to understand why men who believe in the divine authority of Jesus Christ and the supreme sacredness of his gospel—ministers at that—can bring themselves to speak in terms of such irreverence of Christ's great commission to his people for all time. Are they more partisan and sectarian than Christian?

Prof. George D. Herron, the notorious Socialist from Grinnell, Ia., is stirring up some righteous indignation in the metropolis. A number of prominent men accepted an invitation of the Get-together Club of Brooklyn to speak at a certain meeting; among them was Prof. Herron. But since their promise to speak the divorce proceedings in which Mr. Herron figured prominently have come to the knowledge of the public. It seems he deserted his wife and four little children for the association of a certain rich young woman, on account of which his wife secured a divorce. And now a trial of his case before the Congregational Association on the score of "conduct unbecoming a Christian and a gentleman," is pending. These facts came to light and caused Dr. Hillis, Dr. Strong and others to recall their engagement to speak on the same platform with Prof. Herron. Dr. Hillis has just given out a most scathing criticism of the moral misconduct of Prof. Herron, and says he does not refuse to speak from the same platform with him because he is a Socialist and freely criticises the preachers and the churches, but because of his moral leprosy. The whole affair has caused much discussion in church circles, and attracted much attention to Prof. Herron and his theories. Socialism has gotten much free advertising, such as it is. Prof. Herron says it is his mission to rescue Christ from the church and put him forth before the people in his original character. It is to be hoped that his own character is not a reproduction or an embodiment of the teachings of Christ in matters of morality and simple justice at least.

Prof. Marcus Dodds, of Edinburg, Scotland, gave an excellent lecture in Union Theological Seminary, April 29, on "Paul's Conversion." It was a scholarly, philosophical treatment of the significance of this great change in the apostle to the Gentiles. He said that Paul evidently saw the risen Christ objectively and externally, though some critics believed and taught that the vision which he beheld on the way to Damascus was simply the projection of his own mental condition—the result and not the cause of Paul's conversion to Christ. He showed that this conjecture was absurd in the extreme, declaring that Paul was not visionary, nor was he an epileptic, as some supposed; but he was a man of marvelous practical wisdom and sober judgment. He also said that the fact of the resurrection of Christ was always fundamental in Paul's thinking and belief. Moreover Paul's theology was based upon his relation to Jesus Christ. Paul did not for himself or any one else find salvation in Christianity, but in Christ. Salvation meant belief in a person and surrender to a person. Prof. Dodds said this makes the simple old story of the cross ever new and fresh and wonderful. It establishes a personal relation between the soul and the Savior that is inexpressibly sweet and joyous. His lecture was listened to by scores of ministers, who evidently were deeply and favorably impressed by the profoundly reverent words of this great teacher of preachers.

On Saturday, April the 27th, Dr. A. E. Layton and wife sailed from New York on the steamship 'Umbria" of the Concord Line for Liverpool, under appointment of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society to our mission station at Bolengi on the Congo. Dr. Layton will spend two months studying in the London School of Tropical Medicine, in special preparation for his medical work in Africa. He and his wife came from Chicago where all possible preparation was made for their life work of sacrifice, of danger and of toil. They seemed very happy in the prospect of service in the Master's name among those who have not learned of his love and his salvation. The joy that seems to characterize our missionaries who sail from this port for their fields of labor is noticed by all who come in touch with them. It is the joy of whole-hearted consecration.

Sewing as a business is an exacting and exhausting occupation. Long hours, fine work, poor light, unhealthy atmosphere—these are only some of the things which fret the nerves and hurt the general health. Often there is a diseased condition of the womanly organism which causes backache or headache and the working of the sewing machine under such conditions is akin to torture.

Thousands of women who work have written grateful letters to Dr. R. V. Pierce, whose "Favorite Prescription" has cured their womanly ills and established their general health. "Favorite Prescription" establishes regularity, dries unhealthy and offensive drains, heals inflammation and ulceration, and cures female weakness. It makes weak women strong and sick women well.

Sick women are invited to consult Dr. Pierce by letter free, and so avoid the indelicate questionings, offensive examinations and obnoxious local treatments deemed necessary by some physicians. All correspondence private. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

"I take great pleasure in recommending Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription for female weakness." writes Mrs. Susannah Permenter, of Pauls Store, Shelby Co., Texas. I was troubled with bearing-down pains in my back and hips for six years, and wrote to Dr. Pierce for advice. I tried his 'Favorite Prescription' and six bottles cured me. I feel like a new person and I thank Dr. Pierce for my health. Life is a burden to any one without health. I have told a great many of my friends about the great medicine I took."

Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser, in paper covers, is sent free on receipt of 21 one-cent stamps to pay expense of mailing only. Address Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.

Chicago Letter.

A lady whose observations have been limited to Chicago remarked to me the other day that she had never seen a Christian church that did not meet in a hall or in an unfinished church. We have certainly lacked, in this city, the prestige that comes from church buildings. City people are apt to think that a denomination that lacks permanent places of worship is wanting in character and stability. But there are promises of a better future. The West Side Church has recently finished a beautiful structure that compares favorably with any church edifice in its vicinity. The Monroe Street Church is now erecting a home that will cost $20,000. Humboldt Park has bought a commodious building from the Presbyterians. Douglas Park will erect a small chapel on the lots bought by the Church Extension Society. Englewood voted at a recent meeting to start, at once, its building project. Austin has its plans, looking toward a home, well under way. If all these undertakings are carried out—and there is now no indication that one of them will fail—this year will mark an epoch in the progress of the Disciples of Chicago, and will certainly impress ourselves, other denominations, and the non church society that we are to be a permanent and stable factor in the life of the city.

I. J. Spencer, of Lexington, Ky., has been asked to become pastor of the West Side Church. He will probably accept. A. B. Moore has been supplying its pulpit for a few Sundays. Jasper S. Hughes will soon begin work for the Prohibition party. He will have general oversight of the work in Chicago. President Zollars while doing some special studying in the city is acting pastor of the Evanston Church. W. B. Taylor is soliciting pledges for the Chicago Syndicate. Each subscriber to this society agrees to pay five dollars for each new church erected in this city. There are now 100 members; an effort will be made to gain 400 others No enterprise among us has better grounds for appeal. Dr. E. S. Ames is reported as having the largest audiences in the history of the Hyde Park Church. Mr. Ames believes many churches err in having too many services. He says: "I will encourage only those services and organizations for which there is a positive and spontaneous demand."

While the Monroe Street Church is being erected, on invitation of the West Side Church the congregation will hold its meetings with the latter. C. C. Morrison, pastor of the Monroe Street Church, will minister to both congregations. This is a striking illustration that the Disciples are one; for no other two Christian societies in Chicago are more different in their accentuation of truth than these. The West Side stresses evangelistic methods, while the Monroe Street emphasizes gradual growth and development. The union will be helpful to both, each furnishing a profitable complement to the other.

Dr. H. W. Thomas, pastor of the People's Church, in commemoration of his sixty-ninth birthday reviewed his life work last Sunday to a very large audience. He dwelt especially upon his heresy trial, held over twenty years ago, while he was yet in the Methodist Church. He was tried on three charges, a denial of the inspiration of the Scriptures, of the atonement and of endless punishment. He was acquitted on the first; advocating the moral influence theory, he lost by two votes on the second, and was all but unanimously condemned on the third. Every sentence of his sermon Sunday breathed joy for the growth of tolerance since his trial. Here is a sample:

"In the more than twenty years since then there have been great changes, a continuous growth of religious ideas. The Methodist Church would hardly now try a preacher for holding and teaching the views for which I was expelled. If it cared to continue the task of heresy hunting it need not go out of Chicago. They might begin with Dr. Frank Crane, author of 'The Religion of To-morrow.' But they will not. Chicago has probably seen its last heresy trial."

Dr. Thomas has a kindly and deeply meditative face. He is frequently spoken of as "Chicago's pastor."

A notable service was held by the Central Church, April 28 It was the last service that will ever be held in the old Central Music Hall. Already the carpenter's hammer is leveling it to the ground, to make way for the extension of Marshall Field's large store. In this church Dr. David Swing, who perhaps has exerted a wider influence than any other Chicago preacher, proclaimed for several years his strong, hopeful messages so accurately dressed in the best of English. Then came Dr. Hillis, "the man with no high tones in his voice" And now Dr. Gunsaulus weekly dispenses poetry, philosophy, mysticism and religion. The last meeting in the hall was characterized by a review of the past history of the church and by a very impressive communion service.

Dr. Gunsaulus will hereafter speak Sunday morning in the Auditorium. Dr. Dowie will speak there in the afternoon. If the sermon in the morning is obscured by an over-nicety of words, Dr. Dowie will endeavor to make up for the deficiency later in the day.

Capt. O'Neil is the new chief of police. The popular indignation of the people, caused by so much crime, forced the mayor to relieve Chief Kipley of the position. No man on the force has a better record than Capt. O'Neil. He is said to be the best educated and most widely traveled policeman in the city. If he is given a free hand we may expect a marked improvement in the police department.

The Reformation of The XIXth Century

A Series of Historical Sketches, dealing with the Rise and Progress of the Religious Movement inaugurated by Thomas and Alexander Campbell, from its Origin to the close of the Nineteenth Century.

Edited by J. H. Garrison

This great work, which has been eagerly awaited for some time, is now ready for delivery. It is truly a notable work—a splendid addition to the literature of the Disciples of Christ. It is the only complete and modern history of the current reformation, and therefore should at once find a place in the home of every earnest and zealous Disciple.

This history is divided into eight periods, as follows:

Introductory Period	Chas. Louis Loos.
Period of Organization	B. B. Tyler.
The Turbulent Period	W. T. Moore.
The Transition Period	T. W. Grafton.
Period of Revival of Home Missions	Benj. L. Smith.
Period of Foreign Missions	A. McLean.
Period of Woman's Work	Lois A. White.
Lessons from Our Past	J. H. Garrison.

Chas. Louis Loos was personally and intimately acquainted with the fathers of the reformation, and associated with them in their work. His statement of the origin of our movement, and of its early connection with the Baptists, is the most satisfactory which has yet been made. B. B. Tyler has for many years been an untiring student of the history of our movement. W. T. Moore was an active and prominent participant in the events of the period beginning with 1861. His sketch of Alexander Campbell is a masterpiece, and is alone worth the price of the book. T. W. Grafton, in his "Life of Alexander Campbell," and "Men of Yesterday" has shown his ability as an able historian. Benj. L. Smith, A. McLean and Miss White have been most conspicuously identified with the enterprises of which they write. The closing section, by J. H. Garrison, is the address delivered by him at the Jubilee Convention in Cincinnati, October, 1899.

"The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century" is a handsome volume of 514 pages, bound in cloth. It is an addition to that list of books which, whatever other books he may have, every earnest Disciple of Christ should possess. This history is not only a volume full of facts and information, but a story of absorbing interest.

"She Hath Done What She Could."

Nancy Hartzel DeLany was born on the Western Reserve, near Warren, O., Oct. 10, 1832. Her father, the late Jonas Hartzel, author and co-worker with the venerated Alexander Campbell, was pastor of the Warren Church during the first twelve years of her life. The mother, Alice Wallahan Hartzel, was no less a co-worker with the early Disciples of eastern Ohio and western Virginia. The mother's sphere was not in the ministry, not before the public, but in constantly ministering to the good cheer and earthly comfort of those who so strenuously advocated a return to primitive discipleship, and Nancy was her devoted helper. The reward of such service comes sparingly in this life, but is it less esteemed where motives lie naked before the Great Rewarder?

Until Nancy was 22 this relationship of home and labor was maintained and thus was laid the foundation of a character whose influence for good cannot be measured. She was then wedded to John C. DeLany. The next few years were spent at Hopedale, O. Later at Detroit, Mich., and Union Springs, N. Y., the best facilities for the education of her four daughters were procured.

With never a strong physique and ever a nervous temperament, she battled against ill health and unhappy conditions, presenting to her children and friends a most cheerful and sympathetic nature. While residing at a Military Post in New Mexico three of her daughters were given in marriage. The eldest, Alice, to M. E. Richardson, nephew of the late R. R. Richardson, of Bethany College. The second, Ella, to Capt. D. H. Clark, U. S. A. The third, Laura, to the beloved and lamented Chas. E. Garst, whose life spent in Japan in missionary labor is well known. A few years were spent with her youngest daughter, Dorothy, at Daughters College, Harrodsburg, Ky., and later at St. Katherine's Hall, Davenport, Ia. Many will recall the time, years ago, when Mrs. DeLany was made a life director of the F. C. M. S. by the sainted A. M. Atkinson, and presented with four of her sisters to the convention in Kansas City.

In the spring of 1888 on account of serious physical indisposition, implicating, through its nervous character, her eyes, a decided change was recommended by her medical adviser and a sea voyage favorably considered. Being naturally anxious to visit Mrs. Garst in Japan, she joyfully embraced the opportunity and with her only unmarried daughter, Dorothy, sailed in company with G. T. Smith and bride.

A visit from Dr. W. E. Macklin, pioneer of our mission work in China, led to such results that some months later he came back to claim Dorothy as his bride and take her to China.

The mother now had double attractions in the Orient and prolonged her stay far beyond the limits planned. On the "Foreign Field" it was considered by her a privilege to share in the heat and burden of the day. She lived in native houses in the cold climate of Northern Japan. She was fellow sufferer with the Garsts when they were burned out December, 1888. She endured many a perilous journey, rolling at sea in typhoons, or facing wind and weather on land.

At one time, to facilitate a trip very necessary for Mrs. Garst's health, Mrs. DeLany took a lonely and dangerous trip in a small coast steamer, taking charge of Hartzel and Gretchen Garst, then four and two years old. She could not speak the Japanese language, but with these two little children as interpreters, lived six weeks with only two other "foreigners" in the town, and they several blocks distant. Everywhere the white hair and gracious manner secured to her most courteous treatment. Some months after the marriage of her daughter Dorothy, Mrs. DeLany was gratified to be able to visit our mission in China. At Nankin she lived for months in the old Buddhist temple with the Macklins. There Theodore was born, and guarded from the monstrous and numerous rats by the most devoted of grandmothers. Very many were the friends she made in her journeys between China and Japan, being a welcome and honored guest in many homes besides those of our own people.

All Mrs. DeLany's experience in Japan and China served to strengthen her in her devotion to the great cause, and her heart was continually gladdened by the knowledge that she had made some precious offerings to her King in this service. Returning to this country, she longed to be in active Christian work. Her frail physical condition held her back. She was prostrated by at least four critical illnesses between 1890 and the time of her death. The work that weighed most on her mind and heart was one for boys. Only a short time before her death she expressed herself as desiring to live if she only might have strength to gather about her groups of growing boys and teach them purity of heart and speech, to shield them from the monster iniquity of the saloon, to hedge them around by a pure environment. This was her supreme desire.

She was eminently fitted for such work, Long before the kindergarten was appreciated. she was true to its principles in her family discipline. Her pictured face shows the strong will that was a marked feature of her character. Deep sorrow chastened and saddened her and gave her a peculiar sympathy with those in trial. The intense strain due to appalling newspaper reports from China in June of last year was too much for her frail strength. Her precious baby daughter, her darling grandchildren, were with her in her waking and sleeping thoughts. They were always in extreme peril. She could not shake off the nightmare. How gladly would she have suffered martyrdom with them, but to be thousands of miles separated from them was more than she could bear. Six months of suffering was her portion before she was called up higher. Those who loved her best are solaced by the thought of her blessed relief. To have the tortured mother-heart at rest, the spirit gladdened by a satisfying vision of her travail—this is the balm that soothes the aching hearts that long for the sound of the voice that is still.

Hoping to gain some relief for her from the acute physical suffering she was taken to a sanitarium in Nebraska, where she was lovingly cared for by Mrs. Garst, cheered by the daily presence of some of her grandchildren, and visited by another daughter, by sisters and other relatives. She was efficiently and tenderly tended by Christian physicians and nurses. A few days before the end, when her strength was almost exhausted, she said, with great decision, "God is good. Would that we might live nearer him in truth and righteousness." Again she said to Mrs. Garst, "Write a—" "Do you wish me to write a letter to some one for you?" "Yes," came the feeble reply, "to many—to everybody!" "And send your love?" "Always, always, always," she replied with much earnestness. This her friends may consider her farewell message. This was the keynote of her life. Her earthly tabernacle lies in beautiful Mt. Mora, St. Joseph, Mo. Truly we may say as we think of her: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

Texas Letter.

W. H. Stewart has gone home to God. He was born in New York Dec. 19, 1816, and died April 5, 1901, in his eighty-fifth year. For more than sixty years he was an active worker in the church. He and Robert Graham were co-laborers and warm bosom friends. He was greatly afflicted in his closing years, losing his sight entirely and almost deaf, but these heavy crosses were patiently borne in the strength of his Savior. He was a successful business man and always able and willing to help the cause with his money. These old pioneers, whose unselfish labors made possible our success to-day, are rapidly passing away, and may we keep their memories green, for their work was truly a noble one.

B. B. Sanders has just closed a fine meeting at Santa Anna with about fifty additions. Charles E. Freeman has been called to the pastorate. With a beautiful new house free from debt and an enthusiastic congregation, a great work will be looked for.

C. McPherson and W. K. Homan are measuring lances in the Courier over the question, "Is the Spirit of Man Destructible?" And they are making things decidedly interesting.

B F. Wilson has resigned the pastorate of the Ross Ave. Church, of this city and accepted the care of the church at Roswell, N. M., and Graham McMurray succeeds him. Success to both of them.

M. S. Dunning, of Belton, is to succeed J. M. Campbell at Whitewright. A wise choice on the part of the church.

It is often well for us to see ourselves as others see us, hence this quotation from the Philadelphia Manufacturer: "The South entered the new century as the old Baltimore clipper used to sail into port—full-rigged, proud, every inch of sail spread, flags flying. The South has not ceased to excite sympathy. In a few years it will be so rich that it will refuse to be bored by sympathy. In agriculture, commerce and manufactures it is bound to beat the east and rival the far west. It will market its wares in the great middle states and it will conquer much in Mexico and Central and South America."

This is truly a rosy picture, and if drawn by a southern man it might be considered an exaggeration. But is it overdrawn? I believe not. As a field for the investment of capital it is at last attracting the attention of the millionaires of the east and of Europe. It is now a common thing to have excursion parties of these rich men pass through Texas, viewing the landscape o'er. Two such excursions, representing billions of wealth, are now in the state and like the Queen of Sheba they say the half has not been told. The agricultural and stock-raising possibilities alone are enough to attract to our land the idle capital in the vaults of the east. But when our monster oil fields are included, no wonder these level-headed and conservative men of means grow wild with enthusiasm.

Who could look upon a Texas "gusher," simply for the amusement of our distinguished visitors spouting a stream of oil six inches in diameter, hundreds of feet into the air, and not become excited? Such a man would be stolid indeed.

But this is not all, nor is it the most important thing to be said about Texas as a place of investment. "Our plea" has always flourished in the richest portions of this country. There is a simplicity and force in it which appeals powerfully to the clear brain of the average business man. Note its success in the rich regions along the Ohio, Mississippi and Missouri rivers. Now that this class of men are flocking into Texas, let us give them this plea as we have never done before. It will prove an investment that will pay in time and in eternity.

Again we call attention to our state convention at Waco, June 5-10, and urge all who can to attend. M. M. DAVIS.

Wisconsin Evangelistic Notes.

Since last communication I have visited a number of the churches. The little Norwegian church at Chippewa Falls is deserving of much praise for its steadfastness of purpose surrounded as it is by so much sectarianism—home-grown and imported.

The Werley church has its regular service without preaching. Recently preached over one Lord's day to the little band and baptized a lady in Green river. There are others, I think, "almost ready" to obey the gospel.

Platteville continues to hold forth the word of life and light. Young Brother Hooser, a recent convert, a normal student, is much help to them.

Bro. Berkey, the able pastor at Monroe, together with his estimable family, gave me a pleasant reception. There are some excellent brethren at Monroe. This is the home of our excellent sister, Miss Mettie Monroe.

The Twin Grove congregation is far from dead, judging from the attendance, singing, attention, etc. Bro. Berry and family kindly and hospitably entertained the evangelist.

Footville seems to be in good condition under the ministry of our excellent young Brother Bloom who lives at Center and preaches for the two congregations. Footville is the home of our veteran Brother Milton Wells who has done much in building up the cause in the state.

Center is one of our oldest congregations and has perhaps done more than any other one congregation in striving to build up the cause in other parts of the state, but being a country place has been greatly weakened by removal, deaths, etc. Bro. J. H. Fisher, our worthy recording secretary, lives here.

Bro C. M. Kreidler seems to be especially well adapted to the work in Milwaukee. It was very refreshing to drop into their mid-week prayer-meeting service. The room was well filled and the service very inspiring. There have been something like 70 accessions to the church since Brother Kreidler began his labors last October. Their new building and location have materially improved conditions in that important center. We were very cordially received by the Milwaukee brethren and very pleasantly entertained in the elegant home of Brother Lindsay. We had a brief conference with Sister E. W. Tucker in regard to state work and had some helpful counsel from Brother Kreidler.

After a brief visit with our very estimable president, we visited over one Lord's day at Manitowoc, situated nearly 100 miles above Milwaukee on Lake Michigan. This is an old town of about 12,000 inhabitants where rum and Catholicism go hand in hand as elsewhere all over the state. Several efforts have been made to establish the cause, but as yet we only have a few, but they are a faithful few. One confession there.

Bro. Barstow recently held a short meeting at Rib Lake with one or two confessions. He will go back before long and continue meeting.

Our efficient secretary, D. N. Wetzel, recently visited some of the churches in the interest of home missions, with good results.

The field truly is great. Sixty-five per cent. of our inhabitants are of foreign birth or nationality and it will necessarily take a long time to reach and convert them, but the gospel is the power of God unto salvation, and we have much hope in the outcome.

The field has been pretty well canvassed and the situation, we believe, is pretty well understood. J. H. STARK,
State Evangelist.

Salt Lake Letter.

The fourteenth annual session of the Utah State Christian Endeavor Convention closed last night at the First Congregational Church of Salt Lake City. It was held conjointly with the state convention of the Epworth League. While it would in size and enthusiasm have seemed rather tame to one accustomed to the rather colossal affairs of the kind in the east, it was full of encouragement to those of us who are familiar with conditions here. The reports showed substantial and encouraging advancement along all lines of the Christian Endeavor work. Not having been present at the business meeting, I am not in possession of any figures. Dr. Beach, of the First Congregational Church of Denver, was the speaker from abroad, as he was at the convention one year ago. This is a sufficient indication of the impression he made then. He seemed not less popular this year.

The business sessions of the two organizations represented were held in separate rooms of the same church, the first, of the C. E.'s, in the main room and the Epworths in the chapel or lecture room. At the next the C. E.'s gracefully retired on their own motion to the lecture room, leaving the E. L.'s in possession of the auditorium. How much the act had to do with what followed would be hard to guess. Over the earnest protest of the preachers a resolution was carried to hold the state convention of the Epworth League next year in connection with the state convention of the Christian Endeavor Society. Denominationalism is doomed.

The following extract from a sermon preached by Apostle (?) Brigham Young, a son of the only original Brigham, indicates the real danger we may fear from Mormonism. Not its theology, not its zeal and enthusiasm, but its priestcraft is what we have to fear. Not as a religious force but as a political force is it a menace. Rapid immigration of anti-Mormons into this great west is the only thing that can save it from the deadly grasp of an un-American and anti American ecclesiasticism

Logan, Utah, April 28.—Apostle Brigham Young, in a sermon delivered here at the meeting of the last quarterly conference of the original Cache stake, in this city to day, caused a sensation by some startling and frank admissions as to his politics. Apostle Young, after saying that he was governed in his politics by his religion, remarked:

"And if a man offered me a bribe to vote for him, I should at once decide not to vote for him, and would not do so unless commanded by the prophet of God, who stands at the head of the church."

Apostle Merrill deplored the fact that so many old bachelors and old maids were growing up here, and urged young people to marry.—Tribune Special.

We are engaged in an effort to raise funds to cover over-due interest to the amount of over $700 on our debt to the Board of Church Extension. A canvass of the business men of the city has resulted thus far in the securing of $400 of the amount. The good work still goes on and the full amount will be raised. The largest Sunday-school in the history of the church, one of the best Christian Endeavor or societies in the city, a good and growing C. W. B. M., an active Ladies' Aid Society, good and growing congregations, all local bills paid in full with a nice little balance in the current expense fund, are some of the encouraging features of the work in Salt Lake City. W. H. BAGBY.

Due Reverence in the House of God.

When people are satisfied with their surroundings it looks like cruelty to stir them up by saying that they are not doing all that they can do for the amelioration of their kind, that they are not teaching all that they might teach—teaching those things which make men and women ornaments to society at large as well as at home; teaching politeness. Politeness is next to godliness. Anyhow, politeness teaches respect for holy things. Thus, it teaches boys when they enter the first door which opens into the vestibule of the church to take off their head covering, for they are on holy ground. They are in a building set aside for the purposes of God, consecrated for his uses, and they should be taught whilst they are boys, so that when they reach manhood they will know how to behave as gentlemen. Politeness should be taught by both precept and example. All the teaching in the world will not amount to anything with boys, if their elders are seen walking up the aisles with their hats on their heads and not removing their headgear until they reach the platform. Example goes farther with boys than precept. Example goes farther with men and women than precept. And precept will not teach, until those old men who walk up the aisles as if they were greater than the house of God—more important I should have said—until they conform to true politeness and respect for the building in which they are. "The Lord is in his holy temple, let the whole earth keep silence before him." Do these people realize it? I do not think so. For if they did they would show more reverence whilst they were in the house of God. F. K. STEELE.

Evangelistic.

ALABAMA.

Birmingham.—One baptism at the First Church, Birmingham, Ala., Sunday night, making 22 additions at the regular services since January 1st.—O. P. SPIEGEL.

ASIA MINOR.

Sivas, April 2.—Seventeen precious souls the Lord added to the church up to last Lord's day, and we have good reasons to believe that others also will soon follow. A young man told me yesterday that there are four in their family who will join the church before long, himself included. A few days ago I received a most encouraging letter from the young church in Haineh, beyond the river Tigres. After reporting one addition to the church, they say that the church in their utter poverty had sent one of the brethren to preach in Lidjeh and the Lord had so blessed his efforts that he had organized there a church with 11 members. Rejoicing over their success they had determined to continue their missionary efforts to the best of their ability. It must be remembered that the church in Haineh was born in one day, the 1st of May, 1899, with a membership of 57.—G. N. SHISHMANIAN.

ILLINOIS.

Bloomington, May 5.—Two added at our evening service at the Christian Mission.—JOHN D. AUSTIN.

Onarga, April 30.—I am happy to report 25 added since my last report to the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, making 58 in seven months. A bright, talented young man came forward last Lord's day.—J. J. HIGGS.

Sheldon, April 27.—S. S. McGill is achieving gratifying results in his ministry at Sheldon, Ill. Six additions at regular services since last report. The membership showed their appreciation by leaving many valuable gifts at a surprise reception given him recently.—W. C. CHAPMAN.

Virginia, May 3.—Two baptized at prayer-meeting Wednesday evening.—K. C. VENTRESS.

INDIANA.

Clark's Hill.—Lord's day, April 21, was a red-letter day for the church at Clark's Hill, Ind. The new $8,000 house was formally opened for worship, and dedicated. It is the best house for the size of the town that I have ever seen. There was an indebtedness of $3,800 to provide for. The day was stormy, yet it was estimated that 1,000 people attended the service. Bro. Johnson, their pastor, is doing a great work at Clark's Hill.—L. L. CARPENTER, Wabash, Ind.

Danville, May 1.—Was at Smithville four nights last week, with five confessions. We have everything to encourage us here.—EUGENE T. MARTIN.

Liberty, April 30.—E. V. Spicer, of Richmond, Ind., with F. H. Cappa as singer, closed a meeting for us on April 28, with 10 additions; eight baptisms. Both the preaching and singing were ably and acceptably done.—B. F. CATO.

Rensselaer, May 6.—Our meeting with I. N. Grisso as evangelist, closed May 5, with 11 additions, 9 confessions.—A. L. WARD, pastor.

Valparaiso.—John L. Brandt, pastor of the Christian Tabernacle, closed his labors with the congregation May first. During the four and one-half years of his ministry with the church, there have been about 450 received into the fellowship of the church and he leaves the congregation in perfect harmony and peace and strong in every particular. Mr. Brandt and family were tendered a reception on May 3 and appropriate resolutions were adopted which were presented by Congressman Crumpacker. The tabernacle seats about 1,500 people and during favorable weather has been filled to overflowing. Mr. Brandt's ministry closes with the regret of all the church and people of the city by whom he is held in the highest esteem.—RAYMOND B. HELSER.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Chickasha, April 29.—We had crowded houses at both services yesterday and four accessions, making 18 accessions at our regular services during the month of April.—JOHN A. STEVENS.

IOWA.

Des Moines, April 29.—Five accessions at Indianapolis yesterday. Four by commendation and one from the M. E's. Will begin our third year's work with the Indianapolis brethren May 12.—CHAS. D. HOUGHAM.

Keosauqua, April 28.—All's well; two added on April 7, and Easter exercises were a treat to all. Have been called by the church to remain.—CLARK BATEMAN.

Osceolo, May 3.—I am here in a meeting 10 days old with 18 added mostly by confession and baptism. I expected to be in St. Louis with the Fourth Church again in June for another meeting, but they will not have their building completed in time, and hence I can give the time to some other church. I may be addressed here through May.—W. E. HARLOW.

KANSAS.

Horton, May 6.—One by statement and one from the Methodists at morning service yesterday.—L. H. BARNUM.

Leavenworth, May 5.—We raised almost double our apportionment for home missions this morning. Another addition last Sunday. Have been called to remain with the church here indefinitely.—S. W. NAY.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Springfield, May 4.—Three added to the church from the Baptists, under J. G. Burroughs' preaching.—S. M. HUNT, clerk.

MISSOURI.

Albany, April 29.—At my regular monthly appointment at Oxford, Worth county, last Lord's day, it was my pleasure to baptize two married ladies, take the confession of another and receive a young lady by letter.—C. E. POMEROY.

Cape Girardeau, May 3.—Bro. Frank Thomson, of Pine Bluff, Ark., recently preached ten days for us at Fisk, Mo. Six added. I continued the meeting four days longer with five more added.—HORACE SIBERELL.

Carrollton, April 25.—R. A. Omer, of Illinois, is with us. Meeting 16 days old and 36 additions.—E. H. KELLAR.

Carrollton, May 4.—R. A. Omer, of Camp Point, Ill., has been with us preaching for three weeks and five nights. Fifty-eight additions; 37 by baptism, four by letter, 17 reclaimed or by statement. Carroll county is a needy field, where there is much conservatism and disorganization, but we are glad to report that R. H. Love, supported largely by the Carrollton congregation, has begun his work as county evangelist.—E. H. KELLAR.

Council Bluffs, April 29.—A fine auxiliary C. W. B. M. organized with 28 members. A missionary rally last Thursday night in which the Omaha, Neb., brethren, Hilton and Martin, with some of their auxiliary workers were over to encourage and help us. Bro. Martin spoke to us on missions and Bro. Hilton on educational lines. I preached at a mission point six miles out in county yesterday at 3 P. M. and had three confessions.—W. B. CREWDSON.

Kansas City, April 20.—The writer just closed a two weeks' meeting at DeWitt, Mo., which resulted in a complete reorganization of the church. They had not been meeting for some years on account of anti-ism. There were 16 names of earnest men and women enrolled and one confession. All hearts are united and the church has a bright future before it. We organized a Bible-school with 38 members and set them to work to train up the children to Bible truths. On the last day after preaching there was an after-meeting held, and it was decided by a unanimous vote to call the writer for one-half time, and a meeting was called for Thursday evening for a Ladies' Aid Society. Pray for us.—GEO. A. E. TROUTMAN.

Kansas City, April 29.—Closed my work yesterday at Forest Avenue Church, with 10 additions. No successor chosen yet. Will begin at Mexico, Mo., next Sunday.—A. W. KOKENDOFFER.

Kansas City.—Our meeting of 22 days closed with 46 accessions and a splendid spiritual uplift. This West Side Church is a beehive with very few drones. B. M. Easter, the pastor, is a number one man and has the full backing of his people. Am with Bro. Mundell a few days at Sheffield, east side.—R. L. MCHATTON.

Kirksville, May 3.—There were 10 additions to the church here last Sunday, and six last night at prayer-meeting.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Madison, May 1.—Will close work at Madison and Sturgeon in the month of May. Have been putting in half time at each of these places for the last three and one third years. Have had about 70 additions at Madison, paid $600 church debt and the church is now in good condition. Had about 80 additions at Sturgeon. This church is also in good condition.—EDGAR MONROE RICHMOND.

New Haven, April 29.—The dedication of the new church at Villa Ridge, Mo., is set for second Lord's day in May, H. F. Davis preaching the sermon. Only a small indebtedness remains to be provided for. All our friends are invited to come and rejoice with us.—G. E. JONES.

Richland, Mo., April 27.—Our Linn Creek meeting came to a close last Tuesday evening. Preached one week, baptized eight. We have a faithful little band there, they have been working faithfully for three years trying to build a house of worship. They have their

BRAIN FOOD.

Is of Little Benefit Unless it is Digested.

Nearly everyone will admit that as a nation we eat too much meat and too little of vegetables and the grains.

For business men, office men and clerks, and in fact everyone engaged in sedentary or indoor occupations, grains, milk and vegetables are much more healthful.

Only men engaged in a severe outdoor manual labor can live on a heavy meat diet and continue in health.

As a general rule, meat once a day is sufficient for all classes of men, women and children, and grains, fruit and vegetables should constitute the bulk of food eaten.

But many of the most nutritious foods are difficult of digestion, and it is of no use to advise brain workers to eat largely of grains and vegetables where the digestion is too weak to assimilate them properly.

It is always best to get the best results from our food, that some simple and harmless digestive should be taken after meals to assist the relaxed digestive organs, and several years' experience have proven Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets to be a very safe, pleasant and effective digestive and a remedy which may be taken daily with the best results.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets can hardly be called a patent medicine, as they do not act on the bowels nor any particular organ, but only on the food eaten. They supply what weak stomachs lack, pepsin diastase, and by stimulating the gastric glands increase the natural secretion of hydrochloric acid.

People who make a daily practice of taking one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after each meal are sure to have perfect digestion, which means perfect health.

There is no danger of forming an injurious habit, as the tablets contain absolutely nothing but natural digestives; cocaine, morphine and similar drugs have no place in a stomach medicine, and Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are certainly the best known and most popular of all stomach remedies.

Ask your druggist for a fifty cent package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and after a week's use note the improvement in health, appetite and nervous energy.

house about half completed. The church at Linn Creek needs help and they deserve help. With our house completed we can take the town for Christ. Dear brethren, you who have means, will you not help to plant the cause there? I am sure God will bless you in return for anything you may give them. Send money to Jos. Vincent, Camden County Bank, Linn Creek, Mo , for the Ladies' Aid Society and it will be well spent.—JOS. GAYLOR.

St. Louis, Mo.—First Church, F. O. Fannon, pastor, 11 additions, six by confession. Second Church, W. D. Pitman pastor, four additions in last two Sundays. Fourth Church, E. T. McFarland pastor, two additions. Central Church, Melvin Putnam, of Sedalia, preached in morning, Herr Cohen in evening. Compton Heights, one addition. O. D. Maple preached at Carondelet. Beulah Church, W. A. Moore, pastor, two additions. At the ministers' meeting Monday morning an address was made by Herr Cohen.

NEBRASKA.

Deweese, May 3.—We baptized Bro. T. McVey last Monday at Ox Bow. He has been a Presbyterian and is an able singing evangelist. We should keep him busy in the field. Bro. Menzies and wife, of Smith Center, Kan., will be with us the 22nd for one week; they will sail for India as missionaries this fall.—E. W. YOCUM.

Scotts Bluff, April 29.—Our meeting here closed last night with 20 additions, 15 by confession and baptism, four by letter and one by reclamation. One of the number baptized was a man 79 years old who had been a Methodist for many years. Bro. Jas. Sumner is the pastor. We begin a short meeting at Gering, April 30.—R. A. GIVENS.

Ulysses.—J. S. Beem had 5 additions at Seward and has gone to hold a meeting at Miller. Bro. Atwood has had 10 additions in first ten days at Tekamah, where A. G. Smith is pastor. The new church at Pawnee, Bro. Kennedy pastor, was dedicated by B. S. Denny. Simpson Ely is in a meeting at Nelson. John T. Smith has had 36 additions at Shubert since last report.—W. A. BALDWIN, Nebraska secretary.

OHIO.

Brilliant.—Four additions Easter Sunday. Last Lord's day evening Sister Mary A. Lyons delivered an inspiring address on the C. W. B. M. work to a large audience. We have now fallen into line and as a result of the state secretary's visit have organized an auxiliary. We expect to take our home mission offering the second Lord's day in May.—WILLIAM STIFF.

Dayton, April 30.—Closed work at Owosso Lord's day with two accessions. Am on my way to LaGrange, Ky., by urgent telegram on account of serious illness of my wife. Please direct all mail there instead of Owosso, Mich.—S. A. STRAWN.

Geneva, May 1.—Since the last report there have been added to this congregation, four by baptism, four by statement and four by letter.—GARRY L. COOK.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Guthrie, May 3.—We are in a fine meeting here. Bro. C. E. Millard is assisting Bro. J. T. Ogle, our pastor. The illustrated songs are the finest we have ever listened to.—W. A. HUMPHREY.

Perkins, April 20.—We have just returned from Ceres, where we preached 12 sermons and received 15 additions. Twelve confessions, two from the Methodists. The meeting will be continued, Bro. Duvall assisting Bro. Raider, the pastor.—J. W. GARNER.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Charleston, April 29.—Just commenced a meeting with the church here. One added by letter at yesterday's service. Our first audiences are excellent.—M. B. INGLE.

TEXAS.

Amarillo.—Since Sept. 1, we have had 47 additions, 22 by baptism; the present membership is 118. The church is out of debt.—VOLNEY JOHNSON.

The following resolution was passed at the recent annual convention of the Christian Mission held at Deoghur, India:

Resolved: That the secretary be instructed to express the thanks of the Mission to the Christian Herald, our Baptist friends, as well as to our own people in England, Australia and America, for the timely and efficient aid rendered for famine relief.

The great famine from which India has not yet fully emerged is part of history. The natives suffered much and many lives were lost. But the fact that the horrors of this famine were not so great as those of other great famines is largely because of the Christian charity manifested in those great civilized countries in which the word of God has the strongest hold and its teachings are bearing the most fruit. Only persons who have been engaged in the famine relief work can fully appreciate the sufferings of the people or properly estimate the amount of good done through the help received from Christian lands. All who have contributed to the relief fund have had a part in the Master's work. We are grateful to our brethren that they have given us the opportunity, as ambassadors for Christ in the enemy's country, of thus showing to the heathen the spirit of his kingdom. GEO. W. BROWN, Sec.

Spring.

By Mettie Crane Newton.

"Unto the hills." Psalm 121:1.

I hear the murmur of awak'ning life
Float o'er the distant hills. The spring is here
And oft my spirit wings its way to nature's Realm, transfigured in the light and warmth
Of vernal suns. I see fair fields and verdant
Meads; and groves whose quiet shades invite
To meditation and repose; tarns set
Among the hills like stars in azure skies;
Sweet vales below begemmed with flowers
And od'rous with the freshness of the new-
Come spring.

I hear the mountain stream, loosened
From icy bonds, singing its way adown
The slopes; the blue air jubilant with songs
Of joyous birds; the grasses growing in
Th' turf; and violets, kissed by wooing winds,
Springing from mossy beds and winter sleep.

And list! Ye who have list'ning souls, hear ye
That voice, speaking softly as breathe the flowers,
Stilly as sing the stars? It is the voice
Of God. The spirit of the universe
Is God. Give heed and you will learn a lore
That sages cannot teach. The heart of nature
Is the heart of God. Keep close and its strong forces
Will vivify and expand your souls
And in your lives will bloom eternal spring.
No mystical philosophy this, but faith
Uplooking "to the hills whence comes our help."

The Family Altar.

One day a gentleman was riding on a western prairie and lost his way. Clouds arose in the sky and not seeing the sun he quite lost his reckoning. Night came on, and as he knew not what way to guide his horse, he let it take its own way. It was a western horse and was therefore likely to understand prairie life better than his rider, who was not a western man. By and by a light glimmered in the distance, and it was not long before the faithful animal stopped before a log cabin.

"Who's there?" somebody shouted from within.

"A benighted traveler. Can you give me a night's lodging?"

"You're welcome," said the man, appearing at the door.

The traveler was thankful enough to give up his saddle and bridle to the master of the log cabin. He found the family at supper—man, wife and children, and a place was soon made for the stranger.

Some time in the evening the man asked, "Are you a minister of the gospel, sir?"

"No," he answered; and seeing the man looked disappointed, he asked why he wished to know.

"Oh, sir," answered the man, "I hoped a minister had come to help me build a family altar. I had one once, but I lost it coming over the Alleghanies. It is a great loss."

"Perhaps I can help you to build one, though I'm not a minister," said the gentleman, who always had one himself; and after a little more talk, the man handed him an old family Bible. He read and they sang a psalm, and all knelt. The gentleman prayed first, then the man prayed, and the wife and children said "Amen"; for it seemed as if each wanted to have a little part in building up the family altar.

"Sir," said the man when they arose, "there's many an emigrant that loses his family altar before he gets here—and it's a great loss."

Yes, many family altars are lost. Some are lost in politics, some in traveling, some in moving, some in the hurry of the harvest, some at stores and shops. It is an unspeakable loss. Abraham never lost his, yet never family traveled further and moved oftener than his. But wherever he pitched his tent he set up his family altar, and called upon the Lord and the Lord blessed him wherever he went. Children as well as parents have an interest in keeping the family altar. Don't let it be lost. —Selected.

Does a Two-Year-Old Baby Pay?

Does a two-year-old baby pay for itself up to the time it reaches that interesting age? Sometimes I think not. I thought so yesterday when my own baby slipped into my study and "scrubbed" the carpet and his best white dress with my bottle of ink. He was playing in the coal-hod ten minutes after a clean dress was put on him, and later in the day he pasted fifty cents' worth of postage stamps on the parlor wall and poured a dollar's worth of the choicest "White Rose" perfume out of the window "to see it wain."

Then he dug out the centre of a nicely baked loaf of cake, and was found in the middle of the dining-room table with the sugar-bowl between his legs and most of the contents in his stomach.

He has already cost over $100 in doctors' bills, and I feel that I am right in attributing my few gray hairs to the misery I endured walking the floor with him at night during the first year of his life.

What has he ever done to pay me for that?

Ah! I hear his little feet pattering along out in the hall. I hear his little ripple of laughter because he has escaped his mother and has found his way up to my study at a forbidden hour. But the door is closed. The worthless little vagabond can't get in, and I won't open it for him. No, I won't, I can't be disturbed when I'm writing. He can just cry if he wants to. I won't be bothered for—"rat, tat, tat," go his dimpled knuckles on the door. I sit in silence.

"Rat, tat, tat."

I sit perfectly still.

"Papa."

No reply.

"Peeze, papa."

Grim silence.

"Baby tum in—peeze, papa."

He shall not come in.

"My papa."

I write on.

"Papa," says the little voice: "I lub my papa. Peeze let baby in!"

I am not quite a brute, and I throw open the door. In he comes with outstretched little arms, with shining eyes, with laughing face. I catch him up into my arms, and his warm, soft little arms go around my neck, the not very clean little cheek is laid close to mine, the baby voice says sweetly:

"I lub my papa."

Does he pay?

Well, I guess he does! He has cost me many anxious days and nights. He has cost me time and money and care and self-sacrifice. He may cost me pain and sorrow. He has cost much. But he has paid for it all again and again and again in whispering these three little words into my ears: "I lub papa."

Our children pay when their very first feeble little cries fill our hearts with the mother love and the father love that ought never to fail among all earthly passions.

Do our children pay?—J. H. D., in Detroit Free Press.

Close Buying.

Some women are good mathematicians, others are "weak in figures." The Baltimore Sun tells of one who prided herself on her economy and close bargaining. Her husband used to banter her sometimes about what he called her "stinginess."

One day Mrs. S., as she may be called for convenience, invited her husband to go to market with her and witness her prowess in the line of close buying.

At the market Mrs. S. made several purchases, and then at one stall inquired the price of eggs.

"Sixteen cents a dozen!" she repeated. "That's too much, I am sure I saw them for less somewhere this morning."

She dragged her reluctant husband after her from one stand to another, still inquiring the price of eggs, and always receiving the same answer until she was near the upper end of the market. Here she found a dealer whose eggs were fifteen cents a dozen.

"There, I told you so!" she exclaimed to her husband. "Those other men were trying to get the advantage."

Turning to the salesman, she ordered half a dozen eggs, gravely handed him eight cents in payment, and went away, well satisfied with her shrewdness.

Her fisrt doubt came when Mr. S. quietly asked her how much she had really saved by the transaction.

Since then she does not like to hear her husband speak of her economies.

Feet Out.

Curious Habits.

When a person has to keep the feet out from under cover during the coldest nights in winter because of the heat and prickly sensation, it is time that coffee, which causes the trouble, be left off.

There is no end to the nervous conditions that coffee will produce. It shows in one way in one person and in another way in another. In this case the lady lived in Vermillion, S. Dakota.

She says, "I have had to lie awake half the night with my feet and limbs out of the bed on the coldest nights and feel afraid to sleep for fear of catching cold. I had been troubled for years with twitching and jerking of the lower limbs, and for most of the time I have been unable to go to church or to lectures because of that awful feeling that I must keep on the move.

When it was brought to my attention that coffee caused so many nervous diseases, I concluded to drop coffee and take Postum Food Coffee to see if my trouble was caused by coffee drinking. I only drank one cup of coffee for breakfast but that was enough to do the business for me. When I quit it my troubles disappeared in an almost miraculous way. Now I have no more of the jerking and twitching and can sleep with any amount of bedding over me and sleep all night, in sound, peaceful rest.

Postum Food Coffee is absolutely worth its weight in gold to me." This lady's name can be given on application to the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Try Them Yourself.

Do you want some very good tongue exercise? You can get it by reading, or attempting to read, rapidly the following sentences, recently published in the Atlanta Constitution. For those who may have, in future life, to read or speak in public, there is more in such exercise than mere fun:

"Six little thistle sticks.

"Flesh of freshly-fried fish.

"Two toads, totally tired, tried to trot to Tedbury.

"The sea ceaseth, but sufficeth us.

"Give Grimes Jim's great gilt gig whip.

"Strict, strong Stephen Stringer snared slickly six sickly silky snakes.

"She stood at the door of Mrs. Smith's fish-sauce shop welcoming him in.

"Swan swam over the sea; swim, swan, swim; swan swam back again; well swam swan.

"A haddock, a haddock, a black spotted haddock, a black spot on the black back of the black haddock.

"Susan shineth shoes and socks, socks and shoes shineth Susan. She ceaseth shining shoes and socks, for socks and shoes shock Susan.

"You know the tongue twister Peter Piper, but there are others which are harder. One of the worst is, 'mixed biscuits.' Try saying that rapidly, and if you succeed, say this, 'Stop at the shop at the top of Sloane Street.' "

Simple Literary Questions.

The Irishman who inquired at a post office for a letter, but refused to give his name, may be able to sympathize with the young woman in the following story from the Pittsburg Bulletin:

Two well-dressed young women approached the desk in the reading-room of a large library. One of them took a memorandum from her pocket-book.

"Can you tell me how many yards—oh, that's the wrong list!" she said, hastily bringing forth another slip of paper. "Here it is. Will you please tell me who is Rudyard Kipling's favorite author?"

"I am unable to tell you, never having heard that he had one," answered one of the librarians.

"Dear me!" said the young woman, in a tone of irritation. "It's one of the questions for our next club meeting. Well, which one of Thackeray's books brought him the largest income?"

"That you can probably find out by consulting a book the number of which I will give you," said the official.

"Oh, I can't stop to look it up!" the young woman said, hurriedly. "I thought you could tell me at once. Well, there's one thing more. Bessie Cummock, my cousin in Manchester, had a splendid book when I was there last year for anecdotes of famous people. I can't remember the name of it, or who wrote it, but it was about so big," illustrating with one finger on the desk, "and it had a dark green cover. Now can you tell me what it is? Some day, when I have time, I'd like to get it out. Of course you must have it in the library?"

For the third time the attendant was obliged to confess her inability to give the desired information. The young lady looked at her with a piercing gaze and turned away, saying to her companion:

"There! That just shows what all this talk about their being examined for positions in public libraries amounts to! Three perfectly simple questions, all on literary subjects, and she couldn't answer one of them."

Perkins' Family Horse.

For some time I have been longing for a horse that I might call my own. No fleet Arabian courser, if you please, but a gentle, safe, willing family horse, behind which my wife and I might take our daily airing, and at last I was so fortunate (at least I so considered myself at the time; I found out better later) as to hear of an animal of that kind.

The equine in question belonged to a retired clam-peddler in Frog Hollow. I went to see Stubbs—Stubbs was the name of the clam-peddler—about it, and came away minus one hundred dollars in nice new greenbacks and plus a horse.

On the way home I had ridden "Bunker Hill"—which was the patriotic title that clam-vender had given the horse—but now I brought out the family carriage, which I inherited along with the Perkins homestead and coat-of-arms, hitched my equine acquisition up in front of it, and five minutes later we were out on the road jogging merrily along, the cynosure of all eyes.

We jogged along all right until we reached the first house, and then our steed suddenly sheered off to the side of the road next to the house and stopped.

"G'lang, Bunker Hill!" commanded I; but Bunker Hill was as immovable as his illustrious namesake.

"What is the matter with him? Isn't tired out already, is he?" queried Emily Jane, in tones of deep solicitude.

"No," said I, weakly, as the horrible truth suddenly flashed upon me. "No; it is worse than that; the intelligent beast, confound him! imagines that he is still in the clam business, and he clearly doesn't intend to go on again until I rout the inmates of the house out by howling 'Clams! Right this way for your fresh clams!' "

Vainly I coaxed and urged; to no avail I plied the whip. Like the youth on the burning deck that horse stuck to his post until finally Squire Jones, in front of whose stately mansion we were anchored, tumbled to the situation, and sticking his head out of the window, with a humorous twinkle in his optics, drawled:

"Don't care for any clams to-day, thank ye!"

Bunker Hill started up at once; but we could hear the whole Jones tribe snickering in ghoulish glee as we rode on (they were always a little jealous of the Perkinses anyway). Emily Jane's face fired up like an election bonfire on an October sunset, and I didn't feel any too comfortable myself until we got out of sight.

When we approached the next house I urged Bunker Hill into a trot and tried to hurry him by, but it was of no use. Again he stopped and stood his ground until he ascertained that no clams were wanted, when he ambled gently onward.

"Three times and out!" said I, taking a firmer grip on the reins and gritting on my teeth; and at the next house I again made a desperate attempt to rush that entirely too thoughtful nag past without stopping.

But stop he would, and stop he did; and then I handed the reins to my wife, climbed down from the driver's seat, and taking that over-zealous animal by the head, I turned the rig around and dejectedly led the procession homeward. I have now a safe, gentle family horse for sale at exceedingly reasonable figures; offers from reliable—or even unreliable—parties will receive prompt attention. — Will S. Gidley, in Woman's Home Companion.

FOR OLD AGE

To the old, as to babies, the even balance of health is more important than anything else in the world. The possible health, in age, is not high and strong; it is only even.

There is no end, but death, to the trouble that comes of its loss. It ought to be watched like a baby's.

Scott's emulsion of cod-liver oil for very old and very young —in different ways—is the food to secure this even health.

We'll send you a little to try, if you like.
SCOTT & BOWNE, 409 Pearl street, New York.

Practiced, Then Preached.

"Wall, I never was much fur meetin's," said the owner of a carriage-shop near a beautiful village where religious convocations are often held.

"We alus worked hard through the week, and Sundays I've rested. Slept all day pretty much, and if I went to meetin' I slept all through. I heered a good deal of 'do as you'd be done by' preached and talked, but I never see it acted very much until one day I was going from the railroad station to my shop with two sets of wagon irons. They were heavy, I tell you—all I could manage to lug; and as I was about half way up the long hill, two young men walking briskly overtook me, and I heard one say: 'Here's a chance to practice Christian endeavor. That man is too old to carry such a load as that.' And they insisted upon dividing the wagon irons between themselves, and they went out of their way to carry them to my shop. As they bid me good-by, one said:

" 'We hope we shall see you at the meeting down here at the schoolhouse to-morrow evening. My friend here is to preach.'

" 'And my friend here is to sing,' said the other one.

" 'I'll be there,' said I, 'because you practiced before you preached; so I ain't afraid to take stock in you.'

"I went to the meetin' with our school district neighbors, and never had no chance to be sleepy, for that young man made it plain that Jesus stood just as ready to take my load of sin as they had been the day before to take my load of iron, and he helped me to understand that I not only ought to be willing, but grateful, to accept his help.

"I was glad to have a Christian experience of my own, and it grows stronger every day I endeavor to live a Christian life. I ain't the same as I was before; I'm a new man. I'm younger, I'm happier, I'm rested; I never go to sleep in meetin', even when I go all day and evening, and it's queer how many 'do as you'd be done by' sort of folks I find right along, now that I try to be one of them."—Annie A. Preston, in Advocate and Guardian.

Carlyle as Schoolmaster.

A writer in the Scotsman has unearthed an amusing anecdote of Thomas Carlyle as a country schoolmaster. It is told by a Cupar lawyer and provost, who was one of Carlyle's pupils in Kirkcaldy. As a teacher, Carlyle is described as a strict and gloomy disciplinarian, whose large, glowing eyes constantly shot forth wrath. His mere scowl would hush the whole school, and he had a laugh that was a series of chuckles and loud guffaws, wherein he displayed his teeth like the keys of a piano.

One morning, just as we were entering the school-room, a donkey appeared on the play ground, and Bill Hood rushed to mount the animal and attempted to ride it into the school-room. The donkey was induced to carry its rider over the threshold amid shouts of laughter and cheers from the boys. Just as Bill was spurring the donkey into the master's desk, Carlyle appeared.

We expected a tremendous explosion of wrath, but instead he burst into a roar of laughter—such a roar, however, as produced a sudden and complete hush; and that roar was renewed again and again. Finally the master spoke.

"That," he said, "is the wisest and best scholar Kirkcaldy has yet sent me; he is fit to be your teacher."

He tapped the donkey's head, as he was wont to do ours, and continued, "There's something here, far more than in the skulls of any of his brethren before me."

He then gave some hard raps on Bill Hood's head, and would not allow him to dismount, but for penalty ordered him to ride up and down before the school for an hour, while the boys who had been most active in helping Bill to go through the farce had to march in pairs before and behind the perplexed-looking ass.

The other scholars were permitted to stand as spectators of the grotesque procession. Meantime, seated within his pulpit-like desk, Carlyle surveyed Bill and his company with a strange mixture of mirth, scorn and fury.

The American artists in Paris, says Vance Thompson in the Saturday Evening Post, may be divided into three classes — those who have got on, those who hope to get on, and those who want to get in. The successful artists have deserted the Latin Quarter; they lead plethoric lives; their wives are dressed by the fashionable frock-builder of the hour; they ride out to state functions in their own carriage and pair. As there are only four of these successful American painters they can get about Paris without jostling each other.

The class of painters who hope to get on is pretty well crowded. They have their studios over in the Latin Quarter. Their pictures are exposed in the Salon now and then. They give exhibitions in their studios. But their chief business in life is to invite each other to tea. This is a way of "Getting on in the World" which the erudite Mr. Mathews has overlooked. Nine out of ten of the American artists here believe that by persistently drinking tea with each other they will arrive at fame and fortune. It is a blind but beautiful faith. And you can't argue about it any more than you can about the plausible theory that two and two make four.

There is hardly an artist—certainly not one married artist—in the Quarter who does not believe in the samovar road to success. Mornings they paint; afternoons, in apartments Byzantine or Empire, Rococo or Florentine, they meet and talk of each other, while their wives brew interminable pots of tea. Sometimes an amateur comes in. Usually he is from the Middle West. Occasionally he is from as far away as Texas. He is given an extra slice of lemon in his tea, for there is a theory that he is the Man who Buys. As yet it is only a theory, but some day he may buy, and the Man who Buys is the beginning of fortune; and it will be due to the tea and the Persian tapestry, to the tea and the Botticellian tea-gowns that madame trails to and fro so indefatigably.

"Life," said a morose philosopher, "is not all fiddle-de-dee;" but he knew nothing of getting on in the art-world of Paris.

Whence Kid Gloves Come.

Is it true, as I have been told, that the manufacture of kid gloves involves cruelty to the animals whose skins are used?

A. B. T.

We referred the above query to the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Vice-President Hill replies: "We have heard of no special cruelty in this connection," and sends these interesting facts from the Chicago Record:

Barefooted boys and hens form a curious partnership in the making of a pair of fine gloves. Thousands of dozens of hens' eggs are used in curing the hides, and thousands of boys are employed to work the skins in clear water by treading on them for several hours.

When a woman buys a pair of gloves she speaks of her purchase as "kids." If the clerk who sold her the "kid" gloves knew the secrets of the glove-making business, he might surprise his fair customer by telling her that those beautiful, soft, smooth-fitting "kid" gloves came from the shoulders and belly of a three-weeks'-old colt whose neck was slit on the plains of Russia, and whose tender hide was shipped with huge bundles of other colts' hides to France, where they were made up into "kid" gloves; or he might with equal regard to the truth tell her that those gloves in the other compartment once darted from tree to tree in South America on the back of a ring-tailed monkey. And if he made the rounds of the store, and could distinguish one skin from another, he could point out "kid" gloves made from the skins of kangaroos from Australia, lambs or sheep from Ohio or Spain or England, calves from India, musk rats from anywhere, musk oxen from China and other parts of Asia, rats, cats and Newfoundland puppies.

But, after all, the real kid, the lively infant of the goats which live in France, Switzerland, Spain and Italy, furnishes the most expensive gloves, and nearly 10,000,000 kids are sacrificed every year that women and men may cramp their hands in smooth, delicate-hued gloves.—Congregationalist.

Advance Society Letters.

Yes, sir, about the time that Linda May's party was over Mrs. Morris went to Pete's room and could not find her. Pete was gone—lost! But where had she gone? Of course not to the party, since that had been forbidden. However, this week is to be devoted to our letters and not to our story, so get ready; but remember, if you do not write me exactly how many pages you have read in your twelve weeks, I cannot print you on our Honor List. It seems so hard for some members to believe this, but it is so, just as this weather is so. Jessie Keedy, Toluca, Ill., says: "I think Lola Cox's plan a very good one, but I don't believe I can write anything that would amount to much. My favorites are The Lamplighter, What Katy Did, Little Women and An Old Fashioned Girl. Is the badge of the Av. S. a bow or strip of ribbon?" (Matter of choice.) Berkley Coryell, Sioux City, Ia: "Although you know nothing of it, there has been an Av. S. in Sioux City since September. Our membership was ten; now it is six. We read your story 'Pete' every night we meet, and enjoy it very much." Lizzie Howell, Lockhart, Tex.: "I like 'Pete' very much; I like to read the letters on the children's page, and want to join the Av. S. To-day (April 21,) is San Jacinta day: 65 years ago the battle of San Jacinta was fought; it decided our independence from Mexico. Our school will be out April 26, and then we will have a long vacation." (Good! Oh, what fun I hope you will have!)

Madge Masters, Ozark, Ark.: "School is out and I have more time now. I have told you how we bed out our sweet potatoes, how we plant them, and how we dig them. Now I am going to send you some of our Bunch Yams and let you see how they taste. I will start them to-day by express." (They came, too, a good big box of them. And now I must tell how I enjoyed them. We had them for breakfast to-day the first time. They are darker inside than any I have ever seen, and I think they are sweeter, too; I do not know to what I can compare them unless it is to the little girl who thought of me in the lonely wastes of northwest Missouri and sent me this box of happiness.) Margaret Eleanor Sturges, Chillicothe, Mo.: "I joined the Av. S. a long time ago. I was 15 May 3rd. [You couldn't be a nicer age, in my opinion.] Madge Masters is just 12 days younger than I am; I would like to correspond with her. [Wonder if you heard about those sweet potatoes?] I correspond with our member, Bertha Underwood, Boyd, Ore. I think it real mean that you cannot have two pages to devote to the Av. S.; and then the one page you are allowed has advertisements on it! I do not like Lola Cox's idea very well for myself, but it may be all right. My sister Anna (16) said, when she read that piece, to tell you she was very well pleased with your stories, and I agree with her. I like A Minister of the World. I think that Don Hockaday's teacher is very strict, indeed; it would not do for him to teach in Chillicothe High School; he would suspend them all. My name is Margaret, but my friends call me Margie, and you may, so it won't take up quite so much room. [Oh! I thought you were going to say I could call you Margie because you felt that I was one of your friends. So much room, indeed!] I forgot to tell you that if I wrote anything for our page it would be very short, and I could not improve on your stories much. As stamps cost money in Albany, I will send you one to answer if you have time." (This stamp was received with a lively feeling of gratitude; I will not write to Margie—for thus I save room—at least soon, because I could not think of sending a present back.) Mrs. F. A. Potts, Chattanooga, Tenn.: "Will you allow me to join the Av. S.? I am not a child, but please let the mothers come in, for this systematic reading is just what we need. [And we need the mothers.] I have kept the rules 11 weeks, and if you will allow me will send you my report at the end of next week. I find I can keep the rules with two babies and all my own work to do, and company part of the time. [Yes, you can't keep company away. They keep bothering around and knocking at the door just when you get a minute to breathe and both babies are finally asleep; I know just what it is, although I have not been a mother myself, but I have been a good deal of company at other people's houses.] I hope my experience may be useful to help other busy mothers, for each one needs time for a little reading each day. We have been very much interested in Pete, and I believe we enjoy it more than anything else in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. [Sorry to make the other contributors feel bad, but can't resist this.] I have had something to do in training children and enter into hearty sympathy with your work in the children's page."

Before I give any more letters, I now begin to publish the guesses on Pete. Of course I cannot give near all of them, but as the time for guessing is over, and as you may be interested to know what other people guessed, I give the following, with the promise to print other guesses later on; but I cannot tell you who is right or who is wrong until June 20th. On that day, or before, you will know all about it. Remember, the guesses of other members will be printed before long.

Pearl Bagley, Mabelvale, Ark.; "Mrs. Morris (Pete's mother) knew Nap when she was a young lady; the tramp wanted her to marry him. Nap knew aunt Dollie when she was a young lady. Pete's mother will not have to give all that money; Pete will persuade Nap to go away." Maye Heizer, Clilo, O.; "Mrs. Morris is Edgar Brown's old sweetheart; Nap is the man she married when Edgar thought so much of her. In the end he will marry Mrs. Morris, or one of the girls." Maxie Mason, Palestine, Tex.; "Nap is Mrs. Morris' brother; she tries to get him to go away so no one will know he is her brother." Fannie E. Turner, Winfield, Kan.; "Nap is a cast-off lover of Pete's mother. He has committed a murder or some crime and tries to place the same on her brother or some one near to her. He is trying to blackmail her to pay for his silence. I may be away off in my guess but such is my imagination on that point. I think the dog will help to unravel matters." Julia Cox, Cox, Mo.; "I think Nap and Mrs. Morris were acquainted when young; probably engaged. Nap has doue her some great favor." Bertha Seelinger, Butler, Mo.; "Nap is Mrs. Morris's brother." Gladys Bridges, Los Angeles, Cal.; "Nap was Mrs. Morris's sweetheart before she married that other man, so he is worrying her now." Maud Braley, Puxico, Mo.; "Nap was Mrs. Morris's first husband, or old sweetheart." (I should say there was quite a difference in this supposition.) Julia Cox: "I think the tramp used to want to go with Mrs. Morris; but she married Mr. Morris, and now he tries to do all he can to injure her." Mrs. M. V. Warren, Loveland, Colo.; "Nap was a former husband of Mrs. Morris." Philip Beesley, Moselle, Mo.; "I would guess Nap to be a murderer." Elizabeth Vilpey, Warm Springs, Cal.; "The tramp is Edgar Brown." Florence Belle Beattie, Dover, Mo.; "Nap is Edgar Brown, Mrs. Morris's wayward brother; she does not want her children to know it. Of course if it was her old sweetheart she would not be so patient with him. Now Nap will not sleep in the barn any more, all because of Pete. She has brought Edgar Brown—the 'Nap'—to himself; some day he will be a great comfort to them, especially to Pete." Orrell Fidlar, Terre Haute, Ind.; "Nap is Pete's own father; Pete is not one of the family." Mildred Brooks, Aspen, Colo.; "Nap is Mrs. Morris's friend; she owes him money." Next week we will publish our Honor List.

Children and Heirs of God.*

TEXT: "And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified with him." Rom. 8:17.

In the study of a theme like this we enter the realm of joy. Whatever grief or loneliness or disappointment may be ours, the consciousness that we are, after all, children and heirs of God, brings us into the sunshine. God will care for His own. If the sea is smooth, it is that we may voyage nearer home; if there are beating storms, it is to drive us into port.

Divine Parentage.

There are many theories of man's state while out of Christ, but theory is exchanged for certainty when one has been born again. And the apostle is writing in this passage of those who have obeyed the gospel, who have been "begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the word of God, which liveth and abideth: . . . and this is the word of good tidings which was preached unto you" (1 Pet. 1:23-25). It is the experience of that transformation and re-creation which Jesus taught, when he said to Nicodemus, "Ye must be born again." Nature seems to speak of God, and the nature lover may be brought into a sort of knowledge of God, but how much nearer and sweeter is the experience of divine Fatherhood which the Christian realizes! God is our Father, not simply for the earthly pilgrimage, but through the valley of the shadow, and through the ages; not in the sunshine only, but in the storm likewise; in sickness or in health, in peril or in safety, at home or abroad, on the land or the sea, we may look up and say, "Abba, Father."

Human Brotherhood.

John the beloved tells us, "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God; and every one that loveth him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of him" (1 John 5:1). That is, the children of God will love one another. The church is a great household, a happy family, part on earth and part in heaven. Therefore the members of the church will be unselfish, generous, gentle and kind in all their relations. This is one of the best evidences of regeneration, as it is also one of the chief fruits of the Spirit, brotherly love. Here also is the cure for sectarianism, for whatever mistakes of doctrine one may make, if truly regenerate he is a child of God, and by that blessed fact, a brother to all the rest of the family. Can we learn to look upon Christians of all creeds as brethren, and the unregenerate world as candidates for brotherhood, or as prodigal brethren?

A Glorious Inheritance.

To be brought into communion with God is an inspiration now, an experience of peace and joy every day; but this is only the beginning; what tongue can tell the joys that await us? For if we are children of God, we are also heirs, "heirs of God and joint-heirs with Jesus Christ." And this inheritance is incorruptible, undefiled, and fadeth not away. It is an impartation of moral wealth that awaits us. We cannot squander it. To be mentioned in the will of a rich man is esteemed a mark of great favor; what shall we say, then, of being mentioned as one of the heirs of God? Do you wish to have a definite statement of what that inheritance is? A thousand questions are being asked by affection and reason and conscience regarding the heavenly state, but who shall answer them? Our inheritance is not laid before us with metes and bounds. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be." As one has said, "Knowledge is measured by the attaining power of the human faculties." So doubtless divine revelation waits on human development. Who can imagine how a spiritual body looks? What fancy can paint a landscape of the unseen world? Enough for us to know that "we shall be like Him."

*Prayer-meeting topic for May 15.

Patient Continuance.

Glorification depends upon fidelity in service and in suffering. "He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver." Suffering is an indispensable condition of purification and discipline. The raw ore must needs have the flame. The ripe sheaf must have the tribulum, the threshing instrument, to separate wheat and chaff. The way to resurrection and victory is the way of the Cross. But what incentives we have to patience, what encouragements to fortitude!

"Long though my task may be,
Cometh the end.
God 'tis that helpeth me,
His is the work, and He
New strength will lend."

Prayer.

For courage and comfort O God, we give Thee thanks. We praise Thee for adoption into the family of the faithful, for the high privileges of sonship, for freedom, and peace, and joy. Help us to realize that we are indeed Thy children, with one Master, and that we all are brethren. Give us patience, faith, hope, and victory at last, with an abundant entrance into the house of many mansions. Amen.

Abundant Health is assured when there is good blood in the veins. Hood's Sarsaparilla is the medicine to make good blood. Begin taking it now. It is just what the system needs at this time and will do you great good. Sharpens the appetite, steadies the nerves.

Jesus Ascends to Heaven.

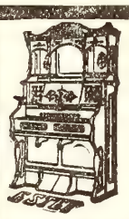
From Galilee where Jesus met his disciples and gave to them the Great Commission which we studied in our last lesson, he returned to Jerusalem, where the closing scenes of his earthly life were to transpire. For forty days he had tarried amid the places made familiar during the years of his public ministry, and had taught his disciples more carefully the principles of his kingdom. Luke, who gives us in his gospel some of these last teachings, determines afterwards to tell in greater fulness of the ascension of the Lord and the ministry of such of the apostolic group as came under his own observation, notably that of Peter, John and Paul. Hence the book of Acts, which is addressed, like the third gospel, to Theophilus, the "Lover of God." As in the gospel he had told of the things which "Jesus began to do and to teach," ending with his ascension into heaven, so in this epistle to his friend he would continue the story of the Master's ministry of grace, as that was carried on by his apostles.

Luke assures us that Jesus showed himself alive to his apostles by many infallible proofs, being seen by them often during the space of forty days These appearances, as we see in the instances we have studied, were so clear and unmistakable as to dispel every doubt and make of every apostle a lifelong witness to the resurrection of the Lord. These precious moments were spent, not as man's curiosity might have suggested, in narrating his strange experiences during the interval of his body's burial in the tomb, but in explaining to his followers the truths of his spiritual kingdom, that they might be better instructed for their mission as his ambassadors to a lost world.

Assembled in the upper room in Jerusalem, forty days after his resurrection, he again taught them as he had been doing during all these days, and then solemnly charged them to remain in Jerusalem until they should receive the promised Holy Spirit, which the Father was to send them after his departure. He had told them on the night of his betrayal that it was expedient for them that he should go away, as then the Holy Spirit would come to them to comfort them, guide them into all truth, and bring to their remembrance all his former teachings He reminds them how John the Baptist had foretold this gracious ministry of the Son of man, and had contrasted it with his own temporary ministry, whose highest expression could be embodied in the physical act of baptism in water. He would baptize them in the Holy Spirit not many days hence, and thus fit them by the enfolding and enduring influence of the Spirit of truth and grace to make known to man the Redeemer and Lord of the race.

Still blinded by their carnal conception of the kingdom, which they concieved of as a restoration to Israel of their once splendid place among the kingdoms of the world, the disciples asked whether the time were not immediately at hand for this hope to be realized. Jesus replied that the times and seasons for the realization of his divine purposes were in the Father's hands, and it was not fitting that he should answer all their curious questions. It was enough for them to know that their immediate concern was not to share in the Messiah's rest, but in his work; not in his glory, but in his suffering. As he was about to be crowned, after having been lifted up on his cross, so must they be faithful unto death, that the crown of life might be placed upon their brows. Any disappointment they might have felt by having their expectations again dispelled was atoned for by his comforting promise that they should be made his witnesses, and should carry into all Judea, and Samaria, and unto the ends of the earth, the tidings of salvation for sinful men.

The hour of his final departure was at hand. He might have left this earth unseen by mortal eyes, but this would have left his disciples in doubt, and weakened their testimony in his behalf. He determined to ascend in their very presence, that they might be able to say to all mankind that he had without doubt entered upon his reign at the right hand of God. So he led them out to the Mount of Olives, from whence he had made his triumphal entry into the earthly Jerusalem, and from whose summit he could fitly make his departure for the New Jerusalem of his Father's glorious presence. The former he entered that he might be the sufferer for the sins of the human race; the latter, that he might receive the adoring worship of men and angels throughout eternity.



When the company had come very near to the little village of Bethany, whose quiet had afforded sweet rest to the weary Son of man on many a night following the toil of the busy day, Jesus stopped and gazed into the faces of the men who had been so near and dear to him during the days of his humiliation. A strange awe fell upon their hearts. They asked no more questions, for they felt that some marvelous event was about to befall their beloved Lord and Savior. Suddenly he lifted up his hands and uttered tender words of farewell, asking upon them the blessing of the heavenly Father, in the well-known accents of love. As he spoke, he appeared to their startled eyes to be rising from the earth, and in a moment they perceived that this impression was true, and that he was indeed ascending into the heavens above them. "A cloud received him out of their sight." That cloud yet hovers between him and his earthly disciples; but faith can pierce it, and prayer rise above it, and the dews of blessing descend through it. Best of all, the Holy Spirit abides with all who truly believe, and sheds abroad in their hearts the love of God and the promise of life eternal.

"Thus vanished from the earth Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God. Evil never touched his spirit. Corruption did not approach his body. Even his ashes were not permitted to remain in the soil of the lands that had slain him. . . . He has left us the faith which bears his name. He has left us the august opportunity of everlasting life." But he will come again. Angels from the skies tarried behind the heavenly cavalcade which escorted the King of Glory through the uplifted gates of the New Jerusalem, to say to the bewildered and awed disciples, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." This promise has been the inspiration and reward of his messengers in all the generations since. They have gone forth with hope and joy to the proclamation of a risen and enthroned Lord, who will return to bring salvation to his people, and to crown them with everlasting life. "Earth, thou grain of sand on the shore of the universe of God; thou Bethlehem among the princely cities of the heavens; thou art, and remainest, the loved one amongst ten thousand suns and worlds, the chosen of God! Thee will he again visit, and then thou wilt prepare a throne for him, as thou gavest him a manger cradle; in his radiant glory wilt thou rejoice, as thou didst once drink his blood and his tears, and mourn his death! On thee has the Lord a great work to complete!" Help us, O most loving Father, to hasten the completion of thy work, that the time of his coming may speedily draw nigh. And may we be so faithful to our trust that we can echo the prayer of the last witness to tarry on the earth, of the chosen group of apostolic messengers, "Even so, come quickly, Lord Jesus!"

TOPIC FOR MAY 19.

A Nameless Girl Heroine.

(2 Kings 5:1-4. A union meeting with the Juniors.)

Here was a little maid far away from home, a captive, a slave, a stranger in a strange land Yet she does not repine, she does not grow morose and melancholy, she does not hate her captors, her mistress and her master.

She is a sprightly little creature. She speaks her mind fearlessly and with a certain enthusiasm, "O, would that!" etc. This is one of the beautiful things about childhood, that it does with its might and with a certain abandon, whatsoever it finds to do. Is it not possible that this is one of the qualities that makes them of the kingdom of heaven?

Once more, her faith in the prophet and the religion of her old home is worthy of remark. Surrounded by the religion of a foreign land, under the influence of new teachers and new conditions, she remembers her childhood faith and tells of it. Faithfulness to old things, old scenes, old friends, old and tried ideas, is a quality too rare among those that are older.

How often does it chance that a little child leads people to the right! Few city pastors are there—or any other pastors, for that matter—who do not find that little Sunday-school children often lead their own parents into the church. Few parents do not find that now and again their own children bring them to a pause with some high thought, some worthy aspiration, or some unselfish act.

I know of a very busy and prominent man who has a number of children, who declares that it is the influence of his children that keeps him in the straight path. He is in the midst of severe trials in business life, surrounded by the temptations that most severely try men, and it is the thought of his little ones at home that keeps him whole.

Here is a little girl leading to health and purity a leprous man of the world. It is a beautiful picture! No doubt the proud, worldly general's heart was touched with the leprosy that afflicted his body, and perhaps, at the same time that his flesh became as that of a little child, his heart may have been set right. But however that may be, it was the little child that led him into contact with the prophet of God, and with the cleansing, saving power. So has it been, many's the time, with others.

BABB.

Mrs. Dovie Babb was born in Kansas, July 10, 1873, died in Toluca, Ill., April 22, 1901. She is survived by a husband and three little children. Funeral sermon by the writer.

A. R. ADAMS.

COFFEY.

Joel A. Coffey was born in Burke county, N. C., June 10, 1818, and went home Sunday evening, March 24, 1901, just as the bell of the church he loved so much was ringing for the C. E meeting. He put on Christ at an early date and exemplified his profession by living a daily Christ-like life, and bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit. He left a rich legacy and goodly heritage to his family and friends by his noble life. On account of his sterling honesty and uprightness he held many positions of honor and trust, conferred upon him by the government and the people with whom he lived. Bro. Brazillian Blount, of Irvington, Ind., preached the funeral sermon and they laid him to sleep in the cemetery at Spencer, Ind. He was a good man and walked with God, and is not, for God took him. WILLIS M CUNNINGHAM.

Franklin, Ind., Box 165.

GEORGE HUGHES.

On the occasion of the last visit the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST made to Liberty, he was entertained, I have been told, in the hospitable home of Professor and Mrs. George Hughes. Not alone the editor, but preachers and other brethren far and near will remember the open and cordial hospitality of these good people, for their home was for many years one of the centres to which were attracted those who came to this town in the interests of the church. Now they are both in heaven. Bro. Hughes died Sunday, April 21, in his 75th year. Sister Hughes, as noted recently in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, preceded him about six weeks. He was born in Clay county and lived in it all his life, most of the time in Liberty. He was by profession a teacher and in this capacity served for many years in the schools of the county and as conductor of academic institutions in Liberty. He was for 35 years county superintendent of schools. He is believed by those who knew him well to have exerted more influence for the intellectual and moral betterment of the people of this county than any other man ever produced in it. Nov. 7, 1866, he and his wife confessed Christ and were baptized and were faithful and honored members of the Liberty church till the time of their death. Bro Hughes was for ten years president of the Commercial Bank of Liberty and enjoyed the confidence of the whole community as a safe, upright business man. He was for 25 years president of the Liberty Reading Club, and in this capacity exerted a wonderful influence on the literary life of this place. Bro. A. B. Jones officiated at his marriage 42 years ago and at his funeral paid him a high tribute, such as one intimate friend is capable of paying to another. Two sons, leading citizens of Liberty, Frank Hughes, a dry goods merchant and Ralph Hughes, a lawyer, remain to the community and the church to honor by sturdy Christian living the noble record of their father "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, yea saith the spirit, they rest from their labors and their works do follow them"

J. H. HARDIN.

Liberty, Mo.

[We remember with pleasure the warm Christian hospitality of Bro. and Sister Hughes, and tender our sympathy to the surviving sons and to the church, in their great loss. EDITOR.]

MOUDY.

Died in Harrisonville, Mo., April 20, Mrs. Sarah Moudy, widow of the late Elias Moudy, in her 82nd year. Since 1839 she has been a Disciple, strong in the faith and ever ready to defend it, and her life was in harmony with her profession. Next to her Bible, which she read daily, she read the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Five children, three sons and two daughters, followed her to her grave, after I had preached a funeral sermon to a crowded house at her old home at Everett in this county. "Her children rise up and call her blessed." S. W. CRUTCHER.

Harrisonville, Mo.

PHILIPS.

Elizabeth Philips, nee Berry, was born Nov. 1, 1816, in Berryville, Ky., and departed this life at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Harriet B. Stockton, Llano, Tex., April 11, 1901. She was married to John H. Philips in 1835. Nine children were born to this union, five of whom are still living. Sister Philips united with the Christian Church at Monticello, Ky., in 1832, she being one of the charter members of that congregation. She has lived a beautiful Christian life. Her last days proved that she had lived close to the Master's side. She was as trustful as a little child about her future life. We shall miss her but will not forget her until we meet in the great beyond. C. E SMOOTZ.

Llano, Texas.

REEDE.

Lela Jane Reede was born April 30, 1889, and died April 21, 1901. She was a lovable child and one that all who knew loved. Her death came after only two days of sickness. The funeral services were held in the Christian Church and were conducted by the writer and were largely attended by mourning friends.

F. L. DAVIS.

RITCHEY.

Died at his home in Kansas City, April 14, 1901, Samuel Ritchey, aged 74 years, 3 months and 10 days. The subject of this notice was born and grew to manhood near Lexington, Ky. United with the Church of Christ and was baptized by Elder John Smith. He moved to Clinton county, Mo., in 1856, where he continued to reside until his removal to Kansas City, thirteen years ago. The writer of these lines knew him intimately and was closely associated with him in organizing one of the finest Christian churches Clinton county ever had. He was set apart to the work of the eldership and discharged the duties of the office with perfect satisfaction for twenty-five years. He had the unlimited confidence of the church and the entire community and kept it as long as he lived. He studied the book closely, was a fine teacher and practiced what he taught He loved truth and real merit wherever he found them, but had no patience with empty show and needless ostentations. Bro. Ritchey was a modest, unassuming man in his manner, but positive and decided in his convictions. He was a lover of good men and good books, quick to sympathize with the poor or unfortunate and dispensed his charity with a liberal hand. Though dead, he yet speaks, and his memory will survive in the minds of his numerous friends for many years. He leaves behind to mourn his loss an excellent Christian wife, who shared with him the joys and sorrows of almost forty years and one son, Dr. W. W. Ritchey, a talented and promising young physician of Monroe City, Mo. May the good Lord help us all to so live that the same faith and hope that animated him through life sustain each and every one till our earthly pilgrimage shall close. J. S. T.

Book Notes.

Already are we receiving enthusiastic words of commendation for "The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century." It is certain that this is one of the most important additions to our literature in the past decade. No one who has an interest in the history, the development, the progress of the Disciples of Christ can afford to be without this book. It is a complete, authentic history of the rise and progress of our movement from the very beginning down to the present time, written by men thoroughly conversant with the facts. Cloth, 514 pages. Price, $2.

A. B. Jones' new book, "The Spiritual Side of Our Plea," is another volume of much real value to intelligent Disciples, dealing, as it does, with topics and phases of topics which have hitherto been rather neglected. This volume will help many to a clearer understanding of many things, and a broader conception of the teaching of Alexander Campbell and those who have succeeded him. Cloth, 394 pages. Price $1.50.

More and more are the Disciples of Christ becoming a reading people. Our book sales are steadily increasing. Every month shows a pleasing increase over corresponding month for previous year. The more progressive and intelligent any people becomes, the more books does it read. We are pleased to see our business increasing, of course, but we are also pleased to know that our brethren are advancing in knowledge.

Many requests are being received for Special Catalogue No. 31, our latest special price-list. It is full of attractive offers, and you should hasten to secure your copy. Everyone should secure some books for summer reading, and this little pamphlet will help you out, no matter what kind of literature you want. Prices are phenomenally low in this list, and you will save money by having a copy handy.

Another new volume which we have jus issued is "The Young Man from Middlefield," b Jessie Brown Pounds. This is a charmin story that ran in OUR YOUNG FOLKS du ing 1900. The demand for its publicatio in a permanent form was so general that w have issued it in a neat, cloth-bound volum of 257 pages. This is the kind of a book tha parents can safely put in the hands of the sons and daughters. The price is but Seventy five Cents, postpaid.

Disciples at the Pan American.

There is some misunderstanding as to th rates charged in Buffalo for accommodatio this summer. It is to be $1.00 a person fo lodging. Light breakfast is usually 25 cen extra, where given at all. This is the pric charged generally throughout the city. It to be added that this offer of ours to secu lodgings for visitors is not a business proce ure. We are simply acting as a committe which has in charge the organ fund of th Richmond Avenue Church of Christ. To th fund a percentage of all that is taken in b our Disciples is to be given. Some of ou folks expect to give the entire amount towa the organ fund. By writing to me, then, yo are helping our church along, and are payin only the regular lodging rate, which is to l charged everywhere.

We hope, too, that this committee will b able to promote acquaintance and good fe lowship among all visiting Disciples. Let u be of service to you, brethren, and you, to u (Local church papers please copy.)

SOME things are settled. This is a universe. There is one God whose laws run through all worlds and all eons. To live in right relations with this Creator and Moral Governor of the universe is the only true life. Jesus of Nazareth is the fullest and most satisfactory revelation of God's character and will which the world has ever seen or can see. He is also the highest ideal of manhood of which men can conceive, and the only perfect standard of morality and embodiment of true religion. His mind is the supreme test to which all religions, creeds, doctrines, institutions and customs must be brought. The whole process of civilization is only the process of bringing man's thought, laws, usages, social relations and religious life into conformity to the mind of Christ. His religion is the one universal, age-lasting, world-conquering religion, because it alone meets and satisfies the universal wants of our common humanity. To accept Christ fully, to trust Him wholly, to obey Him loyally, and to seek to effect the redemption and unification of humanity in Him is the highest duty of every man and the supreme mission of the church.

THE SPIRITUAL SIDE OF OUR PLEA.

By A. B. JONES.

This new volume is a notable contribution to a better understanding of the spiritual significance and value of our Reformatory Movement. It accentuates a side of our plea which has been too much neglected by many. It deals, in a profound manner, characteristic of its author, with such questions as "The Letter and the Spirit," "The Real and the Formal," "Alexander Campbell on Remission of Sins," "The Word and the Spirit," and "Righteousness and Law." The views herein expressed are the result of long and mature deliberation by one of the clearest thinkers and writers in our ranks.

Can You Write Shorthand?

DO YOU KNOW that there is a great demand for first-class stenographers? There are hundreds of "business colleges" and "stenographic schools" throughout the country that are annually turning out thousands of young men and women stenographers, and yet there is a constant call for really capable writers of shorthand. There is an over-supply of incompetents, but not nearly enough well-qualified stenographers to meet the demands of the business world, and consequently the young man or woman who thoroughly masters stenography can command a salary of from $75 to $150 per month.

PERHAPS you have thought that in order to become a first-class stenographer, it was necessary for you to leave home and attend a school, at a cost, all told, of several hundred dollars. If you have thought this, you have thought wrong. Many of the most expert stenographers in the country never saw the inside of a shorthand college, and had no other teacher than instruction books. If you have ordinary intelligence and a good knowledge of the English language, you can do as they did.

THE MORAN SERIES of Instruction Books in the Reporting Style of Shorthand is undoubtedly the best system ever offered. It is used in the best stenographic schools in the land. It is Thorough, Complete, Practical and especially adapted for self-instruction. If you secure this series of instruction books, all that is necessary to obtain a complete mastery of stenography is a reasonable amount of study and practice. There are seven books in the series, as follows:

The Reporting Style of Shorthand, Cloth, 312 pages	$1.50
Key to the Reporting Style of Shorthand, Cloth, 104 pages	2.00
The Shorthand Primer, Paper, 32 pages	.25
The Sign Book, Limp Cloth, 47 pages	.25
The Shorthand Dictionary, Cloth, 160 pages	1.00
One Hundred Valuable Suggestions, Cloth, 120 pages	1.00
The Students' Shorthand Manual, Cloth, 144 pages	1.00

Are you a student in some high school, academy, college or university? A moment's thought will convince you that a knowledge of shorthand will be of immense assistance to you, even if you do not intend to follow stenography as a profession. Why not secure these books, and put in the summer months learning shorthand? Are you engaged in business of any kind? Shorthand will save you a great deal of time and labor in the making of memoranda. Are you a preacher? Remember that the best authorities on sermonizing declare that all sermons should be written, whether the manuscript be taken into the pulpit or not. How easy to write your sermons if you can avoid the tedious, finger-cramping longhand!

A SPECIAL OFFER! While we will send any one of the volumes above mentioned on receipt of the price, we will, until further notice, make a special offer of the entire series of seven volumes, complete, for $5.00.

$5.00—The Complete Series—$5.00

This is a generous offer. These books cost far more to publish than the ordinary text-book, because of the special plates required, yet we make a very substantial reduction for the series, which, purchased volume by volume, would cost Seven Dollars. Send for the series, diligently apply yourself, and in three months you can equal the work of the average stenographer, and in six months will be expert. You will find that $5.00 thus spent will be the best investment you ever made.

"IN FAITH, UNITY; IN OPINION AND METHODS, LIBERTY; IN ALL THINGS, CHARITY."

Vol. xxxviii. St. Louis, Mo., Thursday, May 16, 1901. No. 20.

Current Events.

How far up Does it Go? A few weeks ago a cartoon under this title was published in Harper's Weekly. It referred to the police corruption which is being uncovered in New York City. A hideous hand holding a bag of bribery money reaches up from a sewer of vice and crime to a common policeman who stands ready to receive it. With the other hand the policeman passes a portion of the spoil to a higher police officer who stands on a step above him and who in turn passes part to the diamond-decked fist of a city politician, reaching down from above. And who can say how much higher it goes? New York has at present one practical reformer who is trying to find out how high the corruption goes. Justice Jerome, of the Court of Special Sessions, has laid aside any official dignity which might be considered to appertain to his office and has been going in person to conduct raids and serve warrants in disorderly houses and gambling dens. By these energetic measures he has collected much important evidence and will doubtless get more before he is through. It is not simply a question of punishing the keepers of illegal gambling houses, but of uncovering the conspiracy by which the police department has permitted violations of the law and has been systematically bribed to that end. It is a significant fact that Deputy Commissioner Devery, the notorious ex-chief of the police department and still virtually chief, claims to be unable to locate any gambling in the city, though Justice Jerome can discover places to raid several nights in the week. It leads one to suspect that Devery's eyesight is not good so far as gambling houses are concerned. Perhaps he is color-blind in such a way that the color of golden coin makes a strong impression upon his retina while the tint of the green cloth is invisible to him. And there are others besides Devery who are open to suspicion. Justice Jerome deserves general encouragement in his work.

The Tempest in Wall Street. The expected storm in the stock market broke on last Thursday. It was one of the most remarkable events in the history of American finance, but it was far from being a panic and the general business of the country suffered but slightly. The most sensational features were connected with the stock of the Northern Pacific Railroad. The relations of this road with the Union Pacific had precipitated a struggle between two combinations of immense strength, both trying to control the Northern Pacific. The Harriman-Schiff-Gould syndicate began pouring out millions to buy all the Northern Pacific stock in the market. James J. Hill, backed by J. P. Morgan, began pouring out other millions with the same end in view. Between the two the price went up by leaps and bounds, and many speculators, not understanding the nature of the fight, sold "short," hoping to be able to fill their contracts by buying later when the price had subsided. Presently it was discovered that there was a corner in Northern Pacific stock and that the two syndicates had contracted for more of this stock than there was in existence. A panic struck the "shorts" and the price ceased to leap and began to soar, rising in a few hours from $170 to $1,000 per share before the reaction came. Interest rates rose almost as rapidly as Northern Pacific stock. When the crisis was reached and all the speculative purchasers of other stocks wished to sell to realize their profits, there came a tremendous slump in the prices which had been climbing steadily week after week to points far above the real value of the property which they represented. Still there was no real panic, for, when the storm was passed, stocks quickly recovered and prices went up to a point not indeed equal to the inflated values of a week ago, but fairly commensurate with the earning power of the properties, and interest rates dropped quickly from 60 to 6 per cent. Russell Sage had the pleasure of saying "I told you so" in a more confident tone than any other man in New York, and the more substantial pleasure of lending several million dollars at from 40 to 60 per cent. In the sudden fluctuations of prices on that one day, some large fortunes were made and several were ruined. It was a particularly vivid illustration of the persistent folly of the speculative "lambs" whose imaginations are fired by every report of money made on Wall Street and who cast their thousands into the chaldron hoping to draw out millions—but in reality drawing blanks. The immorality of stock gambling, whether amateur or professional, will probably never appeal very strongly to some people, but the folly of it ought to be particularly apparent in a crisis like this that has just passed, which did not seriously disturb the legitimate business of the country but which ruined far more speculators than it enriched.

Closing the Saloons. Excise Commisioner Seibert, whose reputation with the good people of St. Louis has been hanging in the balance for several weeks, has turned the scale the right way by issuing an order compelling all saloons to close their doors from one to five A. M. There is no municipal statute requiring this and the provision is not inserted in the licenses which have been issued from the excise commissioner's office, and the saloonkeepers therefore protest that the action is arbitrary and illegal. Col. Bell, a former excise commissioner, in discussing the case says that the act is, of course, arbitrary, but by no means illegal, for the commissioner is clothed with absolute power in this matter to issue or refuse to issue licenses as he pleases and to make any regulation which may seem to him desirable. He could, if he pleased, revoke every license and close every saloon in the city. He is the only official in the state who is clothed with arbitrary power and there is no appeal from his decision to the courts or elsewhere. The all-night saloon is even more of an abomination than the all-day saloon and its abolition will materially assist the police in preserving order and suppressing crime. In spite of Carter Harrison's touching appeal in behalf of the thirst-smitten night-workers who need beer between midnight and sunrise and can't be happy till they get it, the opinion of the most reliable police officers is that the all-night saloon is, as a rule, the home of vice and nursery of crime. We hope that Mr. Seibert will have the courage of his convictions and will enforce to the letter this salutary order which he has issued. Perhaps after a while it will begin to dawn on the public mind that an institution which is an encourager of crime at night is probably not exactly a school of virtue in the daytime, and that the closing of the saloons for twenty-four hours out of every day would not, so far as the principle is concerned, involve any more unjustifiable encroachment upon personal liberty than the closing of them for four hours.

A Political Boomerang. The warm reception which the President has received in the southern states has probably less political significance than some have been inclined to attach to it. Possibly it has no political significance at all, but is the expression only of southern hospitality and of the patriotic idea that a president, whatever party he may belong to, is president of the whole country. But, in one way and another, the idea is getting abroad that the solid south is losing something of its solidity and that the time is not far distant when the two parties will be as evenly matched in the south as in the north. There can be no question but that the fear of negro domination is the one force which has kept the southern states solidly democratic during the past thirty years. That single issue, presented not in party platforms but in an ever-present social and industrial condition, has been paramount to all others. Before the war, when the negro was not a factor in the political situation, the south was not solid. Some of the greatest Whigs came from Mississippi, Louisiana and North Carolina and both sides of great national questions found strong advocates and numerous supporters throughout the south. This was entirely natural. But with the prospect of emancipation and, still more, with the enfranchisement of the negro, a new issue was introduced in which the better element in the south had a common interest. A new line of political cleavage was established and nearly all of the best men were on one side—against negro domination. But now again the negro is being eliminated from politics. By more or less illegal means he has been pretty thoroughly eliminated in most of the states for the past twenty years, but there was always the fear of federal interference. The action which has already been taken by four states, and which others have in prospect, to disfranchise the greater part of the negroes by adopting an educational requirement—sometimes with an exception in favor of the whites, such as North Carolina's "grandfather clause"—will effectually eliminate the negro vote and will thereby make democratic majorities for a time still more certain and overwhelming. But the removal of the negro from the sphere of politics will mean also the removal of the fear of negro domination which, as before said, is the chief thing which keeps the south solidly democratic. It is to be seriously questioned whether this step, taken unquestionably in the interest of the democratic party, will not, in the long run, work the other way. The Alabama iron manufacturer, for example, who believes in protection, expansion and the gold standard, but always votes the Democratic ticket because he considers the Republican party the "nigger party," may be inclined to change his vote when his state has, as it probably will, put the negro out of the way by a constitutional amendment.

Cuba and the Amendment. The friendly attitude of the Cuban Commission toward the Platt Amendment before they left Washington and their advocacy of it since their return to Cuba would be a fairly certain evidence that the Constitutional Convention would accept it, were it not for the known peculiarities of the Latin-American mind. These being as they are, it is scarcely safe to assume even that the recommendation of a commission chosen by the convention will have much weight, if its report should be at variance with the preconceived opinions of the delegates. So there is nothing to do but await developments and cautiously avoid over-confident prediction. The Committee on Relations consists of six members, four of whom formerly signed a report which, while not rejecting the Platt Amendment, was interpreted as hostile to it. One of the four is known to have changed his mind since. But even if the committee is favorable to the acceptance of the Platt Amendment, there is no more certainty that the convention will accept its report than that it will be moved by the recommendation of the Commission. Whatever objection there may be to the provisions of the amendment might come more reasonably from the United States than from Cuba. Those who consider it inconsistent with the Teller resolution must naturally oppose it in the interest of our national honor. But whether consistent with the Teller resolution or not, it imposes no practical hardship or limitation of liberty upon Cuba, but guarantees only that the United States shall in the future have the recognized right to interfere again as it interfered three years ago, if the necessity arises.

Indemnity and Famine. After three months of deliberation, the representatives of the Powers at Pekin have reached a conclusion as to the amount of indemnity to be paid by China and have presented a joint note fixing the total at 450,000,000 taels, or about $325,000,000. The question of how this is to be raised is one which the ministers do not care to handle and the Chinese must settle that for themselves. Li Hung Chang and Prince Ching, the principal Chinese peace commissioners, have more to do with this than any one else. The report that a loan would be asked had only brief currency. Orders came from the imperial court almost immediately to provide for the raising of the money by the customs and without borrowing. With admirable promptness, which is strikingly in contrast with the deliberateness of the rest of the proceedings, the Chinese commissioners have submitted to their emperor a plan for paying the money in thirty annual installments; ten million taels to be raised annually by salt tax, three million from native customs and two million from the likin, or tax on importations from one province into another. The national revenue is to be increased also by an additional tariff. It has now become certain that the reports of suffering from famine in the provinces west of Pekin were not idle rumors. The worst reports have been fully confirmed. Minister Conger, who is now in the United States, adds his testimony to the report that almost nothing has been raised in the Shansi and Shensi provinces during the last two years and that there will be an immense amount of suffering unless relief is sent. The Chinese government, of course, is not in a position to take any effective steps in this direction at present. It will be much to the credit of the world-powers if, while they are settling the matter of indemnities, they will take time to consider the necessities of those who are starving in the western provinces. A relief fund has already been started by the Christian Herald of New York City.

The Sultan's New Move. Apprehensive lest there might be some plot on foot against himself, the Sultan of Turkey has taken a long contemplated step in demanding the abolition of the foreign post offices in Constantinople. Unfortunately for him, the formal demand was preceded by an arbitrary seizure and detention of mail bags which were in the care of these offices, and the foreigners are now in no temper to make concessions. Five of the European Powers have established post offices in Constantinople for the convenience of their own citizens and any one else who chooses to use them, and the great body of business correspondence which enters and leaves the Turkish capital goes through these rather than through the Turkish post office. Perhaps the Sultan is not to be blamed for objecting to this arrangement, for its existence is a visible criticism of his government. But considering the autocratic character of his government and its penchant for arbitrarily interfering with everything which is not definitely protected by a foreign government, the foreign post offices are necessary institutions. The Sultan asserts that they have no treaty basis and that he will no longer endure them. The fact is, doubtless, that a new set of plots against the Sultan has been discovered or suspected, and he wants to exercise a more complete surveillance over all foreign correspondence than is possible while most of it is protected by the flag of one or another of the great Powers.

A Good Omen for the Fair. It was a hard blow to many enterprising real estate speculators when the St. Louis House of Delegates passed a bill offering the use of any of our three best parks for the Louisiana Purchase Exposition in 1903. Plans were on foot to buy up tracts of land in available locations here and there, one of which could be sold to the Exposition Company for the site of the World's Fair of 1903. The question of the site is not yet decided, but it is scarcely conceivable that the company will prefer to spend a large sum of money for the purchase of a less desirable site when a position so eligible as the western half of Forest Park is offered free of charge. It will be remembered that there is only one city park in the world larger than Forest Park, and few, if any, possess greater natural beauty. The eastern part is improved, but the western half is almost in the state of nature, and would offer an incomparable site for an exposition, the chief charm of which would be not a wide expanse of water-front, as at the Chicago exposition, but broad lawns, ancient and magnificent trees and shady lagoons. Here is a great opportunity to give the Louisiana Purchase Exposition a beautiful and unique setting worthy of the great event which it commemorates.

Brevities. The Society for Ethical Culture recently celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary. It has been from its foundation up to the present time under the direction of Dr. Felix Adler.

Russell Sage said he had conscientious scruples against lending money to be used in speculation on Wall Street. That was when money was at six per cent. When it went up to sixty Mr. Sage looked at matters differently.

The National Convention of the Southern Baptists is in session this week at New Orleans. A resolution was presented to the convention declaring it unscriptural to ask for the indemnity for the destruction of missionary property in China.

William M. Jenkins was inaugurated as Governor of Oklahoma Territory on Monday of this week. The term of office is four years and before the time comes for the appointment of a new governor, we hope to see Oklahoma fully installed as a state of our Union.

Mr. Schwab, president of the Steel Trust, has been giving testimony before the Industrial Commission in Washington, showing why a protective tariff on steel should be continued. If he can do that he is worth the million-dollar salary which we have heard so much about lately. If the tariff were removed, he says, the blow would fall upon the laborers and not upon the capitalists—which is probably true. It would "fall" just where the capitalist should choose to have it fall, and Mr. Schwab's admission that there would be a reduction in wages but no reduction in dividends is somewhat significant, though perhaps not in the way which he intended.

A New Crusade by the Children.

The old crusade to recover the tomb of Christ from the control of the Saracens, in which the children joined with such enthusiasm, and in which thousands of them laid down their young lives, ought to have been a revelation to the world of the possibilites of childhood in connection with the religion of Jesus. But it was strangely overlooked. It remained for our own time to inaugurate a new crusade by the children, differing from the old one both in its aim and method. The new crusade aims not to recover the empty tomb of Jesus, but to send the story of the risen Christ into all the world, and especially to those who sit in the darkness of heathenism. Its method is not that of war, of the destruction of human life, nor the capture of cities, nor are its weapons carnal. Armed with truth, inspired by love and clothed with innocence and purity, the little crusaders of our day march forward to the music of the cross to scatter the darkness from heathen lands by making known Christ who brought life and immortality to light.

The one point of unity between the old crusade and the new is that in each there was a passion for Jesus of Nazareth and a desire to honor his name. But how much loftier the aim, how much nobler the spirit, how much more Christlike the method, of this new crusade! Not a dead Christ, but one who has conquered death and who lives forever more, inspires the heart of the children to-day as they go forth in this blessed ministry of blessing the world. The little hands in this new crusade bear no swords nor torches, but are filled with flowers and with their offerings for the spread of the gospel. Theirs is not the cry of the warrior nor the blast of the war-trumpet, but they come singing the sweet songs of Jesus and His love.

What a mighty host of children from our homes and our Sunday-schools will be marshaled on Children's Day under the banner of the cross, formed in groups and companies all over the United States, and perhaps in far-off pagan lands, to bring their offerings of love, to sing their songs of praise, and to take their part in the public exercises of the day dedicated to the children's new crusade. What an inspiring scene it must present as looked down upon by the witnessing hosts above—this great army of children in clean dresses, with bright faces, with happy hearts, with offerings in their hands, with songs in their mouths, presenting their gifts and their sacrifices, and offering their young lives on the altar of Christ! Surely heaven is made happier, the earth made brighter and the church richer by such a scene.

But there are many homes and many schools whose children have not yet joined this new crusade to carry the good news of the risen Christ around the world. This is a great loss to them and to the future church, as well as to the heathen world. Let all make an effort to see that this army of young crusaders is swelled this year into larger proportions than ever, and that their offerings shall be such as will enrich their own lives while they send the water of life to the many perishing ones of earth.

The lines of Mrs. A. S. Hardy in the American Mother form an appropriate conclusion to this article:

In the days of ancient story
Children marched, a valiant band,
Fighting with the bold Crusaders
For the Christ and Holy Land.

For they bore the cross-wrought banner
By their knightly hands unfurled;
In their zeal for God ne'er dreaming
Holy Land is all the world.

Slow are men to see the footprints
Of the Christ of Holy Rood;
Or to hear His lips' sweet teaching
Of a human brotherhood.

In these days of larger vision
Children join a new Crusade;
Better than the sword's swift smiting
Is their knighthood's accolade.

Sans reproach these cavaliers!
Knighthood's heart must be as clean
As were theirs, who, legends tell us,
Fought the ancient Saracene.

In their hands the cross-wrought banner,
By the breath of God unfurled,
Shall in holy zeal be carried
To the limits of the world.

Pure as Grail-Knights be, Oh children!
And an ever conquering band
Ye shall then be, true Crusaders
For the Christ and Holy Land.

A Call for Aid.

The city of Jacksonville, Florida, as our readers know, has met with a great calamity. Its business houses, its dwellings, its churches, have been laid low and they are face to face with the problem of building a new city. The various churches there are calling upon their brethren elsewhere to help them. It is but right they should do so under the circumstances and it would be wrong for their brethren not to help them. If we are to "bear one another's burdens and so fulfill the law of Christ," then surely here is an opportunity for doing so. We had already written an appeal for our brethren there when we received an appeal from the church signed by Rufus A. Russell from which we make the following extracts showing the situation there. Let us try to put ourselves in their places and do unto them as we would in like circumstances have them do unto us:

All of our brethren over the country have doubtless read of Jacksonville's disaster. It is too terrible to describe. Ninety-three families of the First Christian Church lost all they had, many of them only saving the clothes they had on. Not a church was left in the heart of the city. The city will be rebuilt rapidly, and we ought to be among the first on the ground. Other religious people have put large sums of money into Florida. They will erect better buildings than before. Some of these people have already announced that it will not be necessary for any member, or any citizen of Jacksonville, to give a dollar towards their new buildings, as money will come from the North. Our members expect to do all they possibly can.

We had practically provided for a $20,000 house, and work would have begun last Monday but for the fire. We regret to appeal to others, but we believe the needs of the cause of Christ here justify it. With a good house and that right away, we can easily be the largest and most influential people in the city. We have the promise of Bro. Charles Reign Scoville for a meeting next November, and we should have our building completed by that time. We will continue work on our building, in full assurance that the Disciples of Christ will not let the cause of Christ suffer. Hear the Macedonian cry "come over and help us."

Bro. Russell then reports the introductory measures taken by the First Church to bring about a union of the two congregations there, to which we have already referred in these columns. This is especially important in view of the fact that the two churches were preparing to build within two blocks of each other. This would be an unpardonable piece of folly, and now that the destructive fire has visited that city and swept a large part of it out of existence, it is to be hoped that the brethren will see their way to adjust their differences and form a united church in that important center. The proposition of the First Church provides, in the event of the failure of the churches to agree on a basis of union, to leave the matter to a committee of disinterested brethren to say what should be done under the circumstances. There is no good reason why this proposition should not be accepted, and we feel sure that it will be, especially now that the great disaster has come upon that city and all hearts should be drawn closer together.

The church at Jacksonville deserves help from the brotherhood in putting up the building they have in contemplation, and any contributions for this purpose should be sent to B. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, and should pass through the General Board. These contributions, however, should not be permitted to interfere with the May offering for general Home Missions. This is an extra crisis and demands extra generosity on the part of the brotherhood.

In a letter from the architect, Mr. Frank C. Walter, of Columbia, S. C., who has the contract for making the design for the new church, and who has generously cut his fee in the middle, says: "I could not help but admire the courage and good cheer of these splendid people and the energy with which they are forging ahead to overcome all obstacles. Mr. Boone lost everything except his Bible, his typewriter and the church records. Mr. Challen lost his law office and library. The Metropolis newspaper office was entirely destroyed."

With all these facts before the brotherhood, we feel sure that, without diminishing the offering for Home Missions, many will feel disposed to lend a helping hand to these brave but impoverished brethren, who are determined that their plans for the new church shall not be frustrated by the calamity that has befallen them. Let pledges or cash contributions be sent through the Cincinnati office as above stated and marked for the Jacksonville Church.

"Raising Money."

If giving is a Christian grace and a mode of worship, why should we not have more giving and less raising money? The latter expression always suggests a sort of hold-up process, whereby currency is extracted from an unwilling people. It certainly does not represent the giver as an active participant in the process, but rather as the passive object upon which an operation is performed. Worship is active, not passive. In "raising money" only one man is active—the man who stands before the people and begs until his persuasiveness overcomes their reluctance or his persistence wears out their patience. The raiser implores and the raisee resists—even as the elect sinner, under the Calvinistic regime, was supposed to co-operate with God for his own salvation solely by resisting the operation of divine grace, and to be saved by it finally as the greater force of the grace overcame the lesser force of his resistance. So at last enough dollars are dragged out to meet the necessities of the case and the congregation rises and sings, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow,"—each man thankful that the others have given enough to relieve him from the annoyance of future appeals. A true expression of the feelings of those from whom money has thus been "raised" would be this: "Well, that job is paid for at last, and now, thank God, I can enjoy the blessed privilege of unlimited stinginess for a season."

The doxology under those conditions is a mockery. It means worse than nothing if it does not mean an expression of gratitude for the privilege of worshiping God by helping with money the advancement of His kingdom. Money that is "raised" for missions or church expenses or church building accomplishes only half its mission; it pays the missionary or the preacher or the debt, to be sure, but that is all. But money that is given, cheerfully and worshipfully given, "is twice blessed; it blesseth him that gives and him that takes."

Notes and Comments.

Walter Savage Landor was pre-eminently a critic, a literary critic, one of that class of men whose chief delight is supposed to be the picking of flaws in other men's work, especially the work of men who are yet young and have their reputations still to make. But Aubrey de Vere says of Landor that "he enjoyed praising as inferior men enjoy sneering." With this may be coupled the saying—especially timely in this merry month of May, when the spring poet, despised and too-numerous creature, is abroad in the land—that "he who shuts up his heart against the new poet loses favor with the Gods, now as of old."

We have recently heard of a congregation in a Missouri town which became dissatisfied with the evangelist—an excellent and faithful preacher—who was holding a meeting for them, because he did not "whale the sects" enough to suit their taste! We did not know that there was a church of that kind left, and we must believe the number is exceedingly small and growing beautifully less. We are continually having requests from churches to recommend an evangelist who knows how to preach the gospel faithfully and with love and courtesy for all. That is the kind of evangelist that is now in demand among the churches.

"The higher criticism of the Bible is simply the supreme instance of the severe but gracious process whereby believers to-day are passing from idolatry of the letter to the worship of the spirit," says Dr. George A. Gordon in "The New Epoch for Faith." Higher criticism is, no doubt, doing something in the direction indicated, but after all there is nothing like the spirit of God to free one from the bondage of the letter or a crass literalism. Life is more potent in overcoming disease of any kind than any medicine. But both higher critics and the advocates of the highest type of spiritual life must beware that in destroying the idolatry of the letter, they do not disregard the proper service of the letter in relation to both truth and life.

The Pan-American Exposition was really opened May 1, but the formal opening, we are told, is to take place May 20. Strange to say, we have not yet heard of any one's being confused by this announcement, or of any one's staying away from the exposition until the 20th on the ground that there can be no opening before the formal opening.

Maine has passed a law imposing a fine upon those hunters who shoot people for deer. If it is not more rigorously enforced than the prohibition law in that state, it will not be safe for the people up there to venture into the woods during the deer season.—Washington Post.

Still, if the worst comes, and hunters continue to "shoot people for deer" in violation of the law, the business might be "regulated" by requiring hunters to pay a license for the privilege of shooting people, provided, of course, the shooters can furnish evidence of "good moral character."

The newspapers a few days ago contained an inconspicuous notice of the death by heart-failure of a stock speculator on the day when the market broke and prices fell. He stood before the ticker, and as the tape came out, saw that his stocks were going lower and lower. A low cry was heard and he was picked up dead. There were two things the matter with this man besides heart-failure: First, he was seeking wealth by a road which is wrong as well as risky; and second, he was placing upon stocks and the money which they represent a vastly higher estimate than they deserved. The man who has no treasure but money may well succumb to heart-failure when it suddenly leaves him. A Christian view of life, showing things in their proper perspective, is a sure preventive of heart-failure caused by the loss of anything so relatively unimportant as money. Where a man's treasure is there will his heart be; and when a man's whole treasure fails him it is not surprising if his heart does the same.

The Rockford Register has this pertinent comment on the subject of ecclesiastical affiliation and co-operation:

> The tendency of the age towards the consolidation of all lines of business enterprise is something wonderful, and in the main is proving beneficial, as the processes employed result in economic savings in production and distribution and a cheapening of cost to the consumer. We are prompted to ask why the same plan should not be applied to our churches? Why should there be six churches when one would do the work? Why six poor sermons from poorly paid pastors when there might be one good sermon from one well paid? Why six quarreling and inferior choirs and six janitors, six prayer-meetings, six Endeavor, Mission and Ladies' Aid societies, six slim congregations, when consolidation would give a strong, effective organization inspired by numbers and economic in all its operations?

A great many people are raising such questions as the foregoing, whose voices are not heard in church congresses, ministerial alliances or even in the prayer-meeting. Hard-headed business men who take a practical view of religious interests, as they do of every other interest, are asking questions like these, and it is going to be more and more troublesome for the advocates of the present order of things in the church to furnish satisfactory answers to these questions.

Editor's Easy Chair.

What can be done to check the suicidal tendency which at present seems to be on the increase? On the first Sunday in May five women in the city of St. Louis attempted to destroy their lives, two of them succeeding. Let the students of sociology look into this question. It is one that needs more thoughtful consideration than it has yet received. To most of us life seems most desirable in spite of its burdens, its cares, its disappointments. The world is beautiful, especially in May with its fresh young leaves, its fragrant air, its blue skies and the joy of all living things. Why should one be in haste to get away from such a world? Surely it is a great thing to live. Browning sings:

> "O, the wild joy of living!
> How good is man's life, the mere living, how fit to employ
> All the heart and the soul and the senses forever in joy!"

And yet how differently must feel those unfortunates who, by their own hand, seek to end their lives and rush unbidden into the world that lies beyond! Life must have gone hard indeed with them, and hope, which springs eternal in the human breast, must have died out, to make such an act possible. Let us not condemn too severely, however, where we know not the causes which may have extinguished hope and dethroned reason. We may well, however, give more attention to the conditions and causes which lead to so deplorable a result.

A physician in this city who has given much attention to the subject of suicides, and being in a position where he has had large opportunities for observation, gives it as his opinion that more that 50 per cent. of suicides are the result of homesickness. He calls attention to the fact that a great majority of these occur, not as we might suppose, in the drear and desolate winter, but in the springtime when Nature is clothing the earth with such grace and loveliness. It is at such season of the year that those who have come from their country homes to the cities to seek their fortune, remember the old homestead and call up the scenes and associations of the past, and their hearts grow homesick and weary of life. They see, in imagination, the blooming orchards, the green meadows, the fresh young grass about the old home, and hear once more the twitter of the birds in the trees as they heard them in the days gone by. All this they contrast with their present surroundings in the city, and an unutterable longing seizes the heart for the old rural home. Why, then, do they not return? it may be asked. Perhaps they cannot. The old home may have been sold, or a father's stern edict may bar the way to their return, or it may be that a false pride prevents them from going back to the old scenes. What is more probable still, there may be no way by which they can earn a livelihood there, and so they feel compelled by the same causes which brought them to the city to remain there. Pathetic beyond description is the sacrifice of a young life because it lacks those surroundings and associations which seem to make life worth living.

To the extent that the foregoing cause is responsible for suicide, a remedy does not seem to be impossible. There are more young people coming to the cities than can find remunerative employment. This fact has long been apparent to those of us who live in the city, and it should cause a halt on the part of parents in sending their sons and daughters to the city, and in the young people themselves in leaving their homes in the country without some certain prospect of profitable employment elsewhere. And yet we realize how useless this advice is in the face of existing conditions. Improvements in agricultural machinery, by which a single machine does the work of ten men, are driving thousands of our young men from the farm into the cities to find employment. Still we think if the true condition of things in the city were understood, there would be greater effort on the part of farmers to supply some sort of employment for their sons and their daughters which would keep them out of the cities. And then is it not possible to look a little more carefully into the condition and surroundings of those who go to the cities? It makes all the difference in the world where one locates, what are his surroundings, who are his associates, where he spends his evenings, and what moral and religious influences are thrown about him. The people who commit suicide in the city are not, as a rule, those whose associations are good and healthy, and who are attendants on religious services, and workers in some part of the Lord's vineyard. They have seen the side of city life, perhaps, that is darkest and most forbidding, and one which stands in awful contrast with the innocence and purity of the home-life which they left in the country.

After all the true remedy for this growing evil is for parents and teachers and ministers of the gospel to impress on the minds of the young the sacredness and worth of human life. It is an undervaluation of life—of its meaning and of its sacredness—that lies behind every case of suicide, except where disease or other causes have dethroned reason. We read of suicides and attempted suicides for the most trivial causes, showing an utter failure to appreciate the value of life and the fact of personal accountability to God for the proper care and use of it. Education that opens up the avenues of life, broadens the horizon of thought, and gives the power to understand and appreciate the beauty of the world in which we live, and religion, which emphasizes the sacredness of life and the value of the human soul, and which, through faith, enables one to view the life that now is in the light of the eternal world, and which teaches us to bear with fortitude, patience, and resignation the misfortunes and privations of this present world—these are the only effectual remedies for that tendency to self-destruction which is one of the saddest features of our modern civilization. But the education and the religion which fail to cool the feverish haste to be rich, to check the unbridled greed for gain, to curb the passions and appetites and bring the lower nature in subjection to the higher, are lacking in vital and essential elements which must be supplied before we can hope to be free from the appalling evil to which we have referred, and many others which cry to heaven for an effectual remedy.

Questions and Answers.

What is involved in the scriptural phrases "forgiveness of sins" and "remission of sins"?
Titus.

There are three things, as it seems to us, which much be included in the meaning of these expressions: (1) The actual putting away of sin from the heart and from the life. (2) The change in God's feeling and attitude toward the sinner, made possible by this change in the sinner, and synchronous with it. (3) The divine pledge or assurance of forgiveness given in baptism. These are the natural changes that would seem to occur in any case of alienation, as between a parent and a child, for instance. The child, conscious of having done wrong, confesses its error and promises to turn from it; whereupon the parent immediately feels different toward the child and gives assurance, in some way, of his forgiveness. We may conceive of the two latter acts as one—the parental forgiveness—but we may also analyze it, because, as a matter of fact, the assurance of forgiveness, either by word or deed, must follow and express the feeling and purpose which have preceded it. The Scriptures ordinarily speak of remission of sins as one act, but we know that there must be, in the nature of things, because the Scriptures so teach, the actual turning away from sin and the formal assurance of forgiveness, and between these two we know that God's attitude toward the penitent believer is different from what it was before he became such. If we narrow down the meaning of forgiveness or remission of sins to the single thought of remitting the penalty of sin, we rob these phrases of their richest and best meaning.

What is the best solution of the problem of unity in religion and in church relations in the case of a young married couple who belong to different religious bodies? O. I.

This often becomes a problem of serious import and should be considered very thoughtfully and prayerfully. Neither party can ask the other to sacrifice any convictions of truth and duty. It would be far better for them to live in separate churches than for either to make any sacrifice of conscience. As a rule, however, it is possible to solve the question without any sacrifice of truth or conscience and without the necessity of living in separate churches. There are certain things held in common by the husband and wife if they are really Christians. The things which they thus hold in common are what make them Christians. The things wherein they differ are the things not essential to their Christianity. Why should they not agree, then, to give up the things about which they differ, or hold them as private opinions and unite upon the things in which they agree? Supposing that they both agree to this reasonable principle, it only remains for them to determine in which one of their churches, if in either, they can be received on the things in which they agree. Suppose one of them has conscientious convictions against wearing any party name. The other one can have no conscientious convictions against wearing a scriptural name that is common to all Christians. Suppose again one or the other has objections to something in the creeds of the various denominations, and does not believe in having any human creed. The other assuredly does believe on Jesus Christ as the foundation of the church, and regards that as the all-sufficient faith in order to salvation. Suppose again one of the parties has objections to certain rules and regulations which many of the churches have adopted. The other would be an unreasonable Christian not to agree to be governed simply by the New Testament Scriptures. But let us suppose, once more, that one of them regards immersion, or a burial in water, as the true New Testament baptism and does not regard sprinkling and pouring as modes of baptism, but as something entirely different from that which was commanded, In all probability the other, if they differ upon that subject, does, nevertheless, believe that immersion is valid baptism as well as sprinkling and pouring. On the principle of uniting on what they agree in, why should they not accept that which they both believe to be valid, and unite on that? If there is an earnest desire to be right, as well as to be in the same church, it seems to us the problem can be solved along this line of procedure.

What is the meaning of 1 Cor. 13: 10–12?
John McKinnon.

In the Revised Version the passage reads: "For we know in part, and we prophesy in part: but when that which is perfect is come, that which is in part shall be done away. When I was a child, I spake as a child, I felt as a child, I thought as a child: now that I am become a man, I have put away childish things. For now we see in a mirror, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I have been known." With that prophetic spirit which characterized the true apostle, Paul expresses his perfect confidence in the passing away of the imperfect order of things and the bringing in of a new and more perfect order. No one can believe in God and in his divine purpose without sharing this hope as to the future. The present condition of things, he says, is transient because it is imperfect, and it will give way to that which is perfect and permanent. This truth is illustrated by his own experience. The things which interested him as a child, the feelings he then experienced, and the words with which he expressed those feelings and thoughts, all passed away when he became a man. So, he argues, will it be when we have reached the true goal of life and have realized the purpose for which we were created. At present our knowledge is imperfect. We see but a small arc of the infinite circle of truth, and what we do see we see imperfectly as one looking into a mirror, such a mirror as was then in use. But in the coming time, "when that which is perfect is come," it will be different. "Then shall I know even as also I have been known." Perhaps the apostle has no definite time in mind, but only the great consummation of all things, come when it may.

Can a true Christian man be a successful merchant in this age? A Subscriber.

A man cannot be genuinely successful without being a true Christian man. There is plenty of sharp practice, selfishness and deceit in the commercial world, but these are in the long run drawbacks and not aids to success. Argument is unnecessary when it is easy to point to hundreds of successful merchants who are true Christian men.

Infallibility of the Bible

By JOHN AUGUSTUS WILLIAMS

The doctrine of the infallibility of the Bible, so generally held as an essential item of Christian faith, can not logically rest on our own knowledge of what is true; for such knowledge, it is assumed, is largely derived from the Bible itself. Nor can it rest on any statement of the Scriptures themselves to that effect, for none is found. And if such statements abounded, it would be only a vicious circle to argue from them that the Bible is infallible.

Historically, the doctrine seems to have been born of a purpose to offset the assumption of an infallible Church by opposing that of an infallible Book; for it was supposed that in religion and ethics there was needed an explicit authority to bind the conscience and to fetter the erratic judgment of men. If the church is not such authority, they argued, then the Bible must be, unless we rely, as some do, on the inner light.

The argument for the Bible's infallibility is brief, and was satisfactory to the church in earlier times. They assumed, strangely it may seem to us, that the Bible, as we now have it, is from Genesis to Revelation the Word of God and the whole of his Word, so far as he has spoken to man, forgetting that God speaks to his children through other mediums than human language—through nature and history and the conscience. The inference to their minds was conclusive—the Bible is an all-sufficient revelation of truth, infallible in all its utterances, faultless in all its teachings, and so absolute in its authority that reason, science and experience must yield to it.

The impossibility of making a revelation in human speech that shall be at once explicit and verbally infallible never occurred to our fathers; or if any such inherent difficulty occurred to them, they believed that plenary inspiration could overcome it. So they held and taught that the Bible, being thus inspired in every word, was free from any error whether of statement or of doctrine.

But the day has gone by when thoughtful men will accept this teaching; they now challenge the grounds on which the doctrine is based. Ganssen, of Geneva, perhaps the ablest advocate of the plenary, verbal inspiration of the Scriptures, insisted that every verse, word and letter of the Bible, as we now have it, is equally inspired of God, is his Word and therefore inerrant and should be implicitly received as such by every Christian. This view is still carelessly held by many, and is what they usually mean by the statement that the Bible is the infallible Word of God.

The scholarship of the age, we repeat, has rejected this theory of Ganssen, and its continued maintenance by the church is one of the principal causes of the widespread infidelity of the day. A glance at the infidel writings of the times reveals the fact that the weightiest objections brought against our religion are directed against the consequences of this supposed verbal inspiration and inerrancy of the Old and the New Scriptures.

One fact has often perplexed those who hold that view—and that is the necessity for constant and doubtful interpretation. Assuming that no errors of statement can exist in any Scriptures given by inspiration, the question still continually arises, what do the Scriptures mean? Owing to the imperfection of human language, the most carefully written document is not always perspicuous. In the state, courts are established whose function it is to construe or interpret legal enactment, and even constitutions, usually the most transparent of human compositions, require an authoritative interpreter. The great political parties of the country have originated from different interpretations of our national constitutions. And the many discordant bells that jar on the stillness of our Lord's day mornings clash with the conflict of interpretations. Inspiration itself, when using human speech, is necessarily embarrassed by the imperfection of its medium.

An infallible book, therefore, virtually becomes an ambiguous or obscure one, unless we have an infallible interpreter. This has been offered to Christendom in the infallible priest at Rome, and sometimes by Protestant priests outside of Rome, and more frequently by expository creeds, which, however, equally need interpretation themselves.

The prevalent idea among Protestants, however, is that the Bible should be left to be interpreted in freedom by each Christian for himself, responsible only to God for the honesty of his endeavors to understand it. The result has been that its infallibility has been reduced practically to obscurity or contradiction.

To illustrate this thought: we may select one of the most important statements of the New Testament, say for example Mark 16:16: "He that believes and is baptized shall be saved." This statement, whatever it may mean, is assumed to be infallibly true. But what does it mean? We must interpret it. And first, is it any part of the inspired Scriptures? The majority of modern critics reject it, we are doubtful then whether it is any part of the Bible at all. But secondly, what is meant by believing, and what must be believed? Christian expositors differ on these points. Thirdly, what is meant by baptism? Christians widely disagree here also, and have disagreed for centuries. Lastly, what is meant by being saved? I have heard this word variously interpreted by honest and intelligent Christians. In this brief statement then, four vital questions arise as to what the infallible text really teaches, or whether it is any part of the inspired Word at all.

Now I have opinions on all these points; but others with equal right and ability of judgment have theirs, and we may widely differ. What then is the value of the doctrine of verbal or literal infallibility? Shall I assume that my own judgment is infallible, and that my own interpretation of the text is the true Word of God?

To say that an infallible text is always true whether we perceive its truth or not—is but a truism. Of course, truth itself is always infallible whether we discover it or not—whether revealed in history, nature or the Bible. But the trouble is to understand it rightly when vaguely expressed.

The main question still recurs, while truth may be found abundantly in the Scriptures, where spiritually and rightly interpreted, yet as a library of books, are they absolutely free from error from Genesis to Revelation? Are there no mistakes, no inaccuracies of statement either of fact or doctrine? The theory of verbal infallibility would preclude the possibility of such imperfections. But that doctrine rests again upon the assumption of a plenary, verbal inspiration of the Scriptures which cannot be proved. It is usually argued that the Bible must be infallible in all of its statements in order to be authoritative—that a book confessedly erroneous in any of its statements can never bind the conscience. Authority is thus based on literal infallibility, and that again on its verbal inspiration.

But before we can conclude that our present Bible is thus literally inspired, we must assume that the early copyists who transcribed the text from which our present version is made were inerrant. Now there are many thousands of various readings to be found in these copies. We must assume also that those who compiled the present canon made no mistake in their selection of books. Now many think that the compilers have admitted some books that they should have rejected, and rejected some which should have been admitted. Besides, our Bible is a translation, and as such abounds in errors. There are no original autograph writings of any of the sacred scribes to be found in the world. Whatever, therefore, we may affirm respecting the verbal accuracy of the original manuscripts cannot be affirmed of any version that we have.

What then becomes of the literal infallibility of our present Bible? It cannot be logically maintained. But what becomes of its authority as a spiritual and religious guide and standard of truth? It still remains not only unimpaired, but exalted. The Bible is elevated to its proper rank as transcendently higher in character and authority than all other religious classics of the world. Its authority rests not on its verbal infallibility, but on the superior spiritual insight and attainments of its authors. The inspiration that pervades the Scriptures, or rather which moved the sacred writers, was by no means uniformly equal in power. It is greater in some portions of Scripture than in others. It reaches its highest exaltation in the Christian Scriptures, and even there it is broader, deeper and higher in the reported sayings of Jesus, and in the writings of John and Paul.

When we can once bring Christian people to the rational study of the Bible as the purest, noblest, richest of all sacred books and to a rational interpretation and use of its inspired contents, it will become indeed a book of light and life, and a source of comfort and strength under all circumstances and to all classes of men.

Something.

By William Morgan Cochran.

Something—either a memory from out
The distant past, a holy guest, or else
A speaking presence in my soul—reveals
A realm replete with heaven's realities.
It makes me lover of all form and sound;
All motion, and all spirit that inspires;
"All thinking things, all objects of all thought,"
And "all the mighty world of eye and ear"—
All that we may behold in earth or heaven.
I may not know from whence this holy guest
Or presence came. Yet 'tis my guardian Lar,
An inner sense that stirs my thought—impels
My thinking and my acting—all, and fills
And thrills me with the ecstasy of being.

Our Pioneers' Plea for Union.

By C. B. Coleman,

Professor of Church History in Butler Bible College.

The peculiarity is to be found not so much in a new plan of union as in the general spirit of our pioneers and the basis of union they proposed. Three things stand out as especially prominent in their plea: (1) Their feeling of pain at division in the Church of Christ. (2) Their willingness to give up their old practices in the light of their new convictions. (3) Their reverence for the revealed will of God and their insistence upon it for the basis of union.

1. The pioneers felt the loss and evil which divisions brought to the church. No one can read the writing of Thomas or Alexander Campbell, especially the former, without noticing that their plea for union came not simply from a desire to be on good terms with others, or a leaning toward uniformity and good order, but from a heartfelt and fervent longing for unity among Christians. They spoke of the harm sectarianism brought about, of hinderance in missionary work, of derision on the part of unbelievers. of doubt and perplexity occasioned to seekers of truth, and most of all, of the pain given to Him who prayed that they all might be one. Few men have ever written of division with more sorrow than Thomas Campbell in the Declaration and Address (see Sketches of our Pioneers, p. 25, 31ff). "While professing Christians bite and devour one another, they are consumed one of another, or fall a prey to the righteous judgments of God; meanwhile the truly religious of all parties are grieved, the weak stumbled, the graceless and profane hardened, the mouths of infidels opened to blaspheme religion, and thus the only thing under heaven divinely efficacious to promote and secure the present spiritual and eternal good of man, even the gospel of the blessed Jesus, is reduced to contempt." "The Church of Christ upon earth is essentially, intentionally and constitutionally one"; "division among Christians is a horrid evil, it is anti-Christian, anti-scriptural, anti-natural."

2. The leaders of the movement for the restoration of primitive Christianity willingly gave up practices and ideas to which they were attached when they found them to be contrary to the basis upon which they plead for union. When they once began the search for the platform upon which all Christians should stand, and opened their eyes toward the Word of God, new truths began to dawn upon them. Old ideas and associations which they cherished often stood condemned in the light which they had sought and found. It is always hard to make the change from an old mistake to a new standpoint, and it was hard for the pioneers. But one change after another they made, though some of their number shrank back. "I hope," said one of these, speaking earnestly, but mistakenly, in favor of infant baptism, "I may never see the day when my heart will renounce that blessed saying of Scripture, 'Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.'" In the process of discovery upon which the Campbells and others entered in the beginning of the movement (see Concerning the Disciples, p. 41) they were led in the light of scriptural teaching to abandon infant baptism, sprinkling and innumerable doctrines they had once held. It was not without sacrifice on their own part that they set out in the path of Christian union. Barton W. Stone, likewise, gave up many of his previous ideas, and even dissolved the organizations he himself had formed, when he found they stood in the way of union. Whenever our churches lose the power to change, to advance to new truths gained from a better understanding of the Bible, ever at sacrifice on their part, they lose the spirit of the pioneers. Perhaps it is too much to call this a peculiarity of the plea our pioneers made for Christian union, but certainly their honesty and their devotion was most marked in their willingness to give up what was shown them to be wrong.

3. The pioneers pled for union upon the basis, not so much of any form of doctrine, as upon the revealed will of God, as God gave them to see his will in the Scriptures. It was this that led to the rapid development of the movement in doctrinal belief and in numbers. Interpretations of Scripture and human opinions about religion are as changeable as man himself. They could therefore afford no permanent basis of union. And yet there could be no religious life without them. The Word of God, however, though variously understood, must itself be constant. Therefore the platform upon which all Christians should be one, must be the Word itself, and not any creed or doctrine about it. And though sometimes even the pioneers insisted that their interpretation of Scripture be the accepted standard, for the most part they stood open to all true enlightenment on the larger field of God's revealed will. From the very first they made a sharp distinction between man's thinking about God and God's manifestation of himself. They thought of God as speaking to man, rather than through him. "Our desire, therefore," said Thomas Campbell, "for ourselves and our brethren would be, that rejecting human opinions and the inventions of men as any authority, or as having any place in the church of God we might forever cease from further contentions about such things; returning to and holding fast by the original standard; taking the divine word alone for our rule."

Alexander Campbell was distinguished most of all, according to the testimony of those who knew him, for a profound reverence for God and his revelation of himself. He believed that God had spoken to men, that his Word was so simple that all could understand it who put themselves "within speaking distance," that it was all sufficient, and that to follow it was man's highest calling. "We owe our lives to Him. We are His and not our own. His shall be ours. His statutes shall be our choice. Our only concern shall be, 'Lord, what wilt thou have us to do?'" It was only natural therefore, that he should be one of the greatest, and at the same time one of the simplest, preachers of his day. The work of the pioneers was to make plain to the people the plain Word of God as the one basis of church life. Hence it was that men understood their preaching, and turned to it with delight from the mystical, obscure and unintelligible sermons to which they were too often accustomed.

The supreme revelation of God was his Son, Jesus the Christ. Therefore to him especially did the pioneers point as the center of church unity. Personal faith in him was to be the creed of the united church. And it was not so much believing something about him, as it was believing him and following him, that they emphasized. This was the essential thing and nothing which it implied was non-essential.

Many other schemes of union have been suggested and some of them have been tried. The unity of the Roman Catholic Church, which is one because it itself is the supreme object of faith for its adherents, gives nothing but a dead level of blind trust. The uniformity of high church ritual and rite has proved unavailing and unsatisfying. The union of all forms of Christianity by insisting only upon the least which any of them believes and practices, or by a system of worship so broad and simple that all men, no matter what their belief can join in, has no strength in it. Perhaps we do not yet see clearly the way to a permanent and effective union of all believers. But any such union must embrace at least these three elements which the pioneers emphasized: a heartfelt aversion to divisions, a willingness to give up mistaken beliefs and practices, and above all, the recognition of the sufficiency of faith in Jesus Christ.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

H. A. Davis has given up the pastorate of the Highlands Church, in Denver, to engage in evangelistic work under the direction of the Colorado state mission board. Bro. Davis has been faithful in the pastoral office. He is said to possess qualifications for evangelistic work which cause us to expect encouraging results. J. E. Pickett has surrendered his work at Boulder and is, temporarily, preaching for the Highlands Disciples. Hopes are entertained that he may be prevailed upon to accept the pastorate of this congregation.

The health of T. T. Thompson, of the East Side Church, is seriously impaired. For some months he has not been able to preach. At the time of this writing he is out of the city in search of health. Bro. Thompson is a fine young man. He is a graduate of Drake University. We love him and pray for the restoration of his health.

His brother, M. A., preaches at Grand Junction, Colorado. Leonard G. Thompson, S. D. Cook, and others preach for the East Side Congregation during the absence of the pastor. The new building of the Central Church approaches completion. The pastor, Bruce Brown, recently baptized two Chinamen. Bro. Brown is a hard worker. Under the circumstances he is doing as well as any man could do. The meetings of the Central Church are held in a hall in Glenarm street, between Fifteenth and Sixteenth streets, up two flights of stairs. Current expenses are paid and there are frequent additions to the membership. The congregation recently contributed about one hundred dollars to state mission work. The new building, it is believed, will be dedicated free from debt. We are all interested in the completion of this building. The Central is our mother church, and while the domicile of the mother is in a public hall the children feel lonesome. The dedication of the new Central Church will be a glad day for all of us. Mrs. Frank D. Pettit continues her work successfully in the Berkeley Church. She has been instrumental in freeing the church from debt since the beginning of her pastorate. There is a debt of $700 on the parsonage. An effort will be made, probably in the autumn, to remove this encumbrance. Robert W. Elder, S. D. Cook, and Chaplain J. B. McClarey, stationed at Fort Logan, have recently preached in the South Broadway Church when the pastor was from home. The brethren speak in complimentary terms of their discourses. B. O. Aylesworth has been re-elected president of the State Agricultural College at Fort Collins for a term of two years. President Aylesworth, as you may remember, was pastor of the Central Church.

Word comes to me that H. T. Morrison is in Colorado, at Rocky Ford, and that, as a result, a congregation of the Christian Church will probably be organized in that place. His son Hugh is now a manzanola. He is a fine young man. We hope to keep him in Colorado.

In reply to your inquiry, I am compelled to say that Denver is not an especially desirable place for one who must work for his daily bread. I cannot advise you to come to Colorado. Many persons come to this state on account of impaired health and are willing to take positions on small salaries that they may pay expenses in whole or in part. For this reason it is difficult to obtain a paying situation. It is possible for you, if you come, to secure employment; but do not expect a full salary. You must compete with men who are willing to work for half wages.

Colorado is not more healthy than Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, Illinois, or Indiana for one who is in a normal condition. For persons who are inclined to pulmonary trouble, if Colorado is reached in time, the results are often most desirable. But if your heart is not all right or if you are inclined to be nervous, do not come to Colorado. The altitude is too great for you. Denver is a mile above sea level. Colorado Springs is higher still. Leadville is away up.

This part of the country suffered in the panic of '93 as no other place suffered in the United States. Business is in an apparently good condition now, but there is, to one accustomed to business conditions and methods in the cities on the Atlantic coast, an apparently unstable condition. We seem to be up in the air, even in our business. There is a lack of definiteness and solidity. There may be no valid reason for this statement; but I tell you candidly how I am impressed by the business situation in this part of the world. There are evidences of prosperity on every hand. Denver, this year, in the erection of buildings, will go beyond any previous year in her history, and I have reason to believe that Denver does not stand alone among Colorado towns in this respect. There is apparent prosperity everywhere in the state, but I am unable to free myself from the impression above expressed.

Much is said and written about the few men who "strike it rich"—not a word about those who lose all. I believe that the latter are more numerous than the former. The number of those who lose money is larger than is the number of men who achieve fortunes. The other evening I stopped at a stand to "invest" in a hot tamale. I was not in a hurry, nor was the proprietor of the tamale stand, so we had a little talk. He told me that he was on the ground on which Denver now stands, in 1857, with $25,000. He could not foresee that a city of nearly 150,000 people would grow up here in less than fifty years. He has not $25,000 now. He presides over a hot tamale stand on a street corner. In the course of the conversation he said that he was the poorest man in the company of gentlemen who passed through this region in '57. One in the party had $200,000. They all came out to the Rocky Mountain region to improve their financial condition. I did not learn what became of the man who had $200,000. One of the poorest men I have seen in this state is a man who a few years ago had $25,000 cash. When I saw him he was working as a miner on a per diem wage, barely able to pay rent for the cheapest kind of a house. Not all who live in Colorado are millionaires. Multitudes come out here and fail to "strike it." There are greater inequalities in this part of the world and on the Pacific Coast, in the matter of wealth, than exist in the eastern cities.

Religious work is in a reasonably good condition. This is a good field in which to preach the gospel.

A company of International Sunday-school workers honored Denver and Colorado Springs with a visit. At the latter place they attended the State Sunday-school Convention. The party consisted of Mr. Marion Lawrence, the Rev. R. W. Spillman, Prof. and Mrs. H. M. Hamill and Mr. E. O. Excell, the famous singer. This company began a transcontinental tour in the interest of organized Sunday-school work at Richmond, Va., about the middle of February. They have visited and held meetings since the beginning of the tour, in Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Texas, New Mexico, California, Wyoming and Colorado. The purpose of this itinerary is to stir up an interest in the work of the Sunday-school. A year ago a similar tour was made. The results were so satisfactory that the present journey was undertaken under the auspices of the International Executive Committee. I am glad to testify that the sojourn of these Sunday-school specialists in Colorado was helpful.

A note, just to hand, from F. N. Calvin, says that there were 320 in the Sunday-school in Colorado Springs last Lord's day. Good! The same day there were 341 in the Sunday-school in the South Broadway Church.

Literary Precision and Power.

By A. M. Growden.

Slang is literary profanity. Inaccurate inelegances are studiously to be avoided. To enjoy the well of English undefiled requires study continued throughout life.

One hundred and fifteen millions speak English to-day. We may travel the wide world over and listen to its cadence and rhythm—and never is it more melodious than when we hear a brother greet us in the shadows of the Pyramids, or on the streets of Constantinople, where we meet the leer of the unspeakable Turk! Never is it more a mother tongue.

Character dwells in words, and thoughts are things. Thought and style should go together in happy agreement. In order to such an acquisition let us read with discrimination looking to the individuality of writers; read with a view to correction and increased nobility of expression.

Virgil and Milton will contribute elegance; Burns and Whittier, simplicity; Chaucer and Cervantes, humor; Shakespeare and George Eliot, human nature; Addison and Hawthorne, smoothness; Dante, imagination; Stevenson, life and action; Bacon, logic; Homer, action; Milton, sublimity; Thoreau, patience and keen observation; Pope, conciseness; Macaulay, transparency; the Bible, first, last and always, sublimity of conception and power of expression.

Every writer has his value, but if we are to be limited to one book let that book be the king of books—the Word which is freighted with eternal interest. For logic and pathos and imagery and conciseness and description and nobility of conception and expression no book may be compared to it. It will increase our admiration for the Bible and augment its usefulness to us, to remember that it is not only an inspired guide to religious truth, but also a collection of the world's most perfect literature.

No book is so varied—so full of life. The book of Acts is not only the book of conversions and early missions, it is also the book of experiences and adventures and thrilling narrative. It is the book of life and death, of judgment and acquittal, yet its simplicity is remarkable. Into a few sentences are crowded eternal verities. A modern novelist would extend into three hundred pages what is, under Luke's masterly power, expressed in three hundred words. Here we have thought without verbiage. Too many modern books have the latter without the former.

I have heard many prayers for "Pentecostal power" and "Holy Ghost power" and other varieties of power, but I am still persuaded that the closer we think God's thoughts after him the greater will be our power. His thoughts are in his word and it is "quick and powerful, sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart."

The Psychology of Jingoism.

The subject of Jingoism is ever with us, and is likely to be, so long as multitudes take wanton delight in that fictitious and diabolical glory which is associated with war and has ruined every nation permanently addicted to it. Mr. J. A. Hobson has written a remarkable little book which should be studied by every thoughtful student of humanitarianism. This age of ours is a strange mixture of genuine humanitarian sympathy and blundering thoughtlessness. "The Psychology of Jingoism" is a fertile topic. It involves complex considerations of religion, morality, economy, sociology, and philanthropy. Mr. J. A. Hobson is a noted lecturer, and a well-known author. He vividly exposes the dark side of Imperialism.

For Imperialism, which might cherish and conserve the noblest ideals in any nation's consciousness, and at some periods has done so, generally develops on the side of the demons instead of on that of the angels. History teaches stern lessons in illustration of this tendency. Jingoism means Imperialism gone mad. When the intoxication of the majority of a people grows into actual delirium, all the counsels of perfection are set at naught, even by those who profess to be regulated by these, at any rate in numerous instances. The sad tendency of to-day's Imperialism is to provide Jingoism with its idols, its ritual, its sham philosophy, and its white cross on a black banner. Jingoism degraded Spain, destroyed the supremany of French civilization, and ruined the prosperity of Italy when she caught the Abyssinian fever. We see what Jingoism means in our toys, our illustrated magazines overloaded with battle and slaughter pictures, and even our most popular drawing-room ornaments. Patriotism is one of the instincts of national self-preservation; but when Greece shouted insanely for war against Turkey, patriotism was a very secondary motive, and the issue was appalling. Mr. Hobson ascribes Jingoism in its propagation to the influence of the press, in the first place, and in the second place to the influence of town life. Speaking of newspapers Burke said, "Let us suffer any person to tell us his story, morning and evening, but for one twelvemonth, and he will become our master." The Jingo lives in visions and his dreams are mostly red. England has passed through a fearful fit of mental scarlet fever. Few of us will ever forget the humiliating lessons taught us by the outrageous carnivals, which were in the main the result of the wild ravings of the press, a very large section of which seemed impelled to support strife and bloodshed, simply because the people were supposed to have come to a time when they wanted another war anyhow. The trouble about one portion of the press in every country is that it simply panders to any passing popular mood. The clerks, the mechanics, the laborers, and the over-busy tradesmen of the towns, as Mr. Hobson says, enjoy little quiet "sociality," such as that for which the rural folks have time, taste, and inclination. The ordinary townsmen find no way of escape from crowded and stifling monotony except in the floating excitability and neurotic emotion created by the press and the music-hall. By means of these cheap sensationalisms and deliriums they are, like most sedentary or over-confined people, so morbidly influenced that they mistake violence for strength, and these frivolous excitements are to them what the horse-fair is to the peasant and the opera to the society girl. Constant play on this class of mind at length liberates an avalanche of dancing appetites and whirling passions.

Albert Dawson's "Life" of Dr. Parker.

One of the ablest of our rising young journalists, my friend Mr. Albert Dawson, has distinguished himself by writing one of the most interesting of the many new biographical works which have of late poured from the press. Great living men are now-a-days the sure victims, first of the hungry interviewer, and then of the more judicious biographer. It is the evil fashion now to worship the hero long before sunset. This age cannot wait to put up posthumous monuments. It likes to show its favorites their memorials before their careers are finished. It is not a nice mode of celebration, but then it happens that the world does not now think much of its great ones after death. Who cares to talk of Gladstone, or Beaconsfield, or Garfield, or Randolph Churchill now that they have passed away? I note that already Queen Victoria is almost forgotten. Seldom is she mentioned. Even a famous man may be glad to see himself commented on before the memory of him vanishes. As for Dr. Parker, his life has been wonderfully romantic, as this book shows. Mr. Dawson was the one man competent to chronicle the career of the great London preacher, for he was for several years his secretary, before becoming one of our Christian Commonwealth staff, on which he served with great ability until quite recently. As he was my own colleague in this capacity, his latest literary venture naturally interests me in a special degree. He is as qualified to tell about Dr. Parker as Boswell was to give the world his Johnsoniana. Joseph Parker may well be a sturdy character, for he is a Northumbrian, and possesses all the stalwart qualities of the Tynesiders. He was born at Hexham in April, 1830, four years before C. H. Spurgeon. Like Moody, Kitto, Cumming, Carlyle, Jay and Hugh Miller, he was the son of a stone-mason. He became a preacher, like C. H. Spurgeon, without ever having intended to take up such a vocation, by a mere accident. While listening to an open-air sermon on a village green, he was seized with an overwhelming desire himself to preach. Borrowing a Bible, as soon as the preacher had finished, he stood up on the cross-beams of the saw-pit and delivered a most striking and perfectly extemporaneous address on the text, "It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon in the day of judgment, than for you." His second sermon was also delivered in the open air, on a balmy summer afternoon, when the air was redolent with the fragrance of flowers and musical with the singing of birds. His third sermon was given in the evening twilight at a wheelwright's door, the pulpit being a large block of oak. The villagers crowded round him, imploring him to come again, and that invitation he regards as his call to the ministry. He went on preaching thus to humble village audiences. Often the youth walked fourteen miles to his appointments, many a time he ate his dinner off the warm lid of a round oven. Thus did one of the greatest of English preachers spring from the ranks of the common people. He is certainly at this moment the greatest pulpit power in England. He began his regular ministry at the little town of Banbury in Oxfordshire, on a salary of a hundred and twenty-five pounds a year. While studying at one period in London he made his first attempt to write for the press. He himself has thus described this experience. "I was just a raw youth. I went with my articles in my hand to Cassell's office, but I had not the courage to take them in myself, so I paid a boy, who was standing outside, to take them in for me. When I saw him coming out of the shop without them I took to my heels and fled, expecting that the editor and all his staff would be after me for my impertinence. But when John Cassell sent me six guineas, and I read my sketches in the Popular Educator, I felt that my fortune was made. I had my carriage and pair and all the rest of the fine things—in imagination."

Britain, Russia, and America.

What is the world coming to now? That is the query I put to myself of late every morning. But who can answer it? Only I am surprised at the apathy both of peoples and of governments. One Power in the world, and only one, is very wide-awake indeed. I allude to Russia. She alone is ever on the alert. Russia never sleeps, although the bear to some unwary minds appears to be all the time hibernating. I quite appreciate the good intentions of the American government in seeking to withdraw from the Chinese entanglement. That is quite in accord with the best American traditions. But I will venture on the prediction that the purpose will be vain. There is such a thing as attempting from right motives to shirk the inevitable. Should not America have insisted on the salvation of the Armenians? She had a splendid opportunity, but it was lost forever. Let not Americans think that there will be any supreme wisdom to boast of in delivering up China a helpless victim to the tender mercies of the Muscovite. If only all the world knew that the scream of the American eagle would be heard, should the Russian eagle pounce on the very vitals of the dragon, then there would be universal confidence in the near future, for all would be convinced that Russia would commit herself to the counsels of prudence and moderation. As it is, I fear the issues of the near future. I agree with those political observers who regard a war within a short time between Russia and Japan as inevitable. But Britain and America could easily prevent this coming appalling calamity, if only they knew their own minds. That is the trouble. Lord Salisbury and Mr. McKinley are good and able statesmen, but they are both born opportunists, and opportunists always gamble with fate and fatally lose the game. The Sultan of Turkey won a splendid victory for his master the devil, all through the baneful temporizing opportunism of the Great Powers. The Tsar will win all along the line. It is astonishing that the statesmen of Europe and America seem neither to know nor to care particularly what Russia means. A dark destiny hovers over the civilized world. Christendom is apostate. The Powers pretend to be acting in concert, but they are all discordant at heart in their aims. Russia intends not only to keep tight hold on Manchuria, but she will certainly threaten Korea, and then Japan will fly madly at the Colossus, with fearful, frenzied impetus. A crisis is slowly and steadily approaching which will baffle all the comfortable calculations of the international politicians. Britain and America will of course go on trifling with affairs, without taking each other into close harmonious confidence, and when the storm-cloud bursts the wise men of this world will curse the folly which they mistook for wisdom in themselves. War could always be staved off by conciliar unity, but it must be real and genuine unity for the sake of solid peace, and for mutual and unselfish protection and defense. Only three men in the world in high places know their own minds. They are the Tsar, the Kaiser, and the Sultan.

The Chum of Chuffy Waite

By BURRIS A. JENKINS

IV.—Smoking Out.

Freshwater colleges in those days were part academy and part college. Consequently their students were usually young and up to coltish doings. Before coming to college, Alphy had heard the "old grads" talk about smoking out, and so came to know what it was. He also knew the precautions and reliefs. It was not the ordinary smoking out with tobacco that was done in Alphy's college—it was a dead-in-earnest process with cayenne pepper. A cornucopia of paper was made, soaked in kerosene and sprinkled with good red cayenne. The point of the cornucopia was inserted in the keyhole, gimlet hole or other small aperture and a match applied to the larger end. The draught thus created quickly carried the smoke into a room, and into a nostril. The charred, blackened spots on most doors and windows testified that the experience of cayenne in the lungs was not uncommon in that college town.

It was only in the ingenious hands of Chuffy Waite that smoking out attained to the dread art it became in the fifties. He would fill a pot with glowing embers, steal into a house or dormitory and sprinkling a little package of the incense on the coals, make off. Soon the whole company within, whether in night garb or otherwise, would appear in open air suffering with hay fever.

Chuffy was up sixteen times in one year before the faculty for "smoking out"; but there was something so good-humored, winning and frank about him that he never was punished. He would smile and acknowledge that he was the culprit, utter some witty word, raise a laugh in the very face of the good old president, and come off scott free. Once Miss C., the only lady member of the faculty, said to him, as he was on trial for smoking out a company of visiting girls from Pittsburg:

"Mr. Waite, just think of smoking out young ladies! Is that gallant? Suppose your sister or mother were smoked out at night!"

"Why," said he, laughing till his large sides shook, "I smoked them out last time they were here. Should have seen them, Miss C!" It was no use. They could not punish him.

Andrew Jackson Putnam Barton entered college a month after it had opened—such a thing is usual amongst Southerners, who proverbially take their time—and he had forgotten all about smoking out. When, at midnight on the first night of his college experience, there was a low scratching at his door, there roused in him the old Southern feeling, inherited possibly from far-off English ancestry, that every man's house is his castle, and he arose to defend his. He fired twice through the panels of the door, and then rushed out, to find a bullet-pierced hat and to grab a jolly, fat Freshman by the collar. Finding that no robbers were there, but instead a fellow-student, no apologies could be profuse enough.

"Smoking out! O, to be sure! I'd forgot. I thought you were some nigger trying to steal. O, I'm so sorry! Please let me go back, and you smoke me out."

"O, ——," said Chuffy.

"But then you must," replied Alphy, "I owe it to you. I must be smoked out by somebody, and as you are the first who thought of it, I insist that you ought to do it. Promise me, sir!"

Chuffy burst into a roar at this sweet simplicity. He was a Freshman, too, recently smoked out, and was just learning the art himself, so he entered into the thing for the sake of practice, and when Alphy retired into his room, Chuffy poured the smoke in volumes through the keyhole. He could hear the smothered coughing within; but the brave young Alabamian refused to budge. At last Chuffy burst into the room with unfeigned admiration, and amid his own sneezes, offered his hand to his new classmate, who sat patiently, with wet towels over head and face.

Chuffy then went to his own room, only to find it stacked, as the custom often was in those days, by mischievous hands. Some one had entered in his absence and, piling the furniture in the middle of the room, had torn the carpet up and covered the stack with it. So remembering that the new man had dropped the remark that he had no roommate, Chuffy returned to Barton's room to sleep that night. The stacked room never was straightened but the goods were removed to Alphy's suite. Thus began that close companionship between the wily and the innocent that never was to be broken in this world.

Once, when Barton's father visited him, Chuffy courteously vacated his sleeping room in behalf of his chum's "pater."

"He must be smoked out, you know, Alphy," said Chuffy, and winked slyly to Buck Elmer.

"Is that usual?" said Alphy with utmost seriousness.

Chuffy was ready to burst at the question, but replied that it undoubtedly was usual.

"Well," replied Alphy, "just as you think best; if it's the correct thing I'm willing." He had great respect, as all Southerners and English seem to have, for "the correct thing."

So it was arranged that the two, father and son, were to be thoroughly fumigated, when the hours of the night were small, and Chuffy, the best artist, was to carry out the plan. So, at two o'clock, the ghostly white clouds entered all apertures, but un-ghost-like, awoke the sleepers. The father swore, but Alphy assured him it was the correct thing.

"To —— with the correct thing!" shouted the infuriated father. So Alphy wrapped wet towels about his father's head, and for his own relief, thrust his face out of the window. A deluge of water from a window above poured down on his devoted head, and a deluge of oaths from his fiery father flooded the calm night. The episode ended with Colonel Barton's going to the hotel, and almost culminated in his taking his son out of college. It required all of Chuffy's sympathy and all his promises to find and punish the offender, to dissuade the irate one. Daylight, however, did more than Chuffy, and the generous Alabama heart did more than all.

Alphy himself, as a rule, never did any smoking out. Indeed, he never consciously played pranks of any kind. He was the best man in the world to take a joke, the worst in the world to make one. Once however, he did vary his fixed custom. The occasion was the visit of certain members of the faculty and of the student body from a neighboring college. The old president was very desirous that this visit should be a great success.

"Alphy," said Chuffy, "Prexie hopes to give the visitors a warm welcome. Will you help?"

"To be sure. Anything I can do?"

"Why, yes. Prexie is very proud of the college spirit that we have here, and I have reason to think he'd like to have it displayed in chapel for the visitors. I'm going to be otherwise occupied that day; but if you could smoke out the chapel, I think it would please Prexie."

"You don't mean it?" said Alphy, with mild wonder. "Well, maybe it would. The old man is rather proud of the snap that the college possesses. But do you think I'm the man to do it?"

"Surely. Aren't you my roommate? And am I not the great artist? Haven't I taught you many times?"

"Well, if you think I'm the one, I'll do what I can."

Chuffy went away hugging himself, well knowing Alphy's determination and thoroughness, when once embarked on an enterprise.

Who shall describe the horrors of that morning? Who shall tell how the smoke stole in through the auger holes in the floor of the chapel, and eddied round in clouds about the platform? Who shall convey any just impression of the multitudinous sneezes—sneezes in chorus, sneezes in tremolo, sneezes in diapason? Who shall tell of the impotent wrath of the president, of the search for the offender, of the innocence of Chuffy Waite, and the calm serenity of Alphy Barton with the consciousness of duty faithfully done?

They found the diabolical apparatus in the chemical laboratory below; a gigantic vessel with rubber pipes, like the tentacles of the devil-fish, each pipe fitted to an auger hole in the chapel floor overhead. Of course they accused Chuffy Waite, and of course he blandly denied. As they had never caught him in a lie, they believed him.

"Do you mean to say, sir," said the president severely, "that you had no hand in this affair?"

"None at all, sir," replied Waite. "Wish I had. It was a wonderful achievement. Genius was back of it."

"Sir, no comments," as a smile flickered over the faces of the faculty.

"And you know nothing at all as to the offenders?"

"I didn't say that, sir," smiled Chuffy. "I have my suspicions."

"Well, who do you think it was?"

"That's a different matter, Prex—beg pardon—Mr. President; you wouldn't have me tell?"

"You may go, sir."

After the visitors had departed, disgusted, and after the president's wrathful oration, Alphy was for telling the whole thing, in contrition that he had not met the wishes of the president.

"You keep still, Alphy," said Chuffy, "I'll tell Prexie when I think the proper time has arrived."

And Alphy was content with the arrangement.

How the Church Should Reunite.

By W. J. Wright.

The Church divided on opinions, and will reunite on facts; it divided on fancy, and will reunite on faith; it divided on speculation, and will reunite on revelation; it divided on non-essentials generally, but will reunite only on essentials; it divided on things held by portions of the church, but will reunite on things held by the whole church.

Consider briefly a few of the details:

I. The church should reunite on Jesus of Nazareth as the Son of the Living God, and as the Messiah in his three-fold office of Prophet, Priest and King. The Sonship and Messiahship of Jesus are the central truths of the New Testament. Here we are in the realm of fact, faith, revelation, and essentials so recognized by the whole Church. The Church is not seriously divided concerning his Sonship, and theoretically is a unit regarding his Messiahship, yet practically she denies his rights as Messiah and at this point is seriously divided.

1. As Prophet or Teacher in this dispensation, the authority of Jesus was to be absolute. That Jesus only should be heard as prophet, Moses foretold, see Deut. 18:15, 18, 19; Jehovah spoke the same truth from heaven in the presence of Moses and Elijah and three of the apostles, telling the whole world to hear him (Matt. 17:1-5), and Jesus claiming "all authority" as Prophet, limited his followers to the teaching of such things as he had commanded (Matt. 28:18-20). The church, however, has divided her attention between various prophets whom she has permitted to speak authoritatively to her, thus displacing our Lord's teaching. Division in the church was the inevitable result. By restoring Jesus to his rightful place as sole authoritative Prophet or Teacher, the church will be able to reunite. This our Lord himself teaches us in John 10:16. He views all the sheep in all the folds and says that when the sheep hear his voice, there will be but one flock. Here then, is the Master's own language showing the way to unity. Let the sheep hear none but his voice; let him be restored to his rightful place as Prophet and the church will reunite.

2. The Church has divided on the priesthood. Adopting the mediatorial systems of priesthoods seen in Judaism and heathenism she has displaced the "ONE MEDIATOR" of the Christian system. These "priests are false to Truth and God by turns," and make themselves mediums of all acceptable worship offered to God. By restoring to Jesus his prerogatives of Messiahship, making him the only Priest who is over a body of "kings and priests," the church will be able to reunite.

3. As King, Jesus must be the absolute monarch who combines the legislative, judicial and executive functions. The divided church has in a measure displaced him in each department of his kingdom. Old Testament worthies, popes, councils, synods, convocations and general conferences have all been elevated to the place of law-givers in the divided church, not only usurping his authority, but also enacting laws in conflict with his laws and in conflict with each other's enactments. Under such system further division and strife are inevitable. Let Christ be "all in all" as Law-giver, and the church can reunite. Moreover, though "the Father hath committed all judgment to the Son," the church has placed upon the judiciary, men who

> Presume his bolts to throw,
> And deal damnation round the land
> On each they deem his foe.

These self-constituted judges have given rise to the Inquisition in Roman Catholic countries and to sects or denominations in all lands since the Inquisition. They have presumed to make opinions tests of faith and to bind men where Christ has left them free. When the Church sees "no man save Jesus only" as Judge, she will be able to reunite.

Jesus as King is by right the sole executive of his kingdom. His executive functions he has transferred to the Holy Spirit who has given us the New Testament to show us how the will of the King is to be executed. Just as soon as the church is willing to do the King's business in the King's way, as shown in the New Testament, she will be able to reunite.

II. The Church, then, should reunite on the Bible. "Where the Scriptures speak, we speak; and where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent," cannot but lead to unity in the church. As soon as a "Thus saith the Lord" is demanded for every doctrine and practice in the church, all that men have added will be dropped, and the church will once again be a unit as in the days of the apostles. "The Bible and the Bible alone is the religion of Protestants," i. e., an infallible book rather than an infallible church or man, is a theory of Protestants. It is far, however, from being our practice, but as soon as it is a reality and not a mere theory, the church will discover that she is a unit on the following points:

1. Her only test of faith will be belief in Jesus of Nazareth as the Christ and Son of God.

2. Her only names for the church (for names cause and perpetuate divisions, and denominationalism is nameism,) will be such as are now of universal acceptance, Church of God, Church of Christ, Christian Church.

3. The only designations for those who are members of the church will be such as the church already loves and such as show the relations existing between Jesus and his brethren. We will hear the names Christian, Disciples of Christ, Saint, Brother and Children of God, but we will hear no other.

4. The only ordinances will be baptism and the Lord's supper. The only person baptized will be a penitent believer in Jesus, and immersion will be the only action or "mode," which last word will soon be forgotten. The supper will be a feast of love occurring weekly in memory of the death of Christ for our sins. At this table will be found all who love God and have faith in our Lord Jesus Christ.

5. The organization will be simple and flexible, but there will be no distinction between clergy and laity. The officials will be deacons and elders or bishops in each congregation and an itinerating class of instructors called evangelists; but popes, cardinals and numerous functionaries found both in Romanism and Protestantism will have departed forever.

III. The Church should reunite by aiming at unity and not at uniformity; she should reunite by aiming at the death of bigotry and intolerance; she should reunite by aiming at unity in essentials, liberty within the word of Christ in non-essentials and love in all things. She should reunite by permitting any and every man to work within her any reform which is in harmony with his word. She should reunite by an unconditional surrender to Jesus Christ, so that she will be forever saying, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" and by a prayer which he has taught us and which embodies all others: "Thy kingdom come! Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Thus should the church reunite.

What Most Interests Me Now.

By J. S. Lamar.

X.—When the Lord Came.

It might be supposed that nothing new could be said respecting the conditions prevailing when the Lord came. Much care and pains have been devoted to the subject, and it has been discussed with learning and eloquence. The points usually considered in the presentation of this matter—such as the culmination of a long series of providential preparations, the anticipations excited by inspired prophets and psalmists, the perfection and prevalence of the Greek language, the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, the ease and freedom of intercourse among nations and peoples and the peace that was reigning in all the world under the authority and dominion of Rome—these and such as these I shall not discuss at all. They are true and, in a sense, they are pertinent; but their pertinency is collateral rather than direct, as their importance is subordinate rather than prime. The immediate bearing of most of them is upon the work of the apostles in preaching the gospel and establishing the church, rather than directly upon the personal Christ.

No, it was not these providential circumstances, arranged and directed as they had been for future use, but the central fact of all, the one which indicated the very fulness of time, the one which alone could so touch the heart of God as to draw him from the heavens to the earth was not man's environment, but his awful condition—the fact that he had sunk to the very lowest depths of iniquity and sin, and was utterly impotent and helpless. I can easily believe that, as God saw it, the state of man was worse than it ever had been. In order to test the human race in every possible way he had divided it into two classes, distinguised afterwards as the Jews and the Gentiles. The former were the chosen and specially favored people. To these he revealed his law with blessed promises for obedience and the threat of severe chastisements for disobedience. He made known to them his ultimate purpose of highest good and glory for them and for all, in the sending of a Redeemer. The law was but a pedagogue to lead them to this. Their institutions foreshadowed it; their priests illustrated it in their worship and service; their prophets foretold it; their sacred mysteries involved it; and the very incompleteness of their law demanded it. Everything showed that it was but the shadow of a coming substance, the type of a glorious antitype and reality. Patriarchs saw this afar off and were glad; law-givers looked to it as the end of their law and of their mission; inspired seers beheld it in bright visions, through the veil of whose mystic symbols its outlines were distinctly marked; psalmists sang of it in strains of exultation and rapture; while to every saint it was an inspiration and a joy, a longing and a hope.

But in spite of these distinguishing blessings and assured promises, in spite of chastisements and mercies, of patient instructions, ever ready help and tender care, the chosen people went farther and farther from God, degenerating in spiritual integrity and moral truth, until, at the fulness of time, instead of genuine piety and holiness they were content with a mask of hypocritical pretension and falsehood. They had so basely yielded and were so willingly subjected to the flesh, that their spirits were carnalized. Or, to use the language of Eden, the serpent within them had so completely mastered and molded them that their whole nature was serpentine; the very selfhood had sunk to that degradation. Hence they were addressed, "Ye serpents, ye offspring of vipers, how shall ye escape the judgment of hell?" (Matt. 23:33).

To particularize, while they held fast to the shell of the divine word, they had emptied it of its sense and filled it with their own, making it void by their traditions, thus taking the place of God and binding these traditions upon men as by his authority. The rulers were tyrants and the people were slaves, than which there can be no worse religious condition. The deliverer for whose coming they longed and waited was not expected to change this condition but to give it permanency and enlargement; he was to free them from outward evils, to clothe with divine power the carnal ambition, the haughty pride and pompous arrogancy of the rulers, to give the very highest success to their selfish greed for place and distinction and worldly glory. Were they not his people—his own chosen and beloved, the objects from the beginning of his care and favor? Surely his promise can only be in accordance with his own people's hopes and prayers. The prophecies that went before can mean nothing else. They must mean that, they do mean that; and so it became a settled conviction, an assured hope, an established, orthodox doctrine.

Certainly the Jews needed an almighty hand to deliver them. As for the Gentiles, when God left them to themselves without special illuminations or extraordinary visitations, the preterition was not without design, much less without mercy; it was "in the wisdom of God," which is forever associated with his goodness and love, and hence in truest benevolence for them, that they might learn, and through them all might learn, that without revelation man can not rise to a knowledge of God. As a matter of fact, their philosophy reached no highest truth, compassed no supreme object, settled no deepest problem of the soul; its wisdom, therefore, was foolishness; it knew not God, and for all the worthiest ends of existence was a failure. It was impotent to lift man out of his sins and infirmities, to save him from his carnal passions, or to give him a renewed nature and a higher life; and the nations of men had come at length to know this and to feel the deep gnawings of a hunger which no speculative wisdom could satisfy. It was this sense of need, this baffled and now hopeless search after the infinite, this longing for a good and a power that were felt to be unattainable by human effort and undiscoverable by human wisdom, that constituted their preparation for the coming of one who could actually reveal God and impart to the helpless and the lost the "power of God unto salvation." Of course with those nations and peoples where Grecian and Roman philosophy and manners were unknown, the cases varied in character and symptoms, but the disease was radically just as bad. Nowhere could man cure himself, nor find the good physician.

The whole condition then was this: The Gentiles by their wisdom did not know God at all, and were sunk in deepest corruption, idolatry and superstition, out of which they were utterly unable to lift themselves, while the chosen nation had so perverted the truth revealed to them that the divine word was valued mainly as a support for human traditions, and the divine being was believed and felt to be, and was represented as being, a sort of partner and echo of a "generation of vipers," for whose personal interest and worldly aggrandisement he had inspired the holy prophets of the past, and for the consummation of whose preferment and the glorifying of whose hypocrisy and corruption the womb of the ages had carried the Mighty Prince who might now be expected soon to appear. In view of all this I rejoice more than ever that he had once said to them, "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord." And now we shall immediately see this contrast.

Words of Fire.

It is well occasionally to remember that hatred of the liquor business is not confined to preachers and professed reformers. The following editorial from the New York Tribune dated March 4, 1884, was recently quoted by Evangelist Jas. W. Zachary, of Lexington, Ky., who was holding a revival meeting and assisting in some reform work in Cairo, Ill.:

"It has been said that the end of good government is the greatest happiness of the greatest number. If this be true, it must be owned that no government extant is satisfactorily conducted. For observation shows that, as a rule, political energy is expended upon secondary concerns, while politicians employ all their dexterity in avoiding action upon the great problems which most deeply involve the destinies of the masses.

"There is to-day in the English-speaking countries no such tremendous, far-reaching, vital question as that of drunkenness. In its implications and effects it overshadows all else. It lies at the center of all social and political mischief. It paralyzes energies in every direction. It neutralizes educational agencies. It silences the voice of religion. It baffles penal reform. It obstructs political reform. It rears aloft a mass of evilly-inspired power which at every salient point threatens social and national advance; which gives to ignorance and vice a greater potency than intelligence and virtue can command; which deprives the poor of the advantages of modern progress; which debauches and degrades millions, brutalizing and saddening them below the plane of healthy savagery and filling the centers of population with creatures whose condition almost excuses the immorality which renders them dangerous to their generation.

"All these evils, all this mischief, all this destruction of human souls and intellects, go on among us daily and hourly. There are none so ignorant and inattentive as not to have personal experience of some of them—some hearth darkened, some family scattered, some loving heart broken, some promising career ruined, some deed of shame done. Yet how hard it is to get this gigantic evil attacked seriously. Temperance organizations have indeed been fighting it for years, yet popular inertia has resisted their utmost efforts. But all has been done that might and should have been done by the organized agencies that represent the higher life. What are doctrinal points, for example, compared to this ever present, ever active, insidious influence? What are sectarian differences by the side of this national curse?

"Can the churches fold their hands and flatter themselves that their duties are all fulfilled, while the masses prefer the saloon to the pulpit, and while rum rules in society and politics?

"Are the higher educational agencies doing all in their power to advocate civilization while they ignore this obstacle to progress?

"Can any political organization be said to represent the best aspirations and the strongest needs of the people while this abiding source of misery and crime and poverty is allowed to spread and flourish?

"There is needed something of that sacred fire which kindled into inextinguishable heat the zeal of the Abolitionists, which compelled the abandonment of the human slavery, to rouse the national indignation and abhorrence against this very much greater evil.

"Nothing short of this, it is to be feared, will impel time serving politicians to approach in a spirit of earnestness a subject which is distasteful to them, mainly because they think they cannot afford to be without help and support of the class who derive from the degradation of the foolish and ignorant the means whereby they continue to rule and plunder those whose sagacity is proof against their snares."

Current Literature.

To be convinced that the doctrine of evolution does not logically involve a denial of theism, one should read Haeckel's The Riddle of the Universe at the End of the 19th Century—an evolutionary treatise written from a decidedly anti-theistic standpoint. The more the author denies the existence of a personal Deity the more is it apparent that this position is no logical outgrowth of the evolutionary doctrine with which he seeks to bolster it up. Haeckel would doubtless object to being called a materialist, but what is it but materialism when he says that the conception of a personal God as Spirit, "an invisible and, properly speaking, gaseous being," is as absurd and self-contradictory as the idea of a "gaseous vertebrate"? Equally absurd, he says, is the idea that man is created "in the image of God," and that he has personal immortality and a free will.

Haeckel has a profound contempt for everything but the Monistic Philosophy which is, with him, the center and sum of all truth. Our present educational methods are unsound because they ignore the monistic philosophy. Our judges on the bench are incompetent because they have not studied the monistic philosophy. The church is benighted in ignorance and superstition because it does not accept the monistic philosophy.

All problems which arise in the mind of man reduce to one all-comprehending riddle—what is substance? In attempting a solution of this problem, Haeckel suggests nothing new, but reiterates the doctrine of Spinoza: "Matter, or infinitely extended substance, and Spirit (or Energy), or sensitive and thinking substance, are the two fundamental attributes or principal properties of the all-embracing divine essence of the world, the universal substance." All the old arguments against the pantheism of Spinoza hold good against Haeckel. He cannot throw dust in the eyes of many thinking people by hitching his bald pantheism to the popular doctrine of evolution, nor can he lead many either to accept the former or to reject the latter by his unproved assumption that the two are inseparably connected. The book is not strictly modern. It was out of date two centuries before it was written. It should have been called "The Riddle of the Universe at the End of the Seventeenth Century."

Among the new and strange experiences which have been encountered by our soldiers in the Philippines, few have been more worthy of record than those of Albert Sonnichsen, who experienced almost a year of wandering captivity in northern Luzon and who narrates his adventures in a pleasing style in a volume entitled Ten Months a Captive among Filipinos. There is no literary art exhibited in the book, but it is a plain and unimaginative story, told with the vigor and directness of a man of action rather than a man of letters. It is the sort of narrative which one would expect to be written by a clear-headed, sharp-eyed young fellow with a good deal of talent for getting into trouble and out of it again and a cheerful sense of humor which prevented him from taking his afflictions too seriously even when undergoing real hardships. The book does not contain a great deal of real information about the islands or their inhabitants, but what it does contain is presented in a picturesque form, rendered the more vivid by the human interest of the narrative for which it forms the background. May Magazines.

Most people will read with satisfaction Rev. Judson Smith's article on "The Missionaries and Their Critics," in the current number of the North American Review. It makes no pretense to humor, but keeps close to facts and is a very sane and convincing reply to the criticisms which have been made in previous numbers of this magazine and elsewhere. Much space is occupied by a series of articles on "Industrial and Railroad Consolidations," by Russell Sage, James J. Hill, Charles M. Schwab and others who are in a position to know a thing or two about this subject. Mr. Howells' article this month is on "The New Poetic Drama," in which he makes some discriminating observations, mostly by way of approval, about the writings of Edmund Rust and Stephen Phillips.

Edward Everett Hale is the subject of an interesting sketch in the Review of Reviews. He has all the qualifications requisite to entitle him to a place near the head of the list of great Americans. How could a man fail to be great as a writer, who having native literary talent, has the courage to hold himself rigorously to such rules as these: "Know what you want to say; say it; use your own language; leave out all fine passages; a short word is better than a long one; the fewer words, other things being equal, the better; cut it to pieces." As a magazine of current events, the Review of Reviews, of course, devotes much space this month to the steel trust, the recent municipal elections, the possibility of war between Russia and Japan and the career of Gen. Funston.

We are glad to notice that the Hebrew-Christian quarterly, entitled The People, the Land and the Book, is continuing publication, though handicapped by lack of the support which it deserves. It is devoted to "the old and historic people of Israel, their native land, Palestine, and the Book, the Bible, and Jewish traditions and literature," and contains a great deal of material which is interesting and important to Gentiles as well as Jews. Subscribers receive as a premium a miniature scroll of the Law containing the entire Pentateuch in Hebrew text. (Edited by B. A. M. Schapino, 436 Carlton Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. $1.)

Mary Johnston's new story, "Audrey," has begun in the Atlantic Monthly for May. Its setting is similar to that of "To Have and To Hold." The reconstruction article for this month is on "The Ku Klux Movement." College professors are rather prominent among the contributors for this number—Hugo Munsterberger of Harvard, Albert S. Cook of Yale and Robert Herrick of Chicago.

The Century for this month is a Foreign Travel Number with several articles on out-of-the-way corners of central Asia, Armenia and China and others dealing with more frequented spots like Naples and Paris.

Peixotto has an article on "Paris Types" in the Cosmopolitan accompanied by a number of very clever sketches of types which will be instantly recognized by any one who has watched the life of the boulevards and faubourgs. An article on the steel trust was, of course, inevitable this month, and it duly appears, as does also one on General DeWet.

The Critic has a more than usually varied program this month, ranging all the way from "Literary Chelsea" to "Chinese Literature." Gerald Stanley Lee, who puts more epigrams in an average page of his writings than any other contemporary litterateur, has a charming little essay "On Being a Poet and Philosopher." "The Forest Schoolmaster" is concluded in this number.

The World's Work is working its way gradually into the position which it wishes to occupy as an authority on the events of the day. A careful reader of it cannot fail to be well informed. One of the best articles this month is on Russia's conquest of Asia, with many good illustrations. Senator Platt has an article explaining and defending his proposition to the Cubans as contained in the Platt amendment.

Nixon Waterman's little magazine, Good Cheer, does its best to justify its name, though it gets slightly off its beat in taking a crack at the administration and the war in the Philippines. It keeps up its quality remarkably well for a periodical which tries to be nearly all epigrams.

Among the best of magazines devoted to literature as such is The Literary Era. Its reviews of the books of the month are numerous, readable and reliable, and the whole magazine preserves a newsy and chatty tone which makes it a cheerful companion for a quiet hour as well as a trustworthy informant in regard to the doings of the literary world.

Author's Secret.

Food that Brought Back Buoyant Health.

Newspaper writers have a time of it to get the right kind of food to nourish them. One of this profession who writes for a Boston paper says: "From the first Grape-Nuts Food worked like a charm. My stomach had been failing to digest ordinary food, and my nerves were completely unstrung. I was about to give up work while preparing a series of articles for the press, but by a stroke of good fortune they began to feed me on Grape-Nuts. My strength gradually returned, nerves became steadier day by day, and I soon found I could do more office work with greater ease than ever before.

There came to me that feeling of buoyant health and satisfaction with my work and satisfaction with myself In short, I felt that life was worth living, and that I was 'girded up like a strong man for a race.'

In my opinion, Grape-Nuts is the one perfect article of food invaluable alike for those that are sick and those that are well." W. S. Gidley, Author of "Happy-Go-Lucky Papers," "The Landlord's Story," etc.

It is a fact that Grape-Nuts Food does supply the brain and nerve centers with the elements necessary to rebuild, nourish and maintain. That brings health, strength, happiness and the feeling of buoyancy Mr. Gidley speaks of.

Our Budget.

—We hear of large and liberal offerings for Home Missions in many of the churches.

—Let the good work go on until every congregation has joined in the movement for the evangelization of America.

—The Wall Street flurry was a tempest in a teapot, and the general interests of the country are unaffected by it. Corn and wheat continue to grow just the same, whether the bulls or the bears are in the ascendency.

—Many lambs have been sheared on Wall Street recently, losing all their wool, but this must be expected as long as men are seeking to get rich by speculation rather than by honest labor or trade.

—The manner in which one step has followed another in quick succession in preparation for the greatest Fair the world has ever known—that in honor of the centennial of the Louisiana Purchase—indicates that the men in charge of the great enterprise are men of executive ability, of practical wisdom and of great energy.

—The Christian ministers' meeting on Monday morning passed a resolution recommending the practicability of a series of denominational, and allied denominational, and pan-Christian conferences during the coming World's Fair, exhibits of religious tracts, statistics and other literature by various religious bodies, and an afternoon union religious service in some central hall, conducted by men of national and international repute. Also a series of conferences on special phases of Christian and philanthropic work.

—On Thursday evening of last week there was a meeting of all the official boards of our churches in St. Louis and vicinity in the lecture room of the First Christian Church, to consider the needs of our cause in this community. On motion it was decided to form a permanent organization of these boards to look after the general interests of our cause in the city, and a committee was appointed to report rules and regulations of such organization, to report at another meeting to be held Thursday evening of this week at the same place. The point aimed at is greater unification of our interests and more effective co-operation in pushing forward the interest of our cause in this city and vicinity.

—The tonic which the World's Fair has been to the real estate market is not more manifest than that which it has given to our St. Louis churches. There is a deepening conviction that we must both strengthen our stakes and lengthen our cords in order to avail ourselves of the benefits that should accrue to our cause from the World's Fair, and be able to impart as much good as we should to the thousands of strangers who shall be gathered in our city during the next two years. It places upon us heavy burdens and responsibilities which the Disciples here will try to meet to the best of their ability.

—We are in receipt of a letter from Mrs. T. M. Shackleford, of Tampa, Fla., who informs me that our national home board and the state board of Florida have combined to send an evangelist to that city for the better establishment of our cause there. The few members there have undertaken to secure a lot upon which they can build a tabernacle or place a tent for the use of the evangelist, who will remain long enough to establish a church there. Sister Shackleford has set out to raise $500 of the necessary amount herself through solicitation from the outside public who may feel interested in the work in that city. She and her husband, a prominent lawyer in the city, are faithful Disciples, and any contribution toward this worthy purpose, which may be sent to her, will be gratefully received and wisely used. We have a nucleus of faithful members there, and should have a strong church.

—The church at Westmoreland, Kan., is planning to build a parsonage this summer on lots which they have recently bought.

—Dr. W. T. Moore will spend the summer in England, having engaged passage on the steamship Commonwealth, Dominion line, which sails from Boston, June 5.

—G. K. Berry is supplying the pupit at Ft. Collins, Col., and is delivering a series of lectures on the Greek Church, the Roman Church, Luther, the Church of England, Calvin, Wesley, the Baptists and the Disciples.

—The receipts for foreign missions during April show a gain of $4,002.67. The total amount was $21,512.99. The receipts for the first week in May showed a gain of over $800 over the corresponding days of last year.

—A new $12,000 house of worship was dedicated at Albia, Ia., May 5, by L. L. Carpenter. The large congregation gave generously toward providing for the indebtedness of $4,500 which remained on dedication day.

—W. H. Cannon preached his farewell sermon at Lexington, Ill., April 28, having declined a unanimous call to remain. He wishes to locate where his children can have the advantage of good schools.

—The First Church of Christ, Rochester, N. Y., is without a pastor. A good man is wanted at once. Must come well recommended. Send application and full particulars to Frank H. Battles, Rochester, N. Y.

Central Church at Uniontown, Pa., of which C. H. Plattenburg is pastor, has recently purchased a new $2,000 pipe organ. It was formally opened Thursday evening, May 2, with a recital by H. P. Ecker, organist of Carnegie Music Hall, Pittsburg.

—The church at Minneapolis is already beginning preparations for the convention in October. On May 3, the Portland Avenue Church gave a banquet, at which over one hundred were present, with a view to arousing interest in the coming convention. They are beginning in the right spirit and if they continue as they have begun, it will do all that a local church can do toward making the convention a success.

—The Ministerial Institute of the seventh and eighth districts of Illinois was held in Centralia, Ill., May 6 and 7, with an attendance of nearly thirty preachers. Lew D. Hill, Secretary, says: "There was about the usual amount of failure on the part of those on the program, but as usual the places were supplied by those present with interest and profit. The addresses were of a high order and the discussions keen, pointed and in splendid spirit. The results of the meeting will long be felt for good."

—Bro. Allen Hickey, of Des Moines, and Mrs. Hickey celebrated their golden wedding on April 13. Bro. Hickey came to Iowa 47 years ago and has been preaching in that state almost ever since. He edited the Evangelist, one of the progenitors of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, at Oskaloosa, Ia., 1868-72, and was associated with all the earlier Iowa pioneers. Many friends were present to wish Bro. and Sister Hickey joy in their second 50 years of married life and many letters of congratulation were received.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Has won success far beyond the effect of advertising only.

The firm hold it has won and retains upon the hearts of the people could never have been gained by even the most lavish expenditure of money.

The true secret of the popularity of

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is explained entirely and only, by its unapproachable MERIT.

Based upon a prescription which cured people considered incurable, which accomplished wonders astonishing to the medical profession,

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Includes the concentrated values of the best-known vegetable remedies—such as sarsaparilla, yellow dock, pipsissewa, uva ursi, mandrake and dandelion, united by an original and peculiar combination, proportion and process, giving to curative power peculiar to itself.

Its cures of mild and extreme cases of scrofula, eczema, psoriasis, and every kind of humors, as well as of catarrh and rheumatism—prove it to be the best blood purifier ever produced.

Its cures of dyspepsia, biliousness, nervousness, loss of appetite and that tired feeling, make beyond question the greatest stomach tonic, nerve-builder and strength-restorer the world has ever known.

It will cure you or any one in your family of any of these troubles.

You can rely upon

Hood's Sarsaparilla

as a thoroughly good medicine. Buy a bottle and begin to take it today.

—A new $3,000 church at Alva, Okla., was dedicated May 5, by L. B. Myers, of Wichita, Kan. More money was raised than was asked for. William Moudy, the pastor, says that Brother Myers is a man who can dedicate a church just right and "raise all the money you need." In that case, he ought to be in demand. There have been 31 additions at Alva in the last four months.

—Chap. J. B. McCleery, of Ft. Logan, Col., writes that the World's Fair to be held in St. Louis is an opportunity which should be used by the Disciples of Christ for the distribution of information concerning our movement. He says: "If the matter were inaugurated early enough the brotherhood would be made to see the propriety and value of this work and lend a hand in providing for it." Our brother may rest assured that this matter is receiving consideration at the hands of the brethren in St. Louis and no doubt of many others. It is indeed an opportunity that should be made the most of for the plea for Christian unity and the general advancement of the kingdom of God.

van Houten's Cocoa combines Strength, Purity and Solubility. A breakfast-cupful of this delicious Cocoa costs less than one cent.

Sold at all grocery stores—order it next time.

—C H. Hilton goes to Oklahoma as territorial evangelist under the C. W. B. M.

—The church at Gillespie, Ill., J. G. M. Luttenberger, pastor, will be dedicated May 19. Neighboring churches and preachers are invited to be present, especially those of Macoupin county.

—The Seventh Illinois Missionary District employs three evangelists: Isaac Beckelhymer, Lew D. Hill and J. E. Stebbins. In the past nine months they have visited 70 churches and report 146 conversions.

—Bro. Lloyd Darsie, of Paris, Ky., has been holding a series of evangelistic services, afternoon and evening, at the Christian Church at Frankfort, Ky., beginning May 6.

—The South Kentucky Missionary and Sunday-school Association will hold a convention at Owensboro May 28-30. Those who expect to attend should address R. H. Crossfield at that place.

—S. A. Strawn has just closed his two years' work with the church in Owasso, Mich. A rally and farewell was held May 1. The reports showed that the church was in a flourishing condition.

—H. Elliott Ward, of Los Angeles, Cal., issues tickets to his Sunday evening services. They are all free, but some people will attend a meeting which has the appearance of being somewhat select, especially if it costs them nothing.

—John Ming, a Chinese Christian Endeavorer, has achieved a notable triumph in securing the suppression of the Chinese gambling houses in Salt Lake City. The work was done almost single-handed and in spite of the discouragements of even his friends.

—A young preacher, married, just out of college and possessing the social and other qualities which win success in the pastorate, can be put in communication with a church needing a pastor by addressing W. H. Boles, Alma, Ill. The church is in a Kansas county-seat, has a good building and parsonage. Salary $400 and parsonage.

—A convention of Hebrew-Christians will meet in Boston May 21-24. The following question among others will be discussed: "Is a Hebrew obliged, by the terms of essential Christianity, in becoming a Christian, to abrogate the ritual of Mosaic Judaism, the Levitical customs and ceremonies?" or may he retain and observe the ritual of his fathers if he will? There are said to be about 1,500,000 Jews in the United States and the number is rapidly increasing.

—In a full account of the dedication of the new church at Albia, Ia., which we regret that we have not space to publish, R. H. Ingraham, the pastor, says that this was the 529th church which L. L. Carpenter has dedicated. We have not been keeping count ourselves, but our readers will bear us witness that there is seldom a week when we are not called upon to record a dedication by L. L. Carpenter. He is without doubt our champion dedicator. He is at present continuing with the church at Albia in a meeting with four confessions up to date.

—A Toledo paper contains an account of the celebration of the third anniversary of Brother H. F. MacLane's pastorate of the Norwood Avenue Church of Christ in Toledo, O., recently. It was also a reception to Mr. and Mrs. MacLane and daughter and to about sixty new members of the congregation One of the members made an address of welcome, extending hearty congratulations, to which response was made by one of the new members and by Mr. MacLane. The paper states that "the close of Mr. MacLane's third year as pastor finds this church in better condition numerically, financially and spiritually than ever before, and the prospects for the future could not be brighter." All of which is gratifying.

—The Commercial College at Fayette, O., of which J. Fraise Richard is superintendent, will hold a summer normal school of eight weeks beginning June 18.

—This note from Geo. L. Peters, Mound City, Mo., refers to an inquiry which recently appeared in this paper, concerning certain lines from Whittier: "Any copy of Whittier's Poems containing 'The Eternal Goodness' will furnish the poem asked for in this week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST."

—The convention of the Fifth Missionary District of Illinois will be held at Chapin, Ill., June 4-5. Some of the items on the program are as follows: Discussion of the Auxiliary Work, Mrs. J. H. Smart, Mrs. Adalia Roberts, Miss Marie Bronough and Mrs. S. M. Purviance. Our Work in Mexico, Mrs. Irene Smith. Porto Rico, Mrs. Mary Miller. Calcutta Bible Chair, Miss Ella Hanger. Our Work Among the Negroes, Mrs. Emma C. Ewing. Address by the State Secretary, Miss Anna Hale. Field, Forces and Opportunities, R. E. Thomas. Improved Methods in District Work, C. A. Burton. How to Increase the Missionary Spirit, K. C. Ventress. Practical Ways of Promoting Christian Union, W. E. Boulton. Sermon by J. H. Smart. S. S. Mission Work, A. C. Roach. C. E. and Missions, H. G. Waggoner. Boys and Girls' Rally Day, R. F. Thrapp. In the Footsteps of the Pioneers, lecture, by C. C. Redgrave.

—As previously announced the conference of the Disciples of Christ in the Middle Atlantic states will be held at Plymouth, Pa., May 21-23. The following is a partial program:

May 21, 7:30 P. M. Address of Welcome, C. W. Harvey. Response, E. E. Montgomery. Convention sermon, G. P. Rutledge.

May 22, 9 A. M. President's address, E. E. Montgomery; Secretary's report, S. T. Willis; "First Things to be Done," B. Q. Denham; "Our Forces: Men, Money and Doctrine," R. W. Clymer. 2 P. M. Free entertainment will by furnished by the Plymouth church. For special railroad rates address S. T. Willis, 1281 Union Ave., New York City.

—The attention of the graduates of Kentucky University is called to an announcement which comes to us signed by Enoch Grehan, president of the Alumni Society. At the last meeting of the Society of Alumni it was decided to extend the privilege of membership to graduates of all departments of the university. It is hoped that this step will quicken the interest of the alumni in the institution. A business session of the Society of Alumni will be held in Morrison Chapel, Wednesday, June 12, at 3 P. M. A movement will be inaugurated to stimulate the interest of the 7,000 graduates and turn their wide influence to account in promoting the welfare of the University. No money will be solicited at this meeting, but plans will be discussed and organization perfected. It is hoped that as many alumni will attend as find it possible to do so. After commencement exercises on June 13, a banquet will be served in the gymnasium, for which a charge of $1 a plate is made. Payment should be made in advance to Prof. Herbert Martin, 240 Upper Street, Lexington, Ky. Those who cannot attend the banquet are requested to send a written expression of their approval of this new step in the interest of the university. The total number of graduates this year in all departments will be 62.

Is It An Epidemic?

Vital Statistics Show an Alarming Increase in an Already Prevailing Disease—Are Any Exempt?

At no time in the history of disease has there been such an alarming increase in the number of cases of any particular malady as in that of kidney and bladder troubles now preying upon the people of this country.

To-day we see a relative, a friend or an acquaintance apparently well, and in a few days we may be grieved to learn of their serious illness or sudden death, caused by that fatal type of kidney trouble—Bright's disease.

Kidney trouble often becomes advanced into acute stages before the afflicted is aware of its presence; that is why we read of so many sudden deaths of prominent business and professional men, physicians and others. They have neglected to stop the leak in time.

While scientists are puzzling their brains to find out the cause, each individual can, by a little precaution, avoid the chances of contracting dreaded and dangerous kidney trouble, or eradicate it completely from their system if already afflicted. Many precious lives might have been, and many more can yet be saved, by paying attention to the kidneys.

Readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST who have any symptoms of kidney or bladder trouble should write to-day to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., for a free sample bottle of Swamp-Root, the celebrated specific which is having such a great demand and remarkable success in the cure of the most distressing kidney and bladder troubles. With the sample bottle of Swamp-Root will also be sent free a pamphlet and treatise of valuable information.

—J. N. Crutcher, late of Paris, Texas, has accepted a call from the Compton Heights Church, St. Louis. He began work in the new field May 12. We welcome him as an accession to our forces in this city.

—In a letter from corresponding secretary Benjamin L. Smith, he says: "We find that 80 per cent. of our missionary money comes from families that read our church papers." When it is remembered that probably not 50 per cent. of our families take any of our religious papers, it may be seen how much depends upon the wide circulation of our religious papers in the building up of all our missionary, educational and benevolent interests.

—A society of fifty young Cubans has been organized recently at Cienfuegos by the Congregational Church. There is a strong society of sixty-eight members at Puerto Principe, among the L troop of the 8th United States Cavalry, whose president, David Chace, would be glad to receive books and periodicals prepaid for the Soldiers' Reading Room. A society has just been organized at La Gloria, Cuba, where there is an American colony.

—William Woods College will hold its annual commencement May 27-30, as follows: Monday evening, the 27th, elocutionary and musical recital; Wednesday, 10 A. M., meeting of the General Board; 2 P. M., Jubilee exercises; evening, Junior contest; Thursday, 10 A. M, closing day exercises: evening, commencement. Friends of the institution are invited to attend and will be entertained by the church at Fulton. J. B. Jones, president, says: "This is by far the most eventful year of our history. The exercises will be interesting and such program will be prepared as will be a fitting close to the happy escape from our indebtedness. What the institution now asks at the hands of the brotherhood is ample endowment. In the future as in the past the school will have, as its dominant feature, benevolence."

—The Church of Christ at Cairo, Ill., is considering whether it will build a new house of worship or repair the present one. One or the other must be done soon.

—Missouri Sunday-school Convention, Sedalia, June 10–13. Program next week. It will be a great gathering of Bible-school workers. Arrange to go.

—The Arkansas state convention will meet at Fort Smith, June 4–8. All expecting to attend are requested to send their names at once to E. T. Edmonds, Ft. Smith.

—The Bethany Assembly Encampment meetings for the season of 1901 will be held on their beautiful grounds near Brooklyn, Ind., from July 26 to August 12. The calendar and full announcement will be published later. It is not too early now to begin to get ready to attend.

—The receipts for home missions during the first six days of the May offering amount to $3.470.94, a gain of $888.76 over the corresponding period last year. An appeal will shortly be made for Jacksonville, but meanwhile churches are urged not to divert any part of the home missionary offering from its intended purpose.

—The new congregation at Springfield, Ill., will not be separately organized until the building which is to be erected for it in the western part of the city is completed, which will be about Dec. 1. It will then call a pastor of its own. Until that time it will remain as a part of the parent congregation. J. E. Lynn remains as pastor of the First.

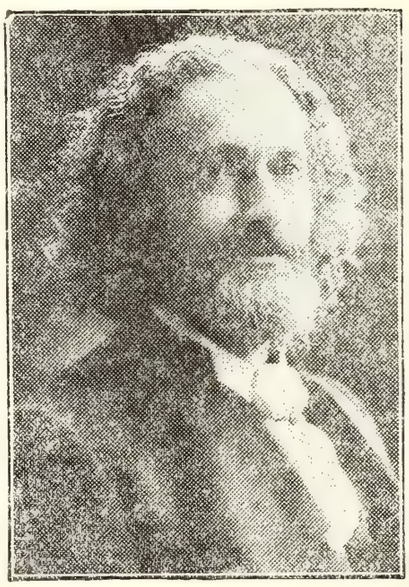
—A. R. Hunt, of Savannah, Mo., writes: "Our County C. E. Convention held at Amazonia last Friday and Saturday was a success. A strong program was well rendered. The first Sunday in May we raised a nice little sum for home missions. I preached at Amazonia yesterday 4 P. M. This has been a strong congregation but needs work badly. Two funerals and one wedding since last report."

—John G. M. Luttenberger announces that we now have a house of worship in Gillespie, Ill., and that the dedication service will be held Lord's day, May 19. By that time he hopes to have a good Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor Society and the entire work of the church in good working order. The building is worth $1,200 and the indebtedness has been reduced to $300 which he thinks can be raised soon. The brethren and citizens in Gillespie, Dorchester and Bunker Hill have liberally contributed to the new church.

—The following is the report of the Church Extension Fund for the month of April, 1901:

Receipts from churches	.....	$ 67.16
" from individuals	.....	366.59
" from bequests	. .. .	6,347.69
" from annuities	.....	3,000.00
Total	... ...	$9,781.44

At the Board meeting held on May 6, 1901, the following loans were granted: Kalamazoo, Mich, $2,000; Princeton, Ky., $1,100; Devine, Tex., $350; Ventura, Cal., $600; Anniston, Ala., $1,000; Tekamah, Neb., $500; Toledo, O., (East Side) $400; Chillicothe, O., $1,400. All remittances should be sent to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 600 Water Works Building, Kansas City, Mo.



Special Iowa Notes.

Drake University, College of the Bible, is launching an old enterprise on a larger scale. Their Summer Assembly, beginning June 17th, is the Preachers' Institute plus a department for S. S. workers and Y. P. S. C. E. people. Especial emphasis will be given to the latter parts. Knox P. Taylor, of Bloomington, Ill., will be with the assembly throughout its session of two weeks. Mrs. Mary Barnes Mitchell, the secretary of the United S. S. work of Iowa and department editor of the State S. S. Worker, will give some choice work along primary lines. Hill M. Bell, Dean of the Normal College of Drake University, assisted by Mrs. Hattie Moore Mitchell of his department, will give a course in child study and primary methods. H. O. Breeden, W. B. Craig, I. N. McCash, Prof. W. A. Cruisinberry and other experienced S. S. workers will help to make this department very profitable. Dr. George H. Combs will lecture one week. Dr. R. B. Turner, of Canton, Mo., will deliver two lectures. W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, will deliver a course of lectures entitled, "Some Modern Substitutes for Christianity." Chas. Reign Scoville and Simpson Ely will speak upon evangelistic methods and the secrets of successful revival work. L. H. Stine, of Quincy, Ill., will lecture upon the theme, "Four Centuries of Reform."

The College of the Bible will also have a summer school in which the class work will continue for nine weeks. Professor Clinton Lockhart will conduct a class in New Testament Greek. Professor A. D. Veatch will have a class in Hebrew. Church History will be in charge of Dean Haggard. Correspondence courses of a high grade may soon be arranged by the College of the Bible. D. H. Bayes, of Battle Creek, Mich., will deliver a course of lectures on Mormonism

Herr Gustavus Cohen.

Herr Cohen, of whom the above cut presents a good likeness, was born in the east of Prussia near the Russian frontier in the little town of Dolzic. His father belonged to a rabbinical family and the son was educated in Hebrew, German and Polish. He was confirmed according to Jewish custom at the age of thirteen. At fourteen years of age he left home and became a wanderer through Germany, Russia, Poland, Austria and Bohemia. After two years he returned to his family in Prussia but soon afterwards joined his brother and other relatives in a manufacturing business in Birmingham, England. He soon acquired a good command of English and was given the entire management of a large factory. After awhile he went to Nottingham as manager of a wholesale clothing manufactory where he was surrounded by gay and thoughtless companions and spent a good part of his wages in company with them. The head of the firm, being a total abstainer, finally induced him to sign the pledge. He also got a new boarding place for him in a Christian home where he would be less subjected to temptation. A little girl's prayer at this home, the first night after his arrival, led him into investigations which resulted in his becoming a Christian, and in his connection with one of our churches in England. He soon developed the powers of public speaking and has been for many years widely known as a lecturer and preacher. He has been in this country for some time lecturing in the eastern states in all the churches, and has the highest testimonials from leading men of the various religious bodies. He is an excellent judge of human nature, has a fine vein of humor and decided gifts as a platform lecturer and preacher. We bespeak for him a cordial reception from the brethren in the various cities he may visit. He will both interest and instruct you.

Correspondence.

Eastern Pennsylvania.

The home mission work in eastern Pennsylvania is on the increase. C. W. Harvey, pastor Christian Church at Plymouth, Pa., E. E. Manley, of Altoona, and the writer made tours during the month of April, which were intended to include all our churches in eastern Pennsylvania district in the interest of the A. C. M. S.

The church at LeMoyne, 70 members, raised balance, $416, from December to April, on their church debt, under the efficient leadership of H. I. Dudley.

The Harrisburg Church, David Millar, pastor, has an attendance of 150 at the Friday evening meetings of the Junior Endeavor Society. Made repairs recently in the church to extent of $80.

Geo. C. Zeigler ministers to the congregations worshiping at Newberry, Steam Valley, Lycoming and Cogan House, and is doing excellent work among them.

Williamsport Church, C. A. Brady, minister, is outgrowing its building and has the fever for a newer and the need for a larger place of worship. Added to membership, from Jan. 1 to April, 48.

Newberry is a suburb of Williamsport and a splendid congregation can soon be built up with the proper encouragement. They meet in the former home of the Evangelicals.

F. E. Spooner, formerly minister at Grover, has recently recovered from serious illness. His address is Hill's Grove.

One-fourth of the population of Canton are members of L. O. Newcomer's congregation. The church supports two orphans in India and gives $100 per year to church extension. C. A Brady held a meeting recently for this church with 51 additions; added during the year, 75.

Alba, organized by Dr. S. E. Sheppard, has been the mother of many new organizations in northeast Pennsylvania. Has one of the most modern auditoriums in the district. This is an able congregation in purse and purpose. R. E. Jope is their minister.

Leroy has recently purchased a new parsonage. They will likely want a pastor to occupy the parsonage. M. E. Genge, of Granville Center, supplies for them on Lord's day afternoons

The work at Granville Center is progressing nicely under the enthusiastic guidance of M. E Genge, lately from Lubeck, Me. This church recently surprised its neighbors by raisng $40 for foreign missions.

E. F. Randall is the leader at Troy. This was until recently a mission. It now owns a beautiful frame building. There have been 26 added to their numbers since Jan. 1, 1901.

W. I. Burrell is in his seventh year as minister at Sylvania. They have a splendid house of worship and a membership of 100.

Mainesburg has no pastor. The right man could do some good work and learn the lesson of sacrffice.

F. J. M. Appleman ministers for the congregation at Canoe Camp and Covington. The former has a good building clear of debt, and the latter is erecting in the best portion of the borough a fine brick cased building. It is advisable to open a work at Mansfield, there being already 30 members residing in that normal school center.

Sayre is the best location for our work in northeast Pennsylvania. It is in the center of an unchurched population. Sayre has 5,500 people; Athens 3,500, and the cities join.

Leon J. Reynolds, the minister at East Smithfield, is now under the care of physicians at Elmira, N. Y.

The recent meeting of the Philadelphia Christian Missionary Society, held at Third Christian Church, was a notable event. B. Q. Denham, of New York, made the address of the evening to a crowded house.

The First Church, Philadelphia, under the ministry of Robert Graham Frank, recently raised $1,000 for local work, district and foreign missions. On the first Lord's day in May they raised $100 for home missions. Frequent additions.

Arthur Holmes recently held a meeting in the Sixth Church with 14 additions. Two added since.

The Third Church has the building fever and it seems as if there is no cure—except building. G. P. Rutledge is the pastor.

Kensington Church is again experiencing a revival in its regular services. Five confessions May 5, and one the week previous. One added from Church of God. This church will supplement its home missionary offering by an offering for Jacksonville, Fla., to be sent through the A. C. M. S. We expect the combined offering to reach $40.

Minnesota Letter.

Our recent meeting of the Ministerial Association in this state was a very pleasant and profitable affair. The program was good throughout. Three items were especially good; "The Blood Covenant" by J. K. Shellenberger; "Is Christianity an Evolution or a Revelation?" by A. D. Harmon, and "A Study of Second Timothy" by H. T. Sutton.

The Minnesota state convention will be held with the church in this city some time in August. We do not expect a large convention owing to the fact that nearly all of our people are planning to attend the general convention at Minneapolis in October.

Recently I spent five days preaching for the church at Plainview, Minn. No more heroic band of Christians can be found anywhere. Few in numbers and poor, they have expended for the furtherance of the cause—including the building, a fine church—amounts that would put to shame many churches of three times its membership. Bro. Utterback, who is principal of the public schools of the town, renders them valuable service in the way of speaking and in other ways.

W. W. Divine, of Eden Valley, I understand is to move to Rochester June 1st. He is to preach for Rochester, Marion and Pleasant Grove. That important field is to be congratulated on securing a man who will push the work as Bro. Divine does.

E. A. Orr, of Chicago, is to be pastor at Redwood Falls, beginning soon. May he find his new field so congenial that he will stay ten years.

Henry Goodacre, of Redwood Falls, formerly pastor of the church there, a preacher well and favorably known among us throughout the country, has written a book which will soon issue from the press. Its title will be "Quo Warranto" It is a story which he uses to show the falsity of several religious fads Bro. Goodacre's experience peculiarly fits him for writing such a work.

H. T. Sutton has temporarily abandoned pastoral work and moved onto his farm in northern Minnesota.

Simpson Ely is to hold a meeting for the church at Lewisville about June 1st.

R. M. Ainsworth is the new pastor at Cleveland and Sharon.

Prof. Frank H. Marshall, of Add Ran University, will spend the summer in this state, preaching for the church at Garden City.

M. B. Ainsworth is soon to leave Duluth—a matter of deep regret. In this state the people move slowly and seldom in a religious sense, but the preachers move often. If we could have less moving by the preachers, perhaps the people could be moved after awhile.

Bro. Scott, formerly pastor at Sioux Falls, S. D., is now preaching for the new church in St. Paul and at the same time pursuing his studies in the State University.

H. D. Williams.

Mankato, Minn.

Iowa Notes.

Willis F. Jordon, of Arkansas, has accepted the work at Schaller for full time.

Noah Garwick will preach for the church at Griswold; Bro. Garwick is one of our successful young preachers and his wife is an excellent help in his work. He graduates from Drake this June and is well equipped for his work.

J. M. Lowe goes to Colorado to supply the pulpit at Boulder for a few weeks.

J. E. Wright has taken the work at Tingly.

C. D. Houghman will preach at Nevada May 5. Bro Houghman had a very successful rally with his congregation at Indianapolis last Lord's day. Bro. Haggard who was at one time pastor of the church was present and preached. There were five additions to the church during the day.

A. M. Haggard will spend to morrow, May 5th, at Sioux City.

Encouraging reports come from Sidney. Bro. C. Ray Murphy is getting hold of the work and is already beginning to reap from his sowing.

We have a number of churches wanting pastors.

W. E Harlow is in a good meeting at Osceola.

F. L. Davis can be secured for meetings or for supply work. Bro. Davis ought to be kept busy. He wants to attend Drake next year. Address him at Heyworth, Ill.

L. L. Carpenter will dedicate the new church at Albia to-morrow the 5th inst.

The church at Moravia is about completed and will be dedicated June 9th. We have only a few brethren at Moravia with no place for holding meetings. These faithful souls have braved every obstacle and, without a pastor or a place of any kind to hold meetings, have a good house almost ready for dedication. They have made a heroic struggle and need the help of neighboring congregations.

Your secretary dedicated the church at Pawnee, Neb., April 21, and one at Selection, Ia., April 28.

The church at Cedar Bluffs is almost ready for dedication.

April was a good month for the I. C. C. The receipts for the general fund were very encouraging and we received $1,600 for the permanent fund.

Our series of district conventions will begin at Creston on Monday night, May 6. We next go to Ft. Dodge for the Northwest District Convention which begins May 13; then to Marshalltown for the Northeast District Convention beginning May 20, to Pleasantville for the Central District Convention beginning May 27, and to Sigourney for the Southeast District Convention June 3. Good programs have been prepared and we hope for a large attendance and interesting sessions.

Transformations.

Curious Results When Coffee Drinking is Abandoned.

It is almost as hard for an old coffee toper to quit the use of coffee as it is for a whiskey or tobacco fiend to break off, except that the coffee user can quit coffee and take up Postum Food Coffee without any feeling of a loss of the morning beverage, for when Postum is well boiled and served with cream, it is really better in point of flavor than most of the coffee served nowadays, and to the taste of the connoisseur it is like the flavor of fine Java.

A great transformation takes place in the body within ten days or two weeks after coffee is left off and Postum Food Coffee used, for the reason that the poison to the nerves has been discontinued and in its place is taken a liquid that contains the most powerful elements of nourishment.

It is easy to make this test and prove these statements by changing from coffee to Postum Food Coffee.

In St. Louis.

For the next three years St. Louis will be the brightest spot on the map. Already there are indications of improvement and enlargement in the city. Our real estate friends are taking advantage of a real or supposed or expected increase in demand for houses, to raise rents. On a recent Wednesday, building permits for small residences and flats amounting to $54,000 were granted; the next day, $36,000. Work has commenced on the new buildings for Washington University, on the new site near Forest Park. This institution has recently been richly endowed by the gift of two of our citizens, the property known as the Cupples Block being deeded to the trustees for the use and behoof of the university.

Disciples of Christ are not sleeping on their arms. A joint meeting of the official boards of our churches was held a week ago at the First Church, under the auspices of the Christian Church Circle, W. Daviess Pittman, president, to devise ways and means for a closer unity. F. E. Udell was elected temporary president and a committee on by-laws was appointed, with J. H. Garrison chairman, to report at an adjourned meeting May 16. It is expected to form a central association which will express our essential unity in the city, and that all matters which affect vitally any church or churches will be considered by this association, such as the calling or dismissal of a pastor, the opening of a mission, incurring of a debt, erection or improvement of a building, etc.

At the first meeting, above referred to, one of the speakers suggested that inasmuch as we preach Christian union on any and all occasions, it would be well to try it ourselves a while, and see if it is practicable! There is a much more fraternal spirit among the churches than in days past, but still there is room for improvement. Our exaggerated independency, together with our comparative poverty, has brought about an atrophy of the building instinct, with the result that we have not a single modern, representative, adequate church building in the entire city, and what we have has cost us, in most cases, more than it is worth.

The vacant pulpits in the city are filling up. James N. Crutcher comes from Paris, Texas, to take up the work at Compton Heights. He was warmly welcomed last Lord's day. L. B. Coggins, recently from California, has been at work two weeks at Ellendale. These two men we consider valuable acquisitions to our force. They are young, hopeful, industrious and studious, and we hereby serve notice on other churches that we want them left unmolested until they have wrought for a long term of years in their respective fields. James McAllister, who has been acting pastor for the Central, will shortly leave for some permanent work, and Howard T. Cree, of Maysville, Ky., will succeed him. Mr. McAllister has had a most favorable introduction to the brotherhood and has demonstrated his sincerity, ability and genuineness to the whole circle of St. Louis Disciples. The church that secures him will be fortunate.

A. B. Moore, who has been supplying in Chicago for several weeks, spent a few days in the city last week. He still calls St. Louis headquarters and is always a welcome visitor. O. D. Maple, of Cameron, Ill., preached at Carondelet May 5, and W. D. Endres May 12. Mr. Endres had already agreed to preach half time each at Montgomery City and Laddonia, so he could not consider a proposition to fight on half rations in this city. The committee of the Alliance, to consider what representation of religious interests should be made at the World's Fair, has held two meetings, but moves with characteristic timidity and long halts between moves. If this matter depends on the Evangelical Alliance, there is nothing worthy to be looked for.

Kansas Mission Notes.

Kansas has at least two great reasons for being grateful to the giver of every good gift: Prohibition and the magnificent prospect for a great wheat crop.

M. C. Hambly has located for full time at Randall. This is the first time the Randall church has undertaken full time, but they will succeed without a great effort.

Bro. McConnell, of Great Bend, writes that they will dedicate their new house early this fall. Frequent additions.

J. G. Slick has entered upon his work at Pawnee Rock and Macksville. They will dedicate their new house at the latter place the first or second Sunday in June. The superintendent has been invited to assist.

Sister Hazelrigg begins the siege at Concordia May 12. Our cause is very weak here and anti-ism, sectarianism, Romanism and rum-ism are strongly intrenched.

Albert Neece goes from Alexander to Scott City and Dighton. We believe this will prove to be a fruitful union.

We note the constant growth of Bro. Nay's work at Leavenworth. They almost doubled their apportionment for home missions.

L. S. Ridenour was pegging away at Frederick at last report. Prospects not flattering, for the reason that the church is suffering from the effects of anti-ism.

W. H. Scrivner is in a meeting at Girard with fair prospects. He may locate there. Bro. Scrivner has served very acceptably as state evangelist.

Now that home missions has been attended to we should turn our attention to our Kansas work. Kansas missions demand our prompt and generous attention. Our treasury is greatly in need of money to carry on our work. We have not pressed this matter lately as our general home work had the right of way. But now, brethren, come to our aid. We need it. Many churches and Bible schools have paid nothing so far this year. Many owe for the second quarter. The C. E. societies have been slow in responding. Our state mission work is prospering in every way except financially, and this can soon be corrected if each will do his part. Enough money is now due to meet all obligations.

Some of our missionaries which should have been paid April 1, are still waiting.

Remember us now. W. S. LOWE.

Ohio Letter.

People on the Pennsylvania lines are familiar these days with "The Akron Route." Just now all Buckeye Disciples are interested in the "Akron Route." Next week all routes lead to Akron. The hosts will begin to assemble on Monday afternoon. The Ohio C. W. B. M. will occupy Monday night and Tuesday. C. W. B. M. means, Can the Women Beat the Men? Come and see. Tuesday night President Huffer will open the O. C. M. S. convention with his address, and Secretary Bartlett will submit the annual report of the State Board in printed form. The great climax will be reached on Thursday night when H. L. Willett will discuss "The Testimony of the Disciples in the New Century." If you have not hitherto resolved to go do so just now. It is never too late to mend.

Toledo will soon have a new church on the east side. A mission has been sustained by the Central Church there. A lot has been purchased. The Bible-school has met in a private house. The kitchen served as a primary room. A man not a member gave the foundation all put in ready to build on. Listen, ye missionary skeptics, the heroic effort to save the Central Church in Toledo paid.

H. F. McLane is leading the Norwood Ave. Church in a building enterprise—a $25,000 house. It will be on the institutional plan with a roof garden for summer work. So says the daily press.

The Excuse

Made by many a man for taking a drink at the bar is that he needs a bracer. He feels weak, his stomach is "out of sorts" and liquor makes him "feel good." The tired man who sits on a pin leaps up with new energy, but no one would say that this energy was evidence of the strength giving power of a pin. So with the energy induced by liquors. They only spur the body on, but do not strengthen it.

Strength is made from food properly digested and assimilated. When the stomach is diseased there is a failure to extract the nutrition from food and the body grows weak. The weak body needs strengthening, not stimulating. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures diseases of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition, so that the nutrition of food is perfectly extracted and assimilated and the body nourished into health and strength.

There is no alcohol in "Golden Medical Discovery," and it is entirely free from opium, cocaine and all other narcotics.

Accept no substitute for "Golden Medical Discovery." There is no other medicine "just as good" for diseases of the stomach and allied organs.

"Your 'Golden Medical Discovery' and Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy have been of great benefit to me," writes (Prof.) Pleasant A. Oliver, of Viola, Fulton Co., Ark. "Before I used the above mentioned remedies my sleep was not sound: digestion bad; a continual feeling of misery. I now feel like a new man."

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets regulate the bowels and liver.

L. A. Warren is doing a permanent work on the south side in Toledo. Verily we shall some day have much people in the "Frog City."

Wesley Hatcher is leading the New Holland church in a building enterprise. For years the church has been a half mile from the village. They are now building in town. This is wise. They hope to dedicate about the middle of August.

E. S. DeMiller is preaching for the new church at Lancaster, half time, and for Croton the other half. He will live in Columbus.

Geo. P. Taubman is leading the Portsmouth church very successfully. They claim the largest S. S. in the state among those who are simply Disciples of Christ. On a recent rally day they had near 800. From 300 to 500 go to prayer-meeting at that church. Some walls will soon have to be pushed out to make room for the people. The growth of this church has been remarkable. Dr. J. F. Davis for many years stood almost alone in maintaining the work there. God blessed him with this world's goods and he used them to glorify God, and the sowing in tears is now being reaped in great joy.

A new church has been organized in Ohio's capital. It is on the west side. A school has been run for three years. The Franklin County Church Extension Society will foster this work and perhaps the State Board will help some later. This is a good opening. A lot will be purchased and a chapel erected.

The Ohio scribe will be on hand at Akron with pencil and notebook. Look out for a full report next week. The churches of Columbus will ask for the convention next year.

Success in the East.

Missionary work in the east took another step forward on May 5, when four of the New York ministers and about seventy from their congregations came over to rejoice with us in the dedication of our chapel. We had personally invited our neighbors who reside in the immediate vicinity of the chapel and our house was filled. Bro. Willis, who has been largely instrumental in starting and fostering our work, spoke on "Christ in the Church." Bro. Denham followed with injunctions as to the work of a Christ-filled church. After a few words from Bro. Schmetzer, of the Flatbush Church, Bro. Harlan dedicated us and our church home to God in fervent prayer.

This was the culmination of seventeen months' work in the conservative east. Our start, present condition and prospects are full of significance for future work.

Late in the fall of 1899 the first meeting was held at the home of Bro. E. L. Kelland. After a second meeting we invited a plumber to move into the back part of his store room and rent us the front part of his store. He moved. On January 1, 1900, twelve adults and one child met for Bible study, prayer and communion. This was the start.

In May Bro. Kelland represented our need to the Atlantic conference. It was decided to put an evangelist into this eastern field and Dr. Montgomery, of Philadelphia, gave generous inspiration to the movement, and it was later decided to divert whatever was raised to establish the cause in Newark. In October the Home Board put me in charge of this work, and in November the Church Extension Board bought us a lot admirably located a few blocks from our dear little store-room chapel.

About $800 was pledged in our little band for a building fund. Brethren in North Tonawanda, Auburn and New York City gave us $300 more and the chapel was built. Furniture and necessary expenses up to $2,200 was incurred, $1,400 of which is raised. We shall keep asking for help until this balance and our loan from the Extension Board is paid and then become at once self-supporting. We number 26, a Bible-school of 62 and an auxiliary of 10, all of our women and one Presbyterian woman making the number, and a Sunday-school class of girls supporting a child in the orphanage in India. This is the present condition. Our prospects are typical of the entire east.

Two miles from my window are the Orange Mountains. From there on a clear day may be seen in one sweep of vision the homes of more than one-fifteenth of the entire population of this country. The greatest center of population on earth is spread out before you, the commercial metropolis of the United States, the intellectual and religious metropolis and the probable metropolis of vice, although this last distinction is sometimes claimed by a town somewhere in Illinois.

The people are here, the money is here, the spiritual response is here. Washington, Danbury, Conn., Worcester, Mass., and Newark, are a standing and powerful refutation of the claim that the west is a better field for our plea than the east, and the east has some marked advantages over the west. Church work in the "flat" districts of any city is met by peculiar disadvantages. Suburban missions on the contrary are at once fruitful and progressive. The men as a rule are business men, accustomed to handling money in large amounts, and imperative in expecting results. They know that success in any enterprise costs money, and they will part with their money cheerfully to attain desirable results. And they are accustomed to taking long chances for success. But we shall never have men of large wealth interested in our enterprises if we do not interest and hold the young business men who are here and coming here and succeeding in business.

It may be practicable to multiply our churches in the crowded districts of the city, but it is certainly practicable to multiply many fold our suburban missions, going into the home districts where the work of the church is accessible and can more readily be an efficient factor in the home life. Put the money and the man here to start a work and set it on its feet and it will return abundantly to you after not many days.

We confidently ask our brethren for help here in Newark and for all the east. It is a most fruitful, a most fertile field. We appreciated most heartily a gift of $50 from Los Angeles, Cal., and earnestly pray for the speedy coming of the time when innumerable bonds of fellowship in service shall reach from shore to shore and bind all continents in loving embrace. R. P. SHEPHERD.

Who Discovered the Circulation of the Blood?

Paul states a just and reasonable principle in human action when he declares that honor should be given to whom honor is due.

In biographical sketches generally, Dr. William Harvey is mentioned as "the discoverer of the circulation of the blood."

Webster's definition of discoverer is: "One who discovers, espies, or first comes to the knowledge of something; one who discovers an unknown country, or a new principle, truth or fact." The verb discover implies one of several things: to expose to view; to make known; to obtain for the first time sight or knowledge of.

It matters not which definition of either the noun "discoverer" or the verb "discover" we are disposed to take, the difficulty is the same. Dr. Harvey can not be justly considered "the discoverer of the circulation of the blood."

Let us consider a few facts. Dr. William Harvey was born at Folkestone, England, on the first of April, 1578. He was educated at Cains' College, Cambridge, and at Padua on the Continent. At the latter place he took his doctor's degree under Fabricius. He returned to England in 1602. He was surgeon to James I and Charles I.

It is claimed that his discovery of the circulation of the blood was suggested by him in 1616, announced in 1619 and published to the world in 1628 in his Exercitatio de motu cordis et Sanguinis.

One of Harvey's contemporaries was the myriad-minded Shakespeare. In fact, the latter was a boy of 14 when Harvey was born. In his Hamlet, written as critics admit not later than 1600, is a statement showing that Shakespeare had a tolerably clear conception of the circulation of the blood. I quote from Scene 5, Act 1. It is the language of the ghost:

"Blood of man
That swift as quicksilver it courses through
The natural gates and alleys of the body,
And with a sudden vigor it doth posset
And curd, like eager droppings into milk,
The thin and wholesome blood."

Nor is this all. In Scene 4, Act 3, of the same play occurs this language:

"My pulse, as yours, doth temperately keep time and makes as healthful music."

Still again in Scene 2. Act 3, of the Merchant of Venice, is found the declaration, "Only my blood speaks to you in my veins."

An examination of these passages reveals the fact that the poet had a tolerably correct idea of the blood and its circulation. Its rapidity he represents by the swiftness of "quicksilver." Its arteries and veins he represents by "gates" and "alleys." Its coagulation is indicated by "curding." The regularity and rhythm of the blood's action he suggests by keeping time and affording "healthful music." He specifically mentions "veins."

All this, let it be known, was written prior to 1600; that is to say, at least 16 years before Dr. Harvey claims to have made the discovery and at least a quarter of a century before he published his theory to the world. We are justified, it seems, in concluding that Dr. Harvey is not justly entitled to the honor of being considered "the discoverer of the circulation of the blood."

Fayette, O. Mar. 4, 1901.

Remember a fifty cent bottle of Scott's Emulsion given in proper quantities will last a baby fifty days; a child six or seven, thirty days; and a child of ten or twelve, twenty days.

It's a very economical medicine.

If the child is sickly, without appetite, it will nourish and bridge it over until it can take its usual food.

For delicate children without any real disease, it can be used with splendid results.

We'll send you a little to try, if you like.

Elder L. B. Wilkes.

I have just received a letter from Brother Edmund Wilkes, dated May 1, informing me that his father, Elder L. B. Wilkes, "passed away from earth and its sorrows and burdens last night shortly after midnight." So the spirit of that mighty man of God took its flight from the earthly house to join the company of "the spirits of just men made perfect," just as the month of May, 1901, was ushered in.

Doubtless some competent pen, some brother possessed of the necessary data, will furnish the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST with a suitable obituary, giving a sketch of his life and eminent labors in the Lord's vineyard.

But as one who knew him long and loved him much, I wish to offer this tribute to his memory. Bro. Wilkes and I were fellow students in Bethany College more than fifty years ago. Greater confidence and warmer love seldom if ever knit the souls of two young men together than that which bound us together at that time. During the more than half century that has passed since that time nothing has ever occurred to mar that confidence or to cool the ardor of that brotherly love.

His son says: "He was not afraid to die, I am sure. The Almighty arms were underneath and about him." Of that there can be no shadow of doubt.

He was a valiant soldier of the cross, a mighty warrior against the prince of darkness. His soul has left the body in Stockton, Cal., and gone to join his loved ones where there is no death.

For a little while, my beloved brother, farewell! I hope and expect to join you, and love you, and labor and rest with you in the vigor and strength of glorified manhood. In that land we will never wear out nor die.

FLORIDA.

Jacksonville, May 1.—There have been 21 additions to the First Church; 16 by confession and baptism, since the first of January.—J. T. BOONE.

ILLINOIS.

Bloomington, May 13.—A full house last night at the Mission. Five additions. This makes 10 for the last four sermons—many more in sight.—JOHN D. AUSTIN, pastor.

Centralia, May 7.—I held one week's meeting at Gunion with 12 additions, 8 by confession and baptism, 3 reclaimed, one by letter. The church is in better condition than it has been for years. I assisted Bro. Williams in a meeting at Bailey; 5 additions, 4 by letter, 1 by confession and baptism.—LEW D. HILL, 7th district evangelist, Exchange, Ill.

LeRoy, May 6.—Two baptisms last week at prayer-meeting and one by letter recently. —F. A. SWORD.

Lane, May 13.—Two confessions at last night's service. Churches wanting a meeting write to me at Lane, Ill.—M. L. SORNBORGER.

Latona.—Four additions, 2 baptized on April 6, and 6 additions, 4 by baptism May 5. —WILLSON, pastor.

Springfield, May 13.—We had 11 additions at our regular services yesterday.—J. E. LYNN.

Watseka, May 13.—Another added yesterday. Exceeded our apportionment for home missions one week ago.—B. S. FERRALL.

INDIANA.

Ft. Wayne, May 13.—Three additions to the West Jefferson Street Church yesterday, and one the week previous.—E. W. ALLEN.

North Vernon, May 6.—Began work at North Vernon yesterday as resident pastor. Had 4 accessions the first day. Preached a sermon in the morning on "America, the crown of 20th century history." Offering for home missions $9.25. No apportionment.—PERRY THOMAS MARTIN, pastor.

Wilkinson, May 7.—There were six confessions and eight additions by statement as a result of a short meeting held for us here by Evangelist Robert Sellers.—R. L. HANDLEY, pastor.

IOWA.

Corning, May 6.—Three more additions here yesterday. We are making preparations for children's day service. The district convention meets at Creston this evening. We hope to have the finest meeting in our history.—I. H. FULLER.

Knoxville, May 12.—The Church of Christ of Knoxville, Ia., was organized with 21 members March 29, 1901, and has grown to 56. We took our first offering for missions to-day, resulting in an offering of $26 59. We are making all preparations for children's day, and expect to raise not less than $15. Sister Newcomer will be with us next Lord's day to organize a C. W. B. M.—HARRY WALSTON, pastor.

Moulton, May 13.—Six added since last report. Work moves along encouragingly. At a recent board meeting, a unanimous call was extended to me to remain another year at an increase of $100 in salary.—R. M. DUNGAN.

KANSAS.

Holton.—Twenty-six confessions here yesterday.—J. V. COOMBS AND DAN STEWART.

Kingman, May 7.—I am here assisting Bro. D. D. Boyle in a meeting. Three confessions to date. My time is not taken for June.—V. E. RIDENOUR, singer.

Paola, May 6.—We have had 11 additions at regular services in the past six weeks.—E. G. MERRILL.

MISSOURI.

Carrollton, May 9.—Seven additions last night at prayer-meeting, four confessions, two by letter and one by statement.—E. H. KELLAR.

Carthage, May 13.—Three additions this Lord's day; one by letter, two ladies of social prominence making the good confession.—W. A. OLDHAM.

Farmington, May 13.—The wife of one of our elders united with the congregation here yesterday. I begin my work here with bright prospects. I am working two days each week with the brethren at Elvins, one of the mining towns of our county. I am not preaching, but pushing the church building at that place; 15,000 people in this mining district, and we must be established there.—R. M. TALBERT.

Hannibal.—On May 5, I preached a fifth anniversary sermon. During the five years of service, 383 have been received into the church, 119 of these by baptism. I have conducted 121 funerals, 46 of these were members of the Hannibal church; 70 marriage ceremonies were performed. The removals and deaths have been so many that the net gain in membership has been only about 100. During the pastor's annual vacation, the auditorium will receive a new carpet and fresco. I will preach the baccalaureate sermon at Pike College, Bowling Green, May 26. Our offering for home missions was about $110.—LEVI MARSHALL.

Holden, May 13.—Yesterday the Holden Church made its offering for foreign, home, and state missions and church extension. The amount pledged was one-third more than the apportionment.—H. F. BURNS.

Huntsville, May 13.—Two more additions at regular services last night, one by confession and one from Methodists. J. O. Davis, of Hollister, Cal., was with us yesterday morning and gave us a stirring sermon on home missions. He left for Kansas City at once. We are planning for a large offering the second Sunday in June. G. A. Hoffmann will be with us that day. Will have H. A. Northcutt hold us a meeting early in September.—LOUIS S. CUPP.

Joplin, May 6.—During April we received 10 additions here, three were by letter, one by statement, one from Baptists and five by confession.—W. F. TURNER.

Kirksville, May 9.—Had six additions last Sunday. Baptized seven at prayer-meeting last night, one of them a Dr. S. J. Alamshah from Persia.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Mound City, May 4.—Since beginning here, Jan. 27, there have been 13 additions to the congregation, six by primary obedience. The church made an offering for foreign missions of $70, and the Juniors raised $8 at their Easter concert. Our offering for home missions will approximate $50.—GEO. L PETERS.

Princeton, May 6.—We had two additions here April 28, one by confession and one from the "Latter Day Saints." One confession yesterday. Three new to us since last report. —J. E. DAVIS.

Rosendale, May 8.—Sunday, April 28, we had five additions by letter. We have also raised our apportionments for the following causes: Foreign missions, general home missions and state missions. Our apportionment for these was $30.—S. R. REYNOLDS.

Salem, May 7.—We closed the meeting at Salem, May 5 with 24 additions. Bro. Ben F. Hill, of California, Mo., was with us two and a half weeks and won for himself a warm place in the affections of the people. Bro. Guy B. Williamson, of St. Louis, led the song service and did it in a masterly way.—E. E. DAVIDSON.

NEBRASKA.

Miller, May 7.—We continued the meeting a few days at Seward, five added. We are now at Miller. We find a few brethren but no organization, no building. We hope to organize ere we close. One confession last night. We expect to begin in our tent as soon as possible. We have made no definite arrangements as yet. Churches wanting meetings at good points where we can plant the cause let me hear from you. H. B.

Cures Baldness

Prevents Hair Falling Out, Removes Dandruff, Stops Itching and Restores Luxuriant Growth to Shining Scalps, Eyebrows and Eyelashes.

A TRIAL PACKAGE FREE.

Men, Women or Children, Even Bald Heads Can Have a Fine Head of Hair.

D. B. Cherniss, Farmersville, Texas, says the top of his head was entirely bald, but the Remedies have grown a fine new crop of hair, and every one in town is surprised to see it.

Says Professor Turner, President of Fairmount College, Sulphur, Ky.:—"After being bald for thirty years, I began using the remedy in 1895, and in a few weeks thereafter my entire scalp was covered with a thick downy growth of new hair. The whole of my hair was gone except a fringe around the hat line. In six weeks the bald spot was entirely covered. I had been bald for thirty years, and when hair can be made to grow on such a head as mine, no bald-headed person need fear the results."

Theresa Fennell, Moscow, Idaho, says:—"My head was bald and glossy, but since using the Foso Treatment my hair is now four inches in length and quite curly."

The remedy has cured thousands, and no one need fear that it is harmful. We do not ask you to take our word for it or anyone else's. Send for the free trial and learn for yourself just what this wonderful remedy will actually do for you.

The remedy also cures itching and dandruff, sure signs of approaching baldness, and keeps the scalp healthy and vigorous. It also restores gray hair to natural color and produces thick and lustrous eyebrows and eyelashes. By sending your name and address to the Altenheim Medical Dispensary, 3866 Butterfield Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, enclosing a 2-cent stamp to cover postage, they will mail you prepaid a free trial package of their remarkable remedy.

Hollingsworth who came into the church during our Craig meeting is now located with them.—J. S. BEEM, evangelist.

Ulysses.—Geo. M. Reed has been called to the Arapahoe church and enters upon his work there at once. C. A. Sias has been called to the Unadilla pastorate and accepted. Will supply till school closes in June and then reside there. Wickham and Givens closed the Scott's Bluff meeting with 20 additions, 15 baptisms and five otherwise. They are now at Gering in a meeting and will likely go from there to Mt. Zion Church near Alliance. Bro. Geo. Lobengier has been supplying at Peru for several Lord's days. John T. Smith had 54 additions at Shubert when meeting was 15 days old. W. T. Hacker visited Tecumseh recently. Thirteen added was the last report from Tekamah. Bro. Smith, the pastor, says they are making a strong pull to put the work on a good foundation. H. B. Hollingsworth, who has been for some years engaged in Y M. C. A. work, is now preaching for the church at Craig. H. H. Rama, pastor at Blair, reports one added at that place. Also that they are preparing to have a Bible-school rally there on June 12, including Craig, Tekamah and Omaha. Bro. Ogden closed at Elwood on May 5. When last heard from there were eight additions and the church moving toward getting a preacher for half time. W. H. Waggoner is in a missionary institute at Hebron.—W. A. BALDWIN, secretary.

Waterloo.—A. O. Swartwood has resigned the pastorate here after two years' work and will locate at North Fremont. He wishes to engage with churches in eastern Nebraska or western Iowa, which can have preaching only once or twice a month. Address at Waterloo until July. During the past two years there have been 26 additions, 17 by confession; Christian Endeavor has grown from 13 to 40 members; present church membership, 90. Plans are being made to secure a pastor and to have a meeting in the fall.

NEW YORK.

Buffalo, May 7.—Three additions last Sunday at the Richmond Street Church and five the Sunday before. We have had additions every Sunday for a month. Raised $170 for Home Missions.—B. A. JENKINS.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Wilson.—The church here has raised for all purposes during the last four years, $15,750. Carey E. Morgan has recently closed a very good meeting with the church and B. H. Melton has been pastor for four years. The church is prominently connected with our missionary and educational interests.—J. B. BATES, clerk.

OHIO.

Columbus, May 6.—Yesterday was high-tide in Bible-school work at the West Fourth Avenue Church; 223 present. We hold a "Twentieth Century Bible-school Rally" June 2. We have set the mark at 300 and will reach it.—M. E. CHATLEY, pastor.

OKLAHOMA.

Chandler, May 9.—Three additions, one baptism in my work since last report. Organized a Junior Christian Endeavor Society at Luther.—A. M. HARRAL.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Alleghany.—Eight additions to-day at regular services at First Church, W. J. Lhamon, pastor; four by confession.—H. F. NICHOLS.

TENNESSEE.

Johnson City, May 9.—The Church of Christ at Johnson City has recently enjoyed a visit from Bro. I. J. Spencer, of Lexington, Ky. He was with us two weeks in a meeting, and by his able preaching of the simple gospel was instrumental in bringing 30 souls to this gospel, and also building up those who were already in the fold. The latter result we regard as of equal importance with the first. The meeting was a great success from every standpoint. Under the leadership of Bro. A. A. Ferguson, our able pastor, we are expecting to take this town for the primitive gospel.—A. B. CROUCH.

The Reformation of The XIXth Century

A Series of Historical Sketches, dealing with the Rise and Progress of the Religious Movement inaugurated by Thomas and Alexander Campbell, from its Origin to the close of the Nineteenth Century.

Edited by J. H. Garrison

This great work, which has been eagerly awaited for some time, is now ready for delivery. It is truly a notable work—a splendid addition to the literature of the Disciples of Christ. It is the only complete and modern history of the current reformation, and therefore should at once find a place in the home of every earnest and zealous Disciple.

This history is divided into eight periods, as follows:

Introductory Period	Chas. Louis Loos.
Period of Organization	B. B. Tyler.
The Turbulent Period	W. T. Moore.
The Transition Period	T. W. Grafton.
Period of Revival of Home Missions	Benj. L. Smith.
Period of Foreign Missions	A. McLean.
Period of Woman's Work	Lois A. White.
Lessons from Our Past	J. H. Garrison.

Chas. Louis Loos was personally and intimately acquainted with the fathers of the reformation, and associated with them in their work. His statement of the origin of our movement, and of its early connection with the Baptists, is the most satisfactory which has yet been made. B. B. Tyler has for many years been an untiring student of the history of our movement. W. T. Moore was an active and prominent participant in the events of the period beginning with 1861. His sketch of Alexander Campbell is a masterpiece, and is alone worth the price of the book. T. W. Grafton, in his "Life of Alexander Campbell," and "Men of Yesterday" has shown his ability as an able historian. Benj. L. Smith, A. McLean and Miss White have been most conspicuously identified with the enterprises of which they write. The closing section, by J. H. Garrison, is the address delivered by him at the Jubilee Convention in Cincinnati, October, 1899.

"The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century" is a handsome volume of 514 pages, bound in cloth. It is an addition to that list of books which, whatever other books he may have, every earnest Disciple of Christ should possess. This history is not only a volume full of facts and information, but a story of absorbing interest.

The New Cookery.

Since Lizzie goes to cookin' school the house
don't seem the same:
Most everything we get to eat has got a fancy
name,
An' none of it is what we like, but what's the use to kick?
I reckon it's all right so long as it don't make us sick.
But, somehow, well, I'm gettin' tired of this here "consommay,"
An' salads that's as spiritless as last year's crop o' hay.

Since Lizzie goes to cookin' school she don't cook like her ma,
She has to have a apron on—the best you ever saw,
It's frilled an' puckered here and there, an'
trimmed around with lace;
I reckon Lizzie'll be all right when she has struck the pace.
But, somehow, well, it seems to me I can't just get the hang
Of, when I'm eatin' custard pie, to call it a
"merrang."

Since Lizzie goes to cookin' school, we don't get no more mush,
An' when I say I'd like some greens, she says,
"Now, pa, you hush!"
She holds a fool the'mometer on everything
she cooks,
An' scolds because the cook stove won't run
'cordin' to the books.
But, somehow, well, the things don't seem good after they are carved,
Since Lizzie goes to cookin' school—why, say,
I'm blamed near starved.

Diamonds in It.

We heard Russell Conwell tell this charming story, which he obtained from an Arabian guide:

There lived on the banks of the Indus an ancient Persian by the name of El Hafed. From his beautiful and comfortable cottage on the hillside he could look down upon the gleaming river and out over the glorious sea. He was a man of wealth. His fields and orchards yielded plentifully and he had money at interes'. A beautiful wife and lovely children shared with him the joy of a happy home.

One day, there came to the cottage a Persian priest. That priest sat down with El Hafed before the blazing fire on the hearth and told him how diamonds were made. "If you had a diamond," said the old priest, "as big as your thumb, you could purchase many farms like this, and if you had a bushel, you could own the whole country." That moment El Hafed became poor. All his possessions seemed to lose their value, as the feeling of discontent filled his soul. He said: "I must have a mine of diamonds. What is the use of spending one's life in this way in this narrow sphere? I want a mine, and shall have it!"

That night he could not sleep. Early the next morning he went to the priest and asked where he could find those diamonds. "If you want diamonds," said the priest, "go and get them." "Won't you please tell me where I can find them?" said El Hafed. "Well, if you go and find high mountains, with a deep river running between them, over white sand, in this white sand you will find diamonds."

The enthusiastic, restless and dissatisfied farmer sold his farm, took the money, and went off in search of diamonds. He began down through Egypt and Palestine. Years passed while he was pursuing his useless search. At last he went over through Europe, and, one day, broken-hearted, in rags, a hungry pauper, stung with humiliation and crushed by his bitter disappointment, he stood on the shore of the Bay of Barcelona. He looked at the big waves as they came rolling in, and listened to the whisper that invited him to peace, and, in the moment of despair, threw himself in and sank, never to rise again.

The man who purchased El Hafed's farm led his camel out one day to the stream in the garden to drink. While the camel buried his nose in the water, the man noticed a white flash of glittering, glistening, sparkling something at his feet. Out of curiosity, he reached down and picked up a black stone with a strange eye of light in it, which seemed to reflect all the colors of the rainbow. He took the curiosity to the house and laid it on the mantel, and soon forgot all about it.

One day this same old priest came to visit El Hafed's successor. He noticed a flash of light from the mantel, and sprang toward it in amazement, and exclaimed: "Here is a diamond! Has El Hafed returned?" "Oh, no, that is not a diamond. It is a stone we found out in the garden." "But I tell you that is a diamond," and the two men went out in the garden and stirred up the white sand and there came up in their hands beautiful diamonds, more valuable than the first.

This is historically true. It was the discovery of the wonderful mines of Golconda and the founding of the line of the great moguls. The guide swung his cap and said, "Had El Hafed remained at home and dug in his own garden, he would have been the wealthiest man of his time and the most honored."—Union Gospel News.

A Poet's Memory.

Writing in the Youth's Companion of William Cullen Bryant as an editor, Hon. John Bigelow says:

Mr. Bryant's exceptionally abstemious habits no doubt accounted largely for the fact that he was always ready for his work. He was not a man of moods; he never said to himself or to any one else, "I do not feel like work to-day." He was always ready, and ready to do his best, which could never be said of any man who made habitual use of stimulants or drugs.

He had a marvelous memory. I am not sure that it was excelled by Gladstone's; possibly it was by Macaulay's. On one occasion I saw it announced in the morning paper that a new poem of Mr. Bryant's had just appeared in Graham's Magazine. As the magazine had not yet reached the office, I proposed to send to the editor for a copy. He said, "I will give you a copy," and turned to his desk to write it down. I complimented him upon his memory, and he said, "I have no doubt that, with a little time for reflection, I could write out a copy of every poem I have ever printed." He had then published four-fifths of all the poetry he ever published.

The Very Man.

A Glasgow gentleman recently recommended to the notice of a city merchant a young fellow who was looking for a clerkship. Some few days later they met again, and the gentleman asked if the selection had proved a wise one.

"Not at all," replied the merchant.

"Dear me," said the other. "I thought he would have suited you down to the ground—so full of go."

"Yes," responded the merchant, "he was too full of go. Why he's clean gone, and a thousand pounds of my money, too."

"You don't say so! Why, I thought he was exactly the fellow you were looking for."

"So he is," was the emphatic reply—"so he is."—London Answers.

A Wasted Lesson.

At the conclusion of a school treat last summer an excellent teacher, desirous of administering a trifling moral lesson, inquired of the boys if they had enjoyed the repast.

They all replied, "Yes, sir."

"Then," asked the teacher, "if you had slipped into my garden and picked these strawberries without my leave, would they have tasted as good as now?"

Every small boy in that stained and sticky company shrieked, "No, sir!"

"Why not?"

"'Cause," said little Thomas, with the cheerfulness of conscious virtue, "then we shouldn't have had cream and sugar with 'em."

A witty bishop, getting out at a railway station which had a large brewery abutting, noticed the flag at half-mast, and inquired the reason.

"The brewer's grandmother is dead, sir," said the station-master, "and we all go into mourning as a compliment to the brewer."

"Ah, yes, sighed the bishop, "so I see; even the barrels are in tiers."

"There's one fact," remarked the Sweet Thing, "I can't understand about discovering these new stars." "What's that?" asked the professor. "How they manage to find out their names." — Philadelphia Times.

A Park of Redwoods.

The state of California has recently qought a tract of redwood forest which will be preserved as a public park in order that the greed or enterprise of the lumbermen may not cause this most wonderful of all trees to go the way of the almost vanished buffalo. The Humboldt (Cal.) Daily Standard says:

"A recent statement of Professor Sargent sums up what has been done as follows:

"'The action of the California Legislature, which is largely due to the efforts of the Sempervirens Society, a body of Californians organized specially to accomplish the preservation of some part of the redwood forest, is a matter of national rejoicing. The redwood tree (Sequoia sempervirens) is one of the wonders of the world. Its first cousin, the so-called Big Tree of the western slopes of the Sierra Nevada, surpasses it in girth of stem, but no other tree in the world attains a larger size and no North American tree grows so tall.'

"The redwood forest extends, or once extended, before it was attacked by the lumberman, from the northern borders of California southward to Monterey county in a belt facing the ocean and rarely more than 30 miles wide, for the redwood has only flourished, in post-glacial times, within the influence of the cold fogs which, sweeping in from the Pacific ocean, are arrested by the range of mountains which follows the California coast. Fifty years ago this belt of redwood contained more merchantable timber than any other forest of a similar area which has been known to the human race. Trees 10, 12 or 15 feet in diameter were abundant, and individuals from 20 to 25 feet in diameter were not rare. Only some of the gum-trees of Australia approach or surpass it in height. Indeed, the extreme height which this tree attains has never been satisfactorily determined. A few years ago Mr. John Muir, the well known California naturalist, Gen. Henry L. Abbott, one of the engineer corps of the army, and Prof. Sargent, found a tree, which had recently been cut on one of the streams which flow into Humboldt bay, that had a total length of 340 feet. In Prof. Sargent's opinion this special individual is probably the tallest North American tree of which there is any authentic measurement, the tallest sequoia of the Sierras hardly surpassing the height of 320 feet. This tree, moreover, was hardly more than a sapling, with a trunk but six feet in diameter, or little more than a quarter of the size which redwood trunks sometimes attain.

"'The redwood tree is interesting for its size,' says Prof. Sargent, but it is more interesting as the sole representative, with the allied species of the Sierras, of a race of giant trees which before the glacial period were widely spread over the northern hemisphere. The forest of redwood, too, is probably the most beautiful coniferous forest in the world, with mighty trunks covered with bright red bark lifting aloft broad crowns of dark green delicate foliage, while the ground beneath the trees is covered with masses of ferns, mosses and many charming flowering shrubs and herbs."

Contempt of Court.

An English judge whose knowledge of law was not great was one day holding court in a northern town. An attorney was endeavoring to explain to his lordship some point of law which the latter had great difficulty in understanding. Losing patience at last, the lawyer sat down with a remark not wholly complimentary to the court. "Do you wish to show contempt of court?" asked the judge, with some asperity. "No, my lord," was the reply, "I am doing my best to conceal it."

The Haughty Beggar.

The professional beggar, says the Youth's Companion, who has been making his appearance in American cities as a self-constituted ornament to the close of the century, is a contribution from Europe, where he has long flourished in splendor or poverty according to the profits of the season.

He is a man of resources who rises quickly to an occasion, as is evidenced in the story of a tramp who was called in from the street to decide a dispute, and was asked if he could eat thirty quails in thirty days. "Quails!" said the tramp, contemptuously. "Make it turkeys!"

Another tale of beggary relates to a French mendicant who stopped a gentleman on the streets of Paris, and asked for alms. When he was curtly refused, he turned away with an air of desperation, and exclaimed bitterly:

"Then I am driven to it!"

Fearing that he meant self-destruction, the gentleman called him back, gave him a coin and asked him what he meant by the threat.

"Sir," said the beggar, "I meant that if you did not give me money I should be driven to work."

Miss Bates, who has written and published an interesting book on travels in Spain, relates that the beggars of that country are amusingly proud, and are exceedingly polite so long as nothing is said or done to wound their pride. She tells a story of a friend, a German woman, who requested a strong man who had importuned her for charity to carry her bag up the stairs. The strong man started back at this unusual request, drew himself up haughtily, frowned and replied:

"Madam, I am a beggar, not a laborer."

"How many zones have we, Willie?" asked the teacher of a pupil in the junior class.

"Four," was the reply.

"Well, then, name the four," said the teacher.

"The frigerated, the horrid, the temperance and the intemperance," answered the little fellow.

A Better Way.

A coal cart was delivering an order in Clinton place the other day, and the horse made two or three efforts to back the heavily loaded cart to the spot desired, and then became obstinate. The driver began to beat the animal, and this quickly collected a crowd. He was a big fellow, with a fierce look in his eye, and the onlookers were chary about interfering, knowing what would follow. "I pity the horse, but I don't want to get into a row," remarked one.

"I am satisfied that I can do him up with the gloves on, but he wouldn't fight that way," added a second.

"I'm not in the least afraid to tackle him," put in a young man with a long neck, "but about the time I got him down, along would come a policeman and arrest us both."

The driver was beating the horse, and nothing was being done about it, when a little girl about eight years old approached and said:

"Please, mister."

"Well, what yer want?"

"If you'll only stop, I'll get all the children around here, and we'll carry every bit of that coal to the manhole, and let you rest while we're doing it."

The man stood up and looked around in a defiant way; but meeting with nothing but pleasant looks he began to give in, and after a moment he smiled and said:

"Mebbe he didn't deserve it, but I'm out of sorts to-day. There goes the whip, and perhaps a lift on the wheels will help him."

The crowd swarmed around the cart, a hundred hands helped to push, and the old horse had the cart to the spot with one effort.—Universalist Leader.

Should a Church Pay its Debts?

In a recent trial of a case in court involving a dispute between a preacher and a church over non-payment of salary, the attorney for the plaintiff made the following remarks relative to the financial obligations of churches:

"If any debt ought to be paid, it is one contracted for the health of souls—for pious ministrations and holy services. If any class of debtors ought to pay as matter of moral as well as legal duty, the good people of a Christian church are that class. No church can have any higher obligation resting upon it than that of being just. The study of justice for more than forty years has impressed me with the supreme importance of this grand and noble virtue. Some of the virtues are in the nature of moral luxuries, but this is an absolute necessity of social life. It is the hog and hominy, the bacon and beans, of morality public and private. It is the exact virtue, being mathematical in its nature. Mercy, pity, charity, gratitude, generosity, magnanimity, etc., are the liberal virtues. They flourish partly on voluntary concessions made by the exact virtue, but they have no right to extort from it any unwilling concession. They can only supplicate or persuade. A man cannot give in charity or from pity, hospitality or magnanimity the smallest part of what is necessary to enable him to satisfy the demands of justice. It is ignoble to indulge any of the liberal virtues by leaving undischarged any of these imperative demands against us. On the credit side of justice we can make any sacrifice of it that we will, but on the debit side we can make none whatever. I may burn as an offering my own bull or lamb, but not that which rightfully belongs to another owner. There is nothing more exalted than a strict duty and its performance. What we freely give cannot be better bestowed than what we pay in discharge of a perfect obligation. The law grants exemptions of property to families, but none to private corporations or collective bodies, lay or ecclesiastical. These must pay their debts if they can. All their property legal and equitable is subject. We think a court may well constrain this church to do justice. In contemplation of law, justice is not only one of the cardinal virtues, it is the pontifical virtue. Certainly it is an energetic measure to sell the church to pay the preacher, nor would it be allowable to do so if other means of satisfying the debt were within reach. But the plain implication from the facts alleged is that the church has no assets other than this property, and on looking into the answer we find that the answer makes no suggestion of any other assets."

Being a Boy.

Margaret Deland, says the (Chicago) Standard, once accosted a small boy who was sitting barefoot with feet in a dusty gutter and his shaggy, good-natured dog at his side.

"Well, you look happy, my boy. Are you having a good time sitting there in the sun?"

"I dunno if I am," replied the urchin in a blunt, uninterested way.

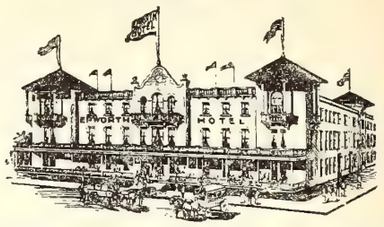
"Your dog looks happy," persisted the lady in a cheerful tone. "He likes the sunshine, I know. Perhaps dogs are happier than boys?" she added, inquiringly.

"You bet your life they are," was the ready response.

"How is that?" said Mrs. Deland.

"Why, it's just this way," replied the boy. "Dogs, they can eat when they want to and sleep when they want to and do whatever they please; there's nobody to row at 'em, and they hain't anything they've got to do, and they ain't got to run no errants nor nothin.' That's just how it is with dogs."

Mrs. Deland immediately imagined that the boy had a cross, scolding mother, who probably at that instant, while the boy and dog were sunning themselves, was waiting for a yeast cake or a loaf of bread.



"Surely dogs do have a pretty happy time," she said. "I suppose you would like to be a dog and have all these good times?"

"Y—e—s," he drawled out; "y—e—s, but then they ain't boys."

"I haven't much use for Blithersley," said the proud papa. "Why?" asked the proud mamma. "I listened to him for an hour to-day while he told me about what his baby had said, or tried to say, and just as I was about to tell him about ours he left me, saying he had to catch a train." —Baltimore American.

Advance Society Letters.

Yes, sir, as I was saying, Pete had disappeared from her home, and her mother was out, late at night, hunting her everywhere. But we must wait till next week to hear more of the story. This week we have more letters and guesses to print. Gertrude Minnick, Davenport, Wash.; "I would like to join the Av. S. again. I like Lola Cox's plan. I wish some members would write to me. I am 12." (Remember, children, I want your opinion on that plan, namely, if, at the end of "Pete," you would like to write short stories, essays, etc., for this page.) Here is a letter from Bismarck, Ill, but there is no name signed to it; we will say it is by Bobby Black, and if this guess is wrong, let the real author step forth; "I have found out the Av. S. rules, and I began to keep them immediately. I think the tramp was Pete's father. My favorites—Uncle Tom's Cabin, Black Beauty, Evangeline. I am 13." Olive Kenyon, Des Moines; "Nap is Pete's father; he is going to turn out all right at the end." Dora Blunds, Winterrowd, Ill.; "Nap is Pete's mother's old lover. My sister Bessie guesses that he is a man who wants to marry Pete's mother." Maye Heizer, Chilo, O.; "We all know how old you are and when your birthday is; now we should like to see your picture. Some people are never satisfied, are they? I, like some others, think it a shame that 'Pete' must end each week right where it is so interesting. I read the letters from the Av. S. members, also your jolly remarks—that is what I like, somebody that is so droll." Another letter with no name signed—we will say it was written by Sally Tuck, Ospur, Ill.; "I think Nap Mrs. Morris' husband. I have read What Tommy Did, Our Gold Mine, Rollo on the Rhine. I would like for you to take me on the honor list." (Has anybody besides Sally read one of the Rollo books? I think this is the first mention of one; they used to be great favorites of mine.) Florence Leavitt, Frankfort, S. D.; "I read a great deal in the Bible besides what I need for the Av. S. I started to read the Bible through, New Year's day; am in Proverbs now. My sister Olive is reading the Bible through also. She is ahead of me; she started first. My sister, brother and I hang the sheets of paper up on the wall that we have to write our Av. S. accounts on, so we can see them."

Edna Bernice Huston, Carthage, Ill.; "Nap is Mrs. Morris' brother. I am reading Uncle Tom's Cabin." Mabel Alvard, Zurich, Kas.; "I wish to join the Av. S. I am 12. I have read several books lately; I like Wide Wide World the best. I never read novels." (I wish every member would read Wide Wide World; no better book for young people.) Flossie Hunt, Le Roy, Ill.; "I kept the rules one whole quarter, but we have been moving and I have not much time; but I am going to start over again." (I am glad; and your excuse is a good one. Moving will excuse almost anything except suicide.) Melvin Ledden, Ospur, Ill.; "I have found a new member." (Good! Hold to him!) "He is 13—Turney Brown, of Ospur. I am glad I joined the Av. S., for it does much good. Must I give the authors of all quotations?" (Every one.) Francesca B. Taylor, Bay City, Tex.; "I have read Pete, Red Box Clew, and the story about Abimelech. My guess: Nap is Pete's father. My favorite books are too many to name, but my favorite authors—Dickens, Alcott, Lyall, Hawthorne, Irving, Eugene Sue and, oh, yes! Lew Wallace. Of course by my writing you will know I want to join the Av. S. I begin to-day. Mrs. Dever and Gerald, I feel like we are old friends. Jessie Keedy and Mildred Brooks, I am like you; I rarely get a letter. 'Eliz' Vilpey, I had the scarlet fever not long ago and I can sympathize with you. I have read 182 books; how many of you can come up to that? Now after all this chatter, I remain your true friend." Burleigh Cash, Pennville, Ind.; "I cannot guess who Nap is yet. I wish 'Pete' could run for a whole year longer. I am glad I joined the Av. S. when I did. I don't think any one regrets it, either. I wish more would come in. Bro. Canfield of Indianapolis held us a good protracted meeting. I like to hear and read the letters of others." Florence Hollandsworth, Newell, Ill.; "What are the Av. S. rules?" (5. pp. history, 30 lines poetry, one quotation every week; Bible verse a day; keep account in note book—send report at end of each 12 wks.) "I think the tramp was Pete's father. I believe that he knew, and was a relative of, Mrs. Morris. Pete will get the money of Edgar Brown. I think Pete is more interesting than any of the others. I was afraid Madge never would get acquainted with Edgar." Nellie Speece, Denson, Mo.; "I want to join the Av. S. I am 10; have not decided who Nap is; I think Edgar paid him to go away." Mrs. Geo. Paddock, Antioch, Ill.; "Nap is Pete's father." Mrs. Geo. W. Nichols, Chadron, Neb.; "My little daughter, Pearl, sends her guess; she thinks Nap will turn out to be Pete's father." (Well, there's one thing certain; if Nap DOES turn out to be Pete's father, I am out a good many copies of "Shem"!) Ethel Wheat, Aurora, Mo., sends all her quotations in her report; I like the one by Carlyle very much: "He that has found his work need ask no other blessedness." Mrs. Mattie Dever, Hume, Ill.; "My report should have been sent sooner, but I forgot to report; time slips by, as we are so busy." (Nothing like being busy to make time slippery!) "Gerald and I gave up Paradise Lost three weeks ago." (Very brave to ever undertake it!) "Gerald is becoming a little missionary. He gives at least $1.00 at March offering, Easter, Children's Day, Rally Day. We raised $15 for March offering, thus: Bro. J. G. McNutt called for dollar volunteers, then for 50 cent, then for 25 cent, and in less than ten minutes we went $5 above our apportionment. Heretofore, after the sermon, be it ever so good, the baskets would be passed, and the result would be about $3." (By the way, I was examining a new book by Bro. Cal Ogburn, entitled "One Hundred Illustrated Sermons," and found therein a poem by Mrs. Dever.)

NEW HONOR LIST; Ethel Wheat; Chas. R. Hancock (4th quarter), Moselle, Mo.; Burleigh Cash (11th qr.); Melvin Ledden (5th qr.); Florence Leavitt (5th qr.); Olive Leavitt (4th qr.); Madge Masters (10th qr.), Ozark, Ark.; Mrs. F. A. Potts, Chattanooga; Jessie Keedy. (I am very sorry to omit some who sent names for the List; they did not state amount read; or failed to name books read—and they cannot be announced. If they will write at once, making their report properly, they shall be put upon our List. Some write that they have forgotten just how much they read; in that case, they failed to keep one rule, namely, to record what they did in a note book, and record it regularly; then, if you forget, go and look in your book. It is just as much a rule to keep a regular account in your note-book as it is to read your history. Very sorry to omit a great many letters; but every one will be printed yet—even the guesses on Pete. Next week we go on with the story, bu keep an eye out for your letter and you will one day find it on our page.

They were discussing in one of the committee-rooms at Washington the railway postal cars, which cost three thousand dollars each to build and two thousand dollars a year to maintain.

"The situation," said one of the Congressmen, "reminds me of the story of the pompous but somewhat insignificant lawyer who, in conversation with a judge, remarked: 'It costs me six thousand dollars a year to live.'

"The judge looked him over critically, leaned back in his chair and said:

" 'Bill, if I were you I wouldn't pay it! It ain't worth it.' "

Fellow-Workers With God.*

TEXT: For we are God's fellow-workers: ye are God's husbandry, God's building.—1 Cor. 3:9.

The apostle would lead the Corinthians from foolish strife about preachers and teachers to the recognition of God as the great Architect, the chief Husbandman. Therefore he calls himself and the other preachers, ministers, servants, fellow-workers with God, and the believers he declares are God's tilled land, not theirs.

DIVINE FELLOWSHIP.

And so we have the double fact—God works upon us, and God works with us. Let us not mistake; we become fellow-workers with God, not by assuming the initiative, and asking God to join us, but by asking God what He will have us do, and thus joining Him. Many an earnest prayer goes up for the divine blessing on our work, when the prayer should be for the privilege of fellowship in God's work. Read the scriptures cited, recall the work of the apostles and the early Christians, their zeal, their courage, their endurance, their steadfastness, their marvellous achievements, and you will be struck with the power of God manifest in their activities. The same glorious feature marks every era of the church when she has proved faithful. Your own experience is a witness, for have you not toiled both without and with God? Dull and drear and unprofitable are the days when we launch forth for ourselves; but days of victory, days of delight, are the days of fellowship with God through the Spirit. Let us rejoice that this is a privilege all may enjoy; it is not for a chosen few: it did not die with Paul and Apollos.

POWER OF FELLOWSHIP.

Fellowship with God gives composure and rest of soul. What need to fret and fume? "If God be for us, who can be against us?" O you doubters and murmurers, be still! The work is not yours, but God's, and He is able to perfect it. God carried it on before ever you were born, and it will continue more gloriously than ever after your death.

"Be quiet: why this anxious heed
About thy tangled ways?
God knows them all; He giveth speed,
And He allows delays."

What an encouragement it is to the overburdened soul to stop and think for a moment that God is his partner! Ease and encouragement—both are in this blessed fact. Our hearts are well-nigh stout enough to work on in the dark, denied the pleasure of seeing any immediate fruits of our toil. And then there is here the sweet assurance of ultimate victory, if we think of the work as a warfare; of perfection, if we think of it as a work of art. God will undertake nothing that will not be carried to completion; He will plant no seed that will not ripen, project no plan that will not mature, give no promise that will not be fulfilled. Therefore let us go forward, with all energy! And now what of pride? If God is our Helper, then how much of the product is ours, how much His? The consciousness of this fellowship ought to make and keep us humble.

A PARTNERSHIP MAINTAINED.

God does not thrust Himself upon us against our wills. If we refuse or reject Him, then the purpose he would have wrought through us will not be defeated; it will be wrought through others, through them who are willing and obedient. Hence it is of the highest importance that we maintain our fellowship with Him. It is something we must vehemently desire. Is it not good and necessary? Dare we attempt to serve without it? Are we not incarnate weakness? And now, if we sincerely desire it, we will seek it. The desire will inspire prayer, and the searching study of the revealed Word, that we may know where and how God works. We will seek to trace His way in human history, and then walk in it; to know His purpose for our own age, and then achieve it. But we must have the right motive, namely, the glory of God. It will not do to seek the divine fellowship, in order that we may succeed; or that we may do as well as others. It is hard to keep our motives pure, but God does not set us as lights in the world to be gazed at and admired; rather to let our light shine, that men may see our good works and glorify Him.

We can generally determine whether God is with us or not, by the results of our effort. Study them; do they show the divine handiwork? Do they bear the imprint of the Master? We cannot work without God. He must be our motive, our method, and our strength.

PRAYER.

To work with Thee, O God, is a privilege inestimable. For it we praise Thee and bless Thee. Help us to be true and faithful servants and co-workers of Thine; forbid that we should run into vagaries and follies, and so discredit Thee and Thy work. Rather declare unto us Thy purpose, and impart unto us Thy wisdom and power, that we may serve with acceptance, through Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Holy Spirit Given.*

For ten days after the ascension of Jesus, the eleven apostles waited in Jerusalem, as they had been bidden, for the promised coming of the Holy Spirit. Many others of Jesus' followers tarried with them, so that a company of a hundred and twenty met from day to day for prayer and conference, among whom were the mother of Jesus and other godly women from Galilee. Probably the upper room where the Passover had been eaten furnished them a meeting place. At one of these gatherings, Peter suggested that they choose from among themselves one of those who had been an intimate associate of the Master, who might be enrolled among the apostles, that their number might be complete. Prayerfully and reverently they followed his advice and Matthias was chosen to take the place from which Judas, the traitor, had fallen by his transgression. No hint is given that this action was disapproved of God, and we are of the opinion that the disciple thus chosen became one of the apostolic group.

The Feast of Pentecost was one of the three great annual days made sacred by the Jewish law. It was set for the fiftieth day after the Sabbath of the Passover week, and thus always occurred on the first day of the week. It celebrated the completion of the grain harvest and loaves of the new grain were baked and waved before the Lord in the sanctuary. It was also by tradition said to commemorate the giving of the law on Sinai. Both these types were richly fulfilled in the occurrences of this first Christian Pentecost, when the completed work of redemption was signalized by the exhibition of three thousand redeemed souls, who had found salvation and life through Jesus Christ, and the New Law of Life was promulgated from Mount Zion and the word of the Lord proclaimed from Jerusalem.

The disciples were all with one accord in one place. Now is the blessing sure to come upon them. They have been waiting ten days for the Lord to fulfill his promise. But he meanwhile, has been waiting these same ten days for them to get ready to receive that promise. The preparation required was in them, not in him. They were not waiting till God was ready; he was waiting till they were ready. So soon as it could be truly said that they were all with one accord in one place, the spirit came. Oh that the church of God might understand the secret of receiving power. When united prayer and unbroken fellowship characterizes those who love the Lord, he honors them with his spiritual presence, and fills them with his divine power and grace.

Suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing, mighty wind and it filled all the house where they were sitting. They could not mistake the nature of the strange phenomenon. It was not a wind, for the air was motionless. Nor did the sound steal in at the doors and windows like noises from the street. The noise of a great tempest seemed to fall upon them from above, until the room was filled with it, as though a great flood of waters had swept in upon them and buried them beneath its waves. Yet was there no perceptible motion to the atmosphere, nor visible cause for the mighty volume of sound. In a moment they saw what looked like tongues of fire, hovering above them and "parting asunder," as the Revised Version says, or "distributing themselves," as in the margin, finding a resting place upon their heads. This was a striking symbol of the office the Holy Spirit had come to perform for the apostolic witnesses, who were to be endued with power to testify for Christ. We believe this special gift to have been confined to the apostles in the light of the entire narrative. But it was the prelude to a larger spiritual manifestation of God to his people, such as had been long since prophesied by Joel and was now confirmed by Peter in the sermon which followed. Every child of God was to receive the Spirit of truth and grace, and even the humblest servant and handmaiden were to be chosen instruments for the glorifying of God and the saving of men.

They were conscious of a strange, overpowering influence within them, which they could neither fully comprehend, nor at all resist. The evangelist Luke, who tells us the story, declares it to be the filling with the Holy Spirit, while Peter calls it the baptism of the Holy Spirit. It was the realization of the promise Jesus had made to them, of the coming of the Holy Spirit to abide with them and to endue them with power for their ministry. He also had called it a baptism. So entirely were they subjected to the influences of this divine visitor that their spirits were completely submerged and they could properly be said to be baptized, or immersed, in the Spirit. A like phenomenon, save the tongues of fire, occurred at the house of Cornelius and Peter calls that too, the baptism of the Holy Spirit. It is doubtful if exactly the same baptism was vouchsafed to any others, although the Holy Spirit himself becomes an abiding guest in every heart that receives Jesus Christ as Lord.

They began to speak with various tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance. What they said, we do not know. We are told only, in the language of the amazed multitude, that they "spoke the wonderful works of God." It was doubtless such a rapturous outpouring of praise in the mingled dialects of the vast throngs that crowded the city, as filled them with wonder and drew them together to hear what such a marvelous event might signify. That Galileans, whose lack of culture was proverbial, should thus express the praise of God in the languages of the whole civilized world, was a wondrous miracle. But, in the sermon which follows, we take it that Peter used the common language of that day and country, the Aramæan, or a mixed form of Hebrew, which would be familiar to Jews from every quarter. But the sound of their various provincial dialects, coming from the lips of these unlettered Galileans, could but make a deep impression upon the minds of the people. Did it suggest to them that God, who had once thwarted the unholy purposes of a sinful race by confusing their languages, so that they could not understand one another, and were therefore scattered over the face of the earth, was now about to blend into one all the discordant accents of men, that they might be drawn into a closer and sweeter fellowship than humanity had ever known? Such, at least, was the result of the coming of the Holy Spirit, as he has wrought his work in the hearts of men since that Pentecostal day. Nor will his mission cease till a ransomed race makes the universe vocal with praise to him that redeemed them with his blood out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation, making them kings and priests unto God.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it Is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines, and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking, or after eating onions or other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion; it whitens the teeth; and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics, in tablet form, or rather in the form of large, pleasant-tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood; and the beauty of it is that no harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician, in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

TOPIC FOR MAY 26.

Missions: Promises and Prophecies.

(Ps. 2.)

The subject of missions is now receiving a new overhauling, in view of events in China, and of the widespread criticism of the missionaries there. Happily our own missionaries are not involved in this matter. But Mark Twain's very one sided and evident special pleading in the North American Review has gone into many hands, and has had its effect.

Yet, in spite of this condition of affairs, it is reported that the revenues of some of the older and larger societies have increased remarkably in the past few months. Many attribute this to these very causes that one would think might cut down revenues. This only illustrates the old, old principle that Christianity advances by opposition. There is nothing that so sends our gospel along as to oppose it. The blood of martyrs is the seed of the church.

So, in spite of all hindrances, Christianity is certain to develop. "Ask of me," comes the old word from out of a very distant past, "Ask of me and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance." And the old question "Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing?" is certainly a fit one for this twentieth century. Does any one suppose that the progress of the gospel is checked for a moment by criticisms, sneers, jibes, or persecutions?

Think then of the persecutions in Madagascar in 1852. Native Christians were thrown over precipices, speared, put to the sword, burned at the stake; two thousand suffered martyrdom in a year. Yet, out of that fierce trial came an increasing Christian church, and to-day the whole island is Christian, and all the Malagasy are ready to die for their faith.

A notable incident took place in this city last Sunday. The Midway at the Pan-American Exposition is closed on the Lord's day, and the Hawaiians—natives—in their village, held the only religious services on the grounds. Forty or fifty of these dusky Christians met in the entrance to their village, and with singing and prayer remembered the God and Father of us all. There was an object lesson for us of the results of foreign missions! But a generation or two ago these Sandwich Islanders were savage: to-day we have heard the answer to Christian prayers, and God has given us these heathen for an inheritance.

Neither need we fear for the future. God's arm is not shortened, nor his power slackened. We shall still inherit the promises. We shall still see the results of our labors. God will cause the work of missions to prosper, and the uttermost parts of the earth shall be the possession of his kingdom.

So all our best shall be for Christ,
All we most dearly prize
Shall be upon his altar laid,
A willing sacrifice.
So should our souls, to Jesus

And living in his light,
Reflect some rays of heavenly love
To make this earth more bright.

DOUGLASS.

On Tuesday, April 30, 1901, passed from earth to heaven Corinne Douglass, the only daughter of Prof A. E. Douglass and wife, at the age of 13. Her last illness was brief, though for some time her health was slowly failing, as her friends now realize. Corinne was a sweet girl, whose gentle spirit and unselfish conduct endeared her to all who knew her. She stood at the head of her class in the Humboldt school in this city, from which she would have graduated in a few weeks. She has passed into the high school of the Great Teacher, where every lesson is made light through perfect love. Corinne obeyed the gospel on January 18, 1900, and was a devoted member of the church, Sunday-school and Junior C. E society, from the latter of which she had passed into the intermediate society but a short time before her death. She was a universal favorite and her beautiful face, lovely with the light of a true Christian spirit, is sadly missed by us all. She leaves devoted parents and a little brother, besides a host of other relatives and friends, to mourn her departure. She lies buried beneath the flowers that loving hands have placed upon her grave, but the beauty and fragrance they exhale cannot compare with the loveliness of her life and the sweetness of her memory.

DOWNING.

Helen, the little eight-year-old daughter of Dr. and Mrs W. L. Downing, departed this life the morning of May 2. The Bible-school and Mission Band have lost a most faithful and earnest little member. She was carried to the church Sunday, April 28, and her last loving service for the Master was performed when she dropped her eight pennies into the birthday box. She suffered for six months with that dread disease, diabetes, but through it all was patient, loving and thoughtful for others. Funeral services were held at the house Friday, May 3, conducted by the writer. Bro. and Sister Downing have the sympathy of a host of friends, and their consolation in this dark hour is, "God doeth all things well." R. M. DUNGAN.

LUCK.

Charles Luck was born at Hudson, New York, in 1825, and died at Cleveland, Ohio, Feb. 4, 1901. Services were held at Franklin Circle Church. At nineteen he joined the U. S. navy and served in the Mexican and Civil Wars. In 1851 he was married to Mary Agart, who died in 1886. Three children were born of this union. In 1855 he removed to Cleveland, and in 1893 to Painesville, Ohio, where during his entire residence he faithfully served the church as elder. In 1888 he was married to Ellen Turner, of Cleveland, who lives to mourn the loss of one whose tender care and loving sympathy made their home one of earth's happiest. He was a man of sterling character and spotless life, a lifelong follower of the Master. His counsels were wise and helpful, his loyalty to the church unbounded, and a host of friends mourn his loss. S. H. BARTLETT.

WILKES.

After several weeks of the most patient suffering on his part, we are called upon to chronicle the departure from this life, and the joyous entrance into rest, of our beloved Lanceford Bramblet Wilkes. And truly we may say, "There is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel." Bro. Wilkes was too well and favorably known to our great brotherhood at large, as a teacher and preacher of power, and as an earnest and able defender of the Faith, by means of his own published works, and his numerous contributions to our different papers, extending through a period of nearly half a century, for me to make any detailed reference to his work here. Suffice it to say that among the pulpits he occupied may be mentioned that of Hannibal, Mo., Springfield, Ill., Lexington, Ky., Columbia, Mo., and Stockton, Cal. In the early years of his ministry he was connected with the "Palmyra Female Seminary," and later was president of "Christian College." In all probability, among the published products of his pen, the one which gained for him the widest distinction is the "Louisville Debate," a discussion of the baptismal question with Rev. Jacob Ditzler, published in 1871, since which time it has been referred to as a classic on that subject. Bro. Wilkes was a man of strong mental grasp, and decided convictions, which he maintained to the last. Only a few weeks prior to his death, he prepared and read to the Ministerial Union of this city a paper on "Agnostic Evolution," greatly to the delight of all who heard it. The Santa Cruz meeting of 1899, at which he was present, was his last meeting with any number of his preaching brethren, and it was refreshing indeed to observe at that meeting how the "grand old man" grew young again, warming his heart in the memories of other days, and how eloquent he grew while discoursing upon "What think ye of Christ, whose son is He?" But he has gone. God's finger touched him, and he sleeps. Seventy-seven years, one month and six days were the days of his earthly pilgrimage. When the end came, it was without a struggle—a calm and cloudless sunset. He closed his eyes gently, like one going to sleep, and as peacefully passed in to the Great Beyond. At his funeral the different preachers of the city participated, and each seemed vying with the others in paying him fr endly tribute. He leaves two sons to mourn his departure, John and Edmund, who is emulating his father's example as a preacher of the Gospel. While we shall greatly miss his kindly, beaming countenance, and his wise and timely counsel, we would not wish him to assume again the burdens that our heavenly Father has asked him to lay down. While we sorrow in his absence, we "sorrow not, even as others which have no hope," for we are persuaded that "if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." Wherefore we "comfort one another with these words." T. A. BOYER.

Stockton, Cal., May 6, 1901.

WOLLARD.

Thomas M. Wollard was born October 5, 1867, in Doniphan county, Kansas. He died April 13, 1901, near Moran, Kan. As a superintendent of the Sunday-school and a deacon of the church, he won the respect and love of all, by his earnest, conscientious Christian work. Our loss is great, but it is his gain, for it was truly with him as he said in his delirium, "Death comes and then the crown." His wife and little son, mother, sisters and brothers have the sympathy of all who knew him. MRS. J. H. COFFMAN.

A Chance to Make Money.

I have been selling Perfumes for the past six months. I make them myself at home and sell to friends and neighbors. Have made $710. Everyone buys a bottle. For 50c worth of material, I make Perfume that would cost $2.00 in drug stores.

I first made it for my own use only, but the curiosity of friends as to where I procured such exquisite odors prompted me to sell it. I clear from $25.00 to $35.00 per week. I do not canvass, people come and send to me for the perfumes. Any intelligent person can do as well as I do. For 42c in stamps I will send you the formula for making all kinds of perfumes and a sample bottle prepaid. I will also help you get started in the business.

A Summer School of Stenography.

Time was when the great majority of the students in the high schools, academies, colleges and universities of this country spent the summer months in idleness, devoting the long vacation entirely to having a good time. This was largely due to the mistaken belief that the student could do better work for nine months of the year by permitting his brain to be entirely idle for three months.

But all this has largely changed. Our schools still close during the hot months, as is proper, but the average student does not waste these months by any means. He knows now that he can do better work and more work during the autumn and winter if he keeps his mental powers in good running order through the summer, and so, while he takes a rest, and lets up on the hard grind and routine of regular school work he generally takes up, during the summer, the study of some special branch or branches, or lays out a course of reading to occupy a part of his time during June, July and August.

In consequence of this change in policy, a great many "summer schools" have been established in various parts of the country. Here prominent specialists in art, science, literature, mathematics or the classics meet classes or give lectures a few hours each day. We believe in these summer schools. We believe that the young man or woman who spends two or three hours each day during the summer in study will return to school in September better equipped for regular school work than the one who has done nothing but "rest" the entire summer. Therefore we have inaugurated our Summer School of Stenography.

This school will hold its sessions in various places—at the seashore, the lakeside, in the mountains, at the homes of the students, etc. The school has no special building of its own. The students may do their work where they please—under the shade of a tree, or swinging in a hammock, or sitting on a breezy piazza, or on board some steamer, bound on a cruise, just as they wish. Moreover, each student may fix his own hours of study and recitation to suit himself. He may choose the early morning hours, or the afternoon or the evening—it is all the same to us. As there are no special instructors (save inanimate text-books) nobody will make any objections.

Many of the summer schools of the country charge tuition fees that are prohibitive to a great many young people. We want all who desire to have the benefit of our school, and have therefore made the terms very low. Indeed, the entire cost for a complete course of three months in shorthand is only five dollars, and this amount is paid for books.

In short, our Summer School of Stenography is the Moran Series of Self-Instruction Books in Shorthand. The possessor of these books may, without leaving home, and without any other instruction than that given in the books, become an expert stenographer. It is not necessary to take a trip to some regular summer school, where tuition fees are considerable and board is high. All that the student need do is to send us five dollars for the seven books of the Moran Series, and then give an hour or two each day to study and practice. If possessed of fair natural ability and mental power, he will at the end of three months, be fully as capable as the average stenographer in the business world, and in six months may be an expert, able to report court proceedings, lectures, sermons, etc., etc. And all this for five dollars!!

We are glad to say that a number of young people have already enrolled themselves in our summer school. Orders for the set of books are coming in rapidly. The regular price of the set of books is Seven Dollars, but for now we are making a special offer of Five Dollars. Hundreds of young people should avail themselves of this opportunity to master stenography. If you are interested address

Book Notes.

From all directions we are receiving enthusiastic words of praise concerning The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century. The volume is being accorded an enthusiastic welcome on all sides. M. M. Davis writes: "It comes just at the right time. This movement is almost a hundred years old—time enough for it to have a well-defined history, and yet in time for the men who know this history from personal experience and who helped to make it, to write it for us. The book deserves a large sale." B. B. Tyler says: "This is a timely book, which should be in the hands of every preacher among us. Its plan is excellent." J. J. Haley says: "This book is destined to be popular. If one wants a fresh baptism in the sources of a great religious history through pure and vigorous literary channels, he must hasten to procure and carefully read The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century Our young people should not fail to read this book."

And these are only samples of what they are saying. We are proud to be the publishers of such a work as The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century, for it is a work that is destined to live and remain the standard and authentic history of the Disciples of Christ until, some decades hence, it will be time to publish a new history. This is a book that every active Disciple should have and must have, if he is to have anything like an intelligent conception and understanding of our great plea. It is so interesting a narrative that once begun the reader will not be content until he has finished it. It is a volume of 514 pages, bound in cloth. Price, postpaid, $2.

Another new volume which we offer to our patrons is The Evolution Theory, by Francis M. Bruner. The author opposes the theory of evolution, the proposition laid down at the beginning of the volume being the following: The evolution theory, as stated by M. Le Conte and applied by Dr. Lyman Abbott, is unsupported by the phenomena of the world so far as we are able to know it. The work is "an historical and scientific examination of the claims of evolutionists, as they are set forth in the evolution of Christianity." The book is the work of a ripe scholar and profound thinker, and was written for men capable of thinking. It is a volume of 227 pages, very handsomely printed and bound. The price is $1.25, postpaid.

Our offer of "Five Books for One Dollar" has brought us many orders. The five books in this set are: Christian Science Dissected, Sabbath or Lord's Day, Facts About China, The Liquor Traffic and The Lord's Supper. These are, without exception, excellent works. The authors are, respectively, "A. D. Sector," D. R. Dungan, W. Remfry Hunt, S. W. Crutcher and N. J. Aylsworth. Each volume is a concise, condensed treatise on the chosen topic. Singly the books sell for 25 cents each, but we will send the five to any address, postpaid, on receipt of only One Dollar.

"What Is Your Life?" by W. J. Russell, grows in popularity. This is small wonder, as it is a book of most decided worth. We have repeatedly declared that the book was worth $10,000 to any young man or woman who would read it and faithfully follow its advice, and not a single purchaser has denied the statement. Yet we sell the book for only One Dollar.

Special Catalogue No. 31 is yours for the asking. The expenditure of one cent for a postal card may save you several dollars in the price of books. Now is the time to secure a supply of literature for summer reading.

CHRIST must reign until he has put all enemies under his feet. His complete triumph waits on a converted, consecrated, united and aggressive Church. In planning for spiritual conquest we must estimate our elements of strength and of weakness. First and foremost as an essential condition of success the Church must see to it that Christ's cause is its cause, and that its triumph means the triumph of his kingdom. The Church was intended to be Christ's organized working force to realize his ideals. In so far as it has departed from this sublime mission, there must be repentance and reformation. This means a vast unloading of cherished dogmas, traditions, creeds, hierarchies, customs, worldly ambitions, unsanctified aims and methods. It means, also, the surrender of party names, party spirit, party platforms and partisan divisions in order to a closer union with Christ and among its own members. The Church cannot cope with the forces of evil loaded down with useless impedimenta and divided into warring factions. Nor can it stand the test of an age made critical by the growth of science and the diffusion of knowledge until its faith be purified from superstition and error. Reformation, unification, consecration, education, evangelization, edification—these are the great key-words of success in the Church of the twentieth century.

WHAT WE STAND FOR

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

The Reformation of The XIXth Century

A Series of Historical Sketches, dealing with the Rise and Progress of the Religious Movement inaugurated by Thomas and Alexander Campbell, from its Origin to the close of the Nineteenth Century.

Edited by J. H. Garrison

This great work, which has been eagerly awaited for some time, is now ready for delivery. It is truly a notable work—a splendid addition to the literature of the Disciples of Christ. It is the only complete and modern history of the current reformation, and therefore should at once find a place in the home of every earnest and zealous Disciple.

This history is divided into eight periods, as follows:

Introductory Period	Chas. Louis Loos.
Period of Organization	B. B. Tyler.
The Turbulent Period	W. T. Moore.
The Transition Period	T. W. Grafton.
Period of Revival of Home Missions	Benj. L. Smith.
Period of Foreign Missions	A. McLean.
Period of Woman's Work	Lois A. White.
Lessons from Our Past	J. H. Garrison.

Chas. Louis Loos was personally and intimately acquainted with the fathers of the reformation, and associated with them in their work. His statement of the origin of our movement, and of its early connection with the Baptists, is the most satisfactory which has yet been made. B. B. Tyler has for many years been an untiring student of the history of our movement. W. T. Moore was an active and prominent participant in the events of the period beginning with 1861. His sketch of Alexander Campbell is a masterpiece, and is alone worth the price of the book. T. W. Grafton, in his "Life of Alexander Campbell," and "Men of Yesterday" has shown his ability as an able historian. Benj. L. Smith, A. McLean and Miss White have been most conspicuously identified with the enterprises of which they write. The closing section, by J. H. Garrison, is the address delivered by him at the Jubilee Convention in Cincinnati, October, 1899.

"The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century" is a handsome volume of 514 pages, bound in cloth. It is an addition to that list of books which, whatever other books he may have, every earnest Disciple of Christ should possess. This history is not only a volume full of facts and information, but a story of absorbing interest.

THE SPIRITUAL SIDE OF OUR PLEA.

By A. B. JONES.

This new volume is a notable contribution to a better understanding of the spiritual significance and value of our Reformatory Movement. It accentuates a side of our plea which has been too much neglected by many. It deals, in a profound manner, characteristic of its author, with such questions as "The Letter and the Spirit," "The Real and the Formal," "Alexander Campbell on Remission of Sins," "The Word and the Spirit," and "Righteousness and Law." The views herein expressed are the result of long and mature deliberation by one of the clearest thinkers and writers in our ranks.

Alexander Campbell's Theology

By W. E. GARRISON. This book is a scientific statement according to the historical method of the religious and philosophical influences which molded the theological teaching of Mr. Campbell. Here are some extracts from reviews:

J. J. HALEY: "This book marks the beginning of a new epoch in our literature. . . . . I heartily commend it to the perusal of thoughtful men and women."

F. D. POWER: "A distinct and noteworthy contribution to our literature. It is a clear and comprehensive statement of a very important theme."

ERI B. HULBERT: "Readers whose desire it is to understand the theology which Mr. Campbell elaborated will find in this treatise exactly the information they are seeking."

A handsome volume of 302 pages, bound in cloth. Sent postpaid on receipt of price, $1.00.

Current Events.

The Albany Strike. Much disorder and some blood-shed have been caused by a formidable, but wholly unnecessary, strike affecting the street car service of Albany and Troy, N. Y. The strikers have resorted to violence to prevent the running of cars by imported non-union men. The militia has been called out and on one or two occasions has been called into very active service, with the usual fatal results to the "innocent by-stander." The strike is not occasioned by any serious dispute over wages or hours, but has to do with the status of the union. The strikers demand: first, that the company shall recognize the union and receive its representatives as occasion may require; and second, that all non-union men shall be discharged. The strike is unnecessary because there is no rational issue on either one of these points. The company ought to have granted the former at the first asking and the union ought never to have asked the latter. For aggregations of capital to refuse to recognize aggregations of labor is a puerile absurdity; and for the union men to attempt to force all laborers into the union by making it impossible for a non-union man to get work, is the assumption of a right which no union could exercise with safety to itself or the public. It is a more dangerous invasion of the rights of labor than of the rights of capital. Labor unions are not only an inevitable product of the centralizing tendency of our time, but an indispensable factor in making the principles of democracy effective in the industrial world; but they can not succeed by coercion. The union is said to have waived the demand for the discharge of non-union men and, if the company will as reasonably agree to recognize the union, the strike can be soon settled and reputable citizens can again innocently by-stand in the streets of Albany without danger of death from a striker's rock or a militiaman's bullet.

Machinists' Strike. A strike involving nearly 50,000 machinists in the cities from New York to San Francisco began last Monday morning. Machinists who are employed on government work and by the railroads were not called out, though there were a few exceptions in the latter case. The National Association of Machinists several days ago presented seven demands, the most important of which were for a nine-hour working day instead of ten and for such an increase in the pay per hour as would make the day's wages practically the same as at present. Many employers conceded these points and James O'Connell, president of the association, believes that enough more will do so to justify ending the strike within a week. Other demands of the association relate to the rate of pay for over-time work and the limitation of the number of apprentices.

Postal Reform. Two things impress the careful observer of the United States postal service: First, that by an evasion of the laws regarding second-class matter, the government is compelled to carry at the one-cent-a-pound rate thousands of tons of matter which is not properly periodical, and that the department is thereby saddled with an immense deficit every year; and second, that the attempts at reform, however well meant, are so unwisely conceived that they would introduce new evils rather than correct the old ones. The Loud Bill, admirable in many of its provisions, failed because it embodied unfair discrimination against legitimate periodicals. It is now threatened that the privilege of second-class rates will be withdrawn from all periodicals which use premiums in the extension of their circulation. One case is cited in which a paper has secured a quarter of a million subscribers by giving to each one a tea set worth more than the subscription price of the paper. It cannot be maintained that these two hundred and fifty thousand persons subscribed because of the merit of the paper, and the department proposes to make this the decisive test in determining whether a list of subscribers is "legitimate," which is the essential requirement of the law. It is very apparent that the postal department will make much trouble for itself if it undertakes to examine into the motives of persons who subscribe for papers and to make the cent-a-pound rate a reward for literary merit. The fact that most of the reputable newspapers do employ premiums to overcome the reluctance of possible, but none too eager, subscribers is a strong point against the proposed ruling. We cannot believe that it would be a genuine reform measure which would shut out such periodicals as the Youth's Companion, which has made a conspicuous and legitimate success of the premium method, and would leave untouched those paper-backed "libraries" of fiction which disseminate very dubious literature at second-class rates without presenting a single characteristic of a legitimate periodical.

The Pay of a King. It was not without much discussion and opposition that King Edward's civil list was fixed by the House of Commons at $2,350,000 a year. This is practically the king's salary, though out of it he has to pay certain officials whose function is at least semi-public. Compared with the salary of our President, this seems a very handsome sum, but it looks small beside the income of some of our millionaires. Mr. Carnegie can give a million a month for libraries and still have more spending money than the King of England. The Emperor of Austria and the Czar of Russia each receive four million dollars a year, besides which they have enormous incomes from their private fortunes. The kings of Italy and Prussia have three million dollars each and the latter is also emperor of Germany. The King of Belgium, whose dominion is about the size of New Jersey, receives $700,000 for his services and the Queen of Holland, with an annual allowance of only $300,000, would be a comparatively poor woman if she did not have a fortune of her own. In view of these figures it will be seen that Huckleberry Finn did not overstate the case when, in reply to the awed inquiry of "nigger Jim" as to how much a king got, he said, "He gets all he wants. He can get $100 a month if he wants it." Being president of a republic does not always pay much better than Huck Finn's idea of royal wealth, for the president of the Swiss confederation gets only $3,000 a year. The salary of our president seems pitifully small when compared with that of King Edward, but a president is too busy a man to have a large salary. He wouldn't have time to spend it. And our government is easily cleared of the charge of niggardliness by noting that it pays the members of Congress salaries amounting to about two and a half million dollars annually, while the members of the British Parliament serve without pay.

Professor Gilbert's Resignation. Prof. George H. Gilbert and the Chicago Theological Seminary have given a convincing proof of the power of Christian courtesy and brotherly love to rob even a heresy case of its bitterness. Pro. Gilbert, who has been a member of the faculty of this Congregational seminary, has during the last few years acquired a national reputation as a New Testament scholar. His "Student's Life of Christ" has been deservedly popular and its teachings gave no occasion for alarm, but in his next book, "The Revelation of Jesus," his teaching in regard to the person of Christ furnished a point of attack. The unity of Christ with God was considered to be only a unity of purpose and spirit, and not a unity of essence as defined by the orthodox creed. Prof. Gilbert's critics believe that, in interpreting the divinity of Jesus with the emphasis on its moral instead of its metaphysical aspect, he is denying the essential facts of the Christian faith. Desiring to proceed with the utmost fairness, the directors of the seminary requested Prof. Gilbert to prepare a fuller statement of his belief on the points in question and gave him a year's leave of absence in which to work out the problem. The results of this work he has embodied in a book entitled "The First Interpreters of Jesus," advance sheets of which, when presented to the proofs convinced them that Prof. Gilbert's teaching was hopelessly at variance with the creed of the seminary. His resignation was quietly presented and as quietly accepted. There has been no bitterness on either side, no persecution and no complaint of persecution. Without passing judgment upon Prof. Gilbert's views, one cannot but admire the spirit which has been shown both by those who consider his teaching destructive of Christian faith and by himself in resigning so promptly and cheerfully from a position which many of his best friends believed he could no longer consistently occupy. The case is a good model for inquisitors and heretics.

Oil and Industry. It is reported that the acute stage of the boom at Beaumont, Tex., has already passed off, and that normal and legitimate business conditions are being established. Beaumont is doing well if it has so soon gotten down to a solid business basis. Of course, irresponsible companies will for many months yet be selling shares in unbored wells on unlocated land to the simple-minded lambs who think that the name of Beaumont is a talisman for certain wealth. Persons who are solicited to make this sort of an investment will do well to remember that there are thousands of people now in Beaumont who know a good deal about oil, and the really good things do not have to go begging at 20 cents on the dollar. The Texas Bankers' Convention recently visited Beaumont, on which occasion Ex-Senator Towne spoke of the effect which this discovery of oil will have on the industrial development of Texas. Its location is important, because fuel at present must be imported at great expense. With an abundance of cheap fuel at hand, the hardwood forests of this region will make it a center for the manufacture of furniture. The white sand of the Gulf coast will lend itself to the making of glass, and the manufacture of paper from rice straw will give added importance to the growing industry of rice raising. A few miles of pipe-line will connect Beaumont with Port Arthur, from which point tank steamers can carry Texas oil direct to any port in the world. The most important factor in the development of the field is the Guffey Company, which was incorporated last week with a capital of $15,000,000. The stockholders of this company are Pittsburg men, who have had experience in developing oil fields. During the past decade the south has entered a period of new industrial activity, and the discovery of a fuel supply in Texas will perhaps be more valuable as an impetus to southern manufacture than as an independent source of wealth.

The Newspapers and the Canteen. It is not surprising that the same forces which opposed the anti-canteen law before its enactment are zealous in their attempts to show that it has failed to promote sobriety among the soldiers. Before the passage of the law there were doubtless many good people who believed in the canteen as an aid to virtue, and viewed its abolition with apprehension. There were also many persons whose sympathies were with the liquor business, who championed the cause of the canteen for the ostensible reason that its place would be taken by unregulated saloons. Since the anti-canteen law has gone into effect, there has been a systematic attempt on the part of many newspapers to spread false reports about the result of the change. It is reported that numerous saloons have been started in the vicinity of army posts, that riots have occurred, that the amount of drunkenness among soldiers has increased, that it has become necessary in some places to swear in deputies to assist in keeping the peace, and that in every particular the morale of the army has suffered by the abolition of the canteen. Investigations have proved that these reports are false in general and in detail. They are not mistakes; they are not the utterances of good but misguided people; they are the deliberate and premeditated lies of those who have a direct or indirect interest in the prosperity of the liquor business, and consequently in the re-establishment of the army canteen. It is susceptible of proof that there has not been more drunkenness in the army since the abolition of the canteen than before, but that there has, on the other hand, been a decrease as large as one could expect within that time.

The End of the Tour. The sudden and serious illness of Mrs. McKinley at San Francisco has been a matter of national anxiety during the past week. The six days' stay of the presidential party in that city will doubtless be doubled before the convalescent can be moved. Meanwhile the President has been unable to participate, except occasionally and informally, in the many functions which had been arranged for him. It has been decided to abandon the remainder of the tour and to return to Washington, with no intermediate stops, as soon as the condition of Mrs. McKinley's health will permit. She is believed to be out of danger for the present. The death of Mrs. Lyman J. Gage, wife of the Secretary of the Treasury, at Washington last Friday was a painful coincidence with Mrs. McKinley's serious illness. On last Friday the battleship "Ohio" was launched at the Union Iron Works, San Francisco. The President's journey to the Pacific Coast had been timed with reference to this event, and he was present at the launching, but the ceremonies were not what had been anticipated.

Opening of the Pan-American Exposition. On Monday of this week the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo was formally opened with impressive ceremonies. The most novel feature was the release of 10,000 carrier pigeons, which flew in various directions, carrying the message that the exposition had been inaugurated. The chief speeches of the occasion were made by Vice-President Roosevelt and Senator Lodge. The recently-elected directors of the St. Louis Exposition of 1903 spent two days in Buffalo as the guests of the Pan-American, and studied the situation with a view to securing points for the Louisiana Purchase celebration. Mr. Buchanan, Director-General of the Pan-American, said in an after-dinner speech to the St. Louis men that, in preparing for the World's Fair of 1903, St. Louis has "too much money and too little time." The latter part of this proposition is certainly true. Two years is a short time in which to create an exposition of the first magnitude on a site not yet selected. The abundance of money may not be a serious drawback if the directors exhibit the degree of acumen in using it which we have a right to expect of such men. Mr. Buchanan considers the Buffalo Exposition fortunate in having no government commissioners.

Presbyterian General Assembly. The one hundred and thirteenth General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States convened in Philadelphia on May 16. Dr. H. C. Minton, of California, was elected moderator. The so-called "Peoria plan" for appointing the important committees will be tried for the first time. The church is divided into election districts each of which chooses its representative on the several committees, the power of the moderator being thus much curtailed. The Assembly has many important matters to discuss but none which will compare in general interest with the question of creed revision. The report of the committee, which has already been given in substance in these columns, has been presented to the Assembly and will be discussed this week. The Presbyterian Church is confronting an important crisis. There is a regrettable tendency in certain quarters to take a somewhat savage delight in the difficulties which our Presbyterian brethren are sure to find in either revising their creed or adding an explanatory statement or dropping the whole matter. We do not share in this mirth. The situation is rather tragic than otherwise. Good men of strong convictions, but holding different doctrinal opinions, find themselves in a denomination which they love for its history and its associations and which they would not willingly leave. Most of them believe that the denomination should have a definite theological standard, but all do not hold the same theology. Can the present standard be so interpreted as to make room for all? If not, whose theology shall be the standard and who shall be forced out? The outcome cannot fail to be painful to many whether the old creed is changed or kept. Like many a painful situation this crisis is full of instruction.

The Committee on Relations has presented to the Cuban constitutional convention a majority and a minority report. The majority report virtually accepts the Platt amendment, but abolishes in a preamble the interpretations put upon it by the President and the Secretary of War in conference with the Cuban commissioners. The minority report accepts part of the Platt amendment but rejects the rest on the ground that it does not fairly express the ideas given in the assurances of the President and Secretary of War, and therefore, does not really express the opinion of the people of the United States.

Senator Depew predicts that President McKinley will be elected for a third term. We think Mr. McKinley has, on the whole, made an able president, but enough is enough. There is other presidential timber. He would better emulate the Father of his Country and clinch his reputation with a timely Farewell Address.

A Neglected Opportunity.

When we consider the power of the press in disseminating religious literature adapted to the moral and spiritual needs of men, in these days of cheap printing, it is difficult to account for the strange apathy which prevails among us on this subject. It is a matter to which we have occasionally referred, but we always feel that there is danger of our motive being misunderstood when we are urging the importance of distributing the right kind of literature. Of all the ways that are open to us of extending the knowledge of the principles of the gospel as we understand and teach them, and of our plea for the unity of Christians, we do not hesitate to say that the most effective is the one we least value and to which we give the least attention, namely, the circulation of religious journals, books and tracts.

We are in receipt of a letter from a brother in the great northwest, where our next national convention is to be held, who appreciates the value of the printing press and who urges us to lay this matter upon the hearts of religious people generally. "As the falls of Niagara," he writes, "have force enough to supply surrounding cities miles away with power sufficient to operate gigantic enterprises, so by God's blessing the printing press and the printed page have sufficient motive power to largely Christianize the world. I sincerely hope and trust you will very strongly urge upon all the delegates to the Christian Endeavor Convention to see to it that illustrated tracts, booklets, floral text cards and Sunday-school papers are freely and systematically distributed from house to house, to passers by, to sailors, soldiers, policemen, street-car conductors, cabmen, etc., and also other good gospel literature in all other ways that are practicable. No force can stand against the power of the religious press, and it is my firm conviction that it is destined to be one of the most powerful factors in evangelizing the world."

Given enough men of that spirit and appreciation of the value of the printed page, what could we not do in widening and deepening the knowledge and influence of the primitive gospel? One of the ablest men in the United States said to us a few years ago, "The religious newspaper is the mightiest religious factor among all the human agencies now employed in this country." And yet it is not doing a tithe of what it might be made to accomplish if it were utilized as it might be by those who claim to believe in the principles which they advocate. If we had a fund even of $10,000 the interest of which alone could be used for sending the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST together with books and tracts where they would be heartily welcomed and read, it would accomplish a vast work in sowing the seeds of religious reform, in molding public sentiment, and in raising up new friends for the cause we plead.

There is a great need of a revival of interest in tract distribution and in the wider circulation of our religious journals. We have had enough evidence coming under our own personal observation of the influence of good tracts and of a good weekly religious paper in transforming the lives of men, and in directing their religious energies into new and wider channels, to convince the most skeptical on this subject. It is no longer a question of whether we can propagate through the printed page the principles of the reformation we plead, for that has already been amply demonstrated; it is only a question as to whether we feel that we have any truth that it is worth our while to be at the expense of propagating in this way.

We throw out these reflections for the purpose of awakening thought in the minds of men of means and of devotion to the cause of Christianity, and leading them to take some practical steps looking towards a larger utilization of the printing press in the dissemination of the truths which the world most needs to-day.

Progress in Presbyterianism.

The report of the committee appointed by the last General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church to compile the returns from the various presbyteries on the subject of creed revision, contains the following highly significant clause:

> These returns indicate that it is the mind of the church that the confession shall be interpreted throughout in harmony with the teaching of Scripture, that God is not willing that any one should perish, nor is it the decree of God, but the wickedness of their own hearts which shuts some men out from the salvation freely and lovingly offered in Christ Jesus to all sinners.

This indicates a degree of progress in religious thought among Presbyterians that cannot but be gratifying to all who believe in the unity of the church and who realize that this unity must be real and not merely formal. It is no reproach to Presbyterianism, but on the contrary it is greatly to its credit, to say that the foregoing statement implies a great change from the type of thought which prevailed when the Westminster Confession of Faith was formulated. It would be a sad commentary on the intelligent people who make up the body of the Presbyterian Church if they had not shared in that great change that has come over religious thought during the past century. If this were the case they would certainly constitute an exception to the otherwise universal rule. If this statement truly represents the consensus of opinion among Presbyterians of to-day, there has been not only a great change, but a change in the right direction—a change that will remove one of the most serious obstacles which Christianity has encountered.

We have always believed that the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterians did not represent the thought of the representative men of that body to-day, especially on the point covered by the foregoing extract. It will be a tremendous gain, not for Presbyterians alone, but for the church universal, if the old view that God elected certain men to be saved and certain others to be damned, without regard to their moral condition or acts, shall be repudiated, as we hope it may be by the action of the General Assembly now in session in Philadelphia. If that body approves this report, then it puts itself on record as accepting the view "that God is not willing that any one should perish, nor is it the decree of God, but the wickedness of their own hearts which shuts some men out from the salvation freely and lovingly offered in Christ Jesus to all sinners." This notable triumph of scriptural truth—a great fundamental truth—over the theology of a past age ought to be a matter of general rejoicing. It shows how "truth crushed to earth will rise again." We may all watch with interest the action of the General Assembly in relation to the report of this committee.

This is only one of many changes no less radical which are going on in all the religious bodies of christendom. We believe, too, that, as in the case just cited, these changes are for the most part in the right direction. It would be a revelation, no doubt, to all of us, if we were all brought together in some great deliberative assembly, to find out how many of the differences which separated us in the past have been outgrown, and what essential unity of doctrine prevails among the representative men of the various religious bodies. While it is not essential to Christian unity that men shall agree on all points of doctrine—a condition of things which will probably never exist—it is essential to effective cooperation that there be substantial unity on the great fundamental facts and truths of the gospel. We are glad to believe that the tendency is in that direction and one of the most substantial proofs is this change of interpretation of Presbyterian doctrine indicated by the extract we have given above.

Notes and Comments.

In the life of Phillips Brooks he relates how, when at college, he had submitted an essay to his professor in English for criticism. He had made a specially ornate and rhetorical introduction which he innocently supposed would receive the special commendation of his professor. Imagine his surprise, when he received his essay back, to find in blue letters on the margin, just at the close of his beautiful introduction, the words "Begin here!" The young man evidently took the lesson to heart, for any one who has ever read the sermons of Phillips Brooks will notice how universally he "begins here," omitting all useless rhetorical flourishes and high-sounding phrases. The moral to this little incident is obvious. Let all our contributors begin just after the unnecessary introduction, and carefully omit all words, phrases and sentences that are not essential to convey the meaning of the writer.

Sometimes an old familiar passage of Scripture receives fresh illumination by some current incident. A good while ago it was written by one who knew a good deal of human nature, and who, in addition to his genius and to his experience, was guided by the Spirit of God, that "they that desire to be rich fall into a temptation and a snare and many foolish and hurtful lusts, such as drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is a root of all kinds of evil, which some reaching after have been led astray from the faith, and have pierced themselves through with many sorrows." For comment on the foregoing see reports in the daily papers of the results of the speculative craze on Wall Street recently, in the wrecked lives and fortunes of many who, reaching after sudden wealth, have "pierced themselves through with many sorrows."

If the time and talent devoted by men of wealth to devising ways and means to suddenly enlarge their fortunes were expended in careful thought as to how they might best use the wealth they have so as to glorify God and benefit their fellow men, it would not be long until the kingdoms of this world would become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ.

There is a kind of gain concerning which there is very little competition, and yet it is the greatest of all gains which men may seek for in this world. "Godliness with contentment is great gain," says an inspired writer. Here is an opportunity for all to make "great gain" without injuring others, but greatly to their benefit, and it is gain which is in no way affected by the fluctuation of the stock market. It is a kind of wealth that does not take wings and fly away, and that gives pure and enduring satisfaction to him who possesses it. Why should there not be a universal effort to realize this gain?

A certain religious paper deprecates the idea of attempting to reunite denominations which have many points in common and but few differences, and thinks it is a waste of time. "Wall building is bound to cease when the builders talk of compromise." In that case, let us talk of compromise loud and long. The Christian world needs nothing so much as that wall-building should cease.

A Methodist bishop criticizes the overdevelopment of the musical feature of the religious services in certain city churches and complains that the sermons are "compressed to the dimensions of jejune essays under the hydraulic pressure of musical floods in front and rear." This is a great evil. Music which is not worshipful should be eliminated from the services, whether it be made by choir, organ or congregation. It may be doubted, however, whether sermonic jejuneness is not more often the result of prolixity than of undue compression.

The New York Observer is still devoting valuable space to the discussion of the question whether the Christian day of worship should be called Sunday or Sabbath—a discussion which ought long ago to have been outgrown in so intelligent a community as that from which the Observer emanates. Our esteemed contemporary seems never to have heard of such a term as Lord's Day and thinks the whole question is settled in favor of Sabbath when it is shown that Sunday is a pagan term.

A Catholic contemporary remarks in an optimistic vein that "it is no wonder that thoughtful Protestants are almost ready to admit that Christian unity can be obtained only by the various non-Catholic denominations joining the Catholic church." That would be a very effective method of attaining unity, but no method at all of preserving it. The Catholic Church has had her chance and has failed. In the Middle Ages there was substantial unity under the Roman hierarchy, but, when the Bible was re-discovered and the spirit of modern life was applied to its interpretation, the church could not preserve that unity even by the aid of the Inquisition. What good would it do if every Protestant joined the Catholic Church to-day? Every motive which made the Lutheran reformation inevitable and irresistible in the sixteenth century, would be ten times as potent in promoting a similar revolution to-morrow. To say that there would be unity if everybody would join the Catholic Church and stay in it, is as puerile an assumption of the impossible as to say that there would be unity if everybody would join the Old Predestinarian Two-Seed-in-the-Spirit Baptists. The latter proposition involves no more ifs than the former and no bigger ones.

The World's Work has an editorial on "The Decline of the Religious Press." This reminds us of the talk we have had for many years about the "decline of the power of the pulpit." No one questions but that a certain type of religious newspapers and preachers has declined in popular esteem. It is quite right that it should. They represent a phase of religious thought and life which is rapidly falling into "innocuous desuetude." But as long as religion remains an integral part of human nature and a vital condition of human happiness, neither the religious journal nor the preacher that rightly interprets it and urges its just claims on the minds of men will cease to meet a fundamental need among men.

There has been some discussion recently of the question whether a minister ought to be admitted to the sick-room to administer spiritual consolation to the patient. A preacher has expressed the opinion that a visit from the average minister, with his long coat and white tie, his sepulchral tone and his willingness to admit that the patient has reached his last hour, is enough to make a well man sick. A physician, on the contrary, has been good enough to say that the preacher of to-day is usually a cheery individual, whose presence in the sick-room is apt so be distinctly beneficial even to the body, not to mention the soul. On the whole, we agree with the physician. Of course, some preachers are unfit for the sick-room—but then, some are also unfit for the pulpit, and one would not say on that account that a minister has no business in the pulpit. The mournful and cadaverous preacher who is incapable of becoming a sympathetic and helpful friend to his people, should keep out of the sick-room. He should also keep out of the ministry.

Dr. Walker, Methodist minister of Atlanta, Ga., attributes the Galveston flood to the devil. One would think the Jacksonville fire was more in the line of business of his sulphuric majesty. But Dr. Walker widens his mission so as to include all manner of destructive agencies. He says, as reported in the newspapers: "After all, what is there to make us doubt that he may have presided over the destruction of Pompeii, the burning of Chicago, the earthquake at Charleston, the water flood at Johnstown and the late Texas horror at Galveston? Are those people sinners above all other people that 10,000 of them and $20,000,000 of their property should have been swept away in a single night?" Waiving any answer to the last question, which is quite irrelevant, one might reply to the first by saying that the unreasonableness, not to say the impiety, of supposing that God has put this earth under the control of Satan to the extent indicated, is quite sufficient to create doubt as to the truth of such an idea. We are not of those who believe that the devil is a rival of Jehovah, and shares with Him the power that controls the material forces of the world.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Reposing in a hammock under the shade of the trees at Rose Hill, after the labors of the day, listening to the songs of the birds and watching them flit from tree to tree and from bough to bough, we were impressed with how much pleasure we get out of things which cost us nothing. These birds do not indeed toil, nor spin, but neither do we toil nor spin for them. They earn their own living, build their own nests, and throw in their music as a free offering to the world's happiness. How cheery their notes! How care-free and joyous their lives! What care they about wages, strikes, fluctuations in the stock market, and all that brood of cares which make men prematurely old and gray! And yet they have food and raiment. That Baltimore oriole that sits yonder on the limb of the elm tree, beside its hanging nest, pouring out its liquid tones of music on the evening air, has a dress that might well provoke envy from the queens of fashion. Its black coat and hat and yellow vest give him the appearance of a very dude among his tribe, but he isn't, for he scratches for his own worm and builds a cozy nest of curious workmanship for Mrs. Oriole. But to return to our first thought, these orioles, cat-birds, thrushes and others, whose music gladdens the mornings and the evenings, and the graceful gray squirrels, which have their habitation in the trees, and occasionally scamper across the lawn in search of their daily bread, all these contribute their services free, and they add not a little to our enjoyment. Not only do they ask no pay, but they are inclined to resent any obtrusive kindness on our part. They get their pay in the joy it gives them to do what they do. If there were more of this sort of service in the world it would be a better place to live in.

When we come to think of it there are a great many of these unpaid ministries which sweeten labor and make life more livable. There is the glory of the sunrise and of the sunset—the outgoings of the morning and the evening—when nature presents such pictures as no human artist can ever equal, presented free to all admiring eyes without money and without price. Nature has no monopolies. She paints her many-hued rainbows across the brow of the evening and the morning, in full view of all who care to look. She scatters her flowers over the earth with such profusion that the poor as well as the rich are blessed by their tender and beautiful ministry. Her sun shines for all. Her starlit heavens are the canopy of all. Her majestic mountains, her deep resounding oceans, her clouds—the chariots of the wind—which water the thirsty earth—all these and a thousand other things are her munificent gifts to mankind. Even the gift of life eternal is free to all men, and is as accessible to the poor as to the rich. The friendships which enrich our lives, and the love which soothes and sustains us from the cradle to the grave, is a priceless, unbought treasure of the heart. The truth is, the best things of life cannot be purchased with money. They are God's free gifts, to be accepted and appropriated in our individual experiences. They are only purchasable in the sense that we must make the personal efforts necessary to understand and use them. If we would ponder more upon the immeasurable superiority of those things which are free to all men over those which only the rich can possess, it would destroy a great deal of envy which exists in the human heart, and produce a contentment of spirit which in itself is of priceless value.

Speaking of gifts to man, Paul calls Christ God's "unspeakable gift." That is, no words which even Paul could command were adequate to portray the greatness of this gift. When Jesus was here on earth He was concerned to know what His disciples thought about Him. Is He not asking the same question of us—"What think ye of Christ?" Why, Master, we think Thou art the Son of God, the Son of man. Thou art also the Sun of Righteousness, the effulgence of God, the express image of the Father. Thou art God manifest in the flesh. Thou art our Prophet, Priest and King. Thou art Lord of life and of death. Thou art the Savior of the world. Thou art He that was to come, and since Thy coming the world has been brighter with hope, and life has new meaning and value. Thou didst lay aside the glory which Thou hadst with the Father before the world was, and condescend to take our nature that Thou mightest lift us out of our sins and endow us with life eternal. To accomplish this Thou didst lay down Thy life for our sins, and didst rise again from the dead for our justification. Thou art seated at the right hand of the Father, crowned with glory and honor, pleading our cause, bestowing Thy gifts upon men and leading forward a conquering host to redeem the world from the power of sin and death. Thou art the satisfaction of our hearts, the joy of our lives and the fulfillment of all our highest ideals. Thou hast so bound us to Thyself with the cords of love that we can never be separated from Thee. Our highest hope, as we look into the mysterious future, is that some day we shall behold Thee in Thy beauty, be transfigured into Thy likeness and dwell with Thee forever.

The eyes of the world are turning towards St. Louis now and for the next two or three years this city will be the focus of more attention than any other in this country or in the world. Not only during the six months of the World's Fair, but during the two years between now and its opening St. Louis will be in the world's eye and thousands of strangers will be within our gates. This fact has a religious significance in which we are interested. It means an enlarged opportunity for broadcasting the truth and for extending the power of Christ's kingdom among men. All great aggregations of humanity are opportunities of immense value to the church charged with the duty of making known Christ's gospel to all men. How shall we best utilize the opportunity afforded by the World's Fair celebrating the Louisiana Purchase to be held in St. Louis in 1903? is a question that should interest not St. Louis Christians alone, but the entire brotherhood of believers throughout the world, but particularly in the United States of America. It is an occasion of extraordinary strategic importance, and to fail to make the most of it would be unfaithfulness to a sacred trust.

Questions and Answers.

If a divorced couple marry again to other parties and are afterwards convinced that they are living in adultery, what is the right course for them to pursue to make things right before God and the church? J. D. Bryce.

They should have their second marriage annulled legally, as it is morally, and remain unmarried, or become reconciled to and reunited with each other.

I am greatly helped by Brother Lamar's articles and his idea of the serpent tempting Eve appears very reasonable. But will Brother Lamar kindly explain Genesis 3:14; i. e., the punishment inflicted on the serpent? Constant Reader.

This is a question for Brother Lamar to answer, but he would probably say that since this story is symbolic, the language referred to is simply a part of the symbolism, taking its form from the manner of the serpent as we now see it. Surely man's animal nature has suffered degradation because of its subjection to evil desires.

Will you please tell me whether there is any prophecy concerning Christ's resurrection, and if so give a reference? Ella M. Cole.

Christ foretold his own resurrection. See Matt. 16:21, and other places in the gospels. The Old Testament contains a number of passages that may be fairly interpreted to refer to, and involve, the resurrection. Among these may be included Isaiah 53:11, Psalm 16:10, quoted by Peter in his sermon on the day of Pentecost, and others which the querist will find readily by a little careful reading.

Why is it we do not now have more writing in our papers on the second coming of Christ? A Reader.

There is a significant silence on this subject, so far as we have noticed, in all religious journals. It is not, we think, that men have lost faith in the fact of the second coming, but because thought on that subject is undergoing a change, silent and almost imperceptible. People are thinking more than talking or writing on the subject. When men's views become clear and definite again we shall no doubt hear much on the subject. The same, perhaps, is true concerning the judgment. The whole question of eschatology, or the last things, is undergoing reconstruction in the minds of religious thinkers, and the time for a restatement of views on this question has perhaps not yet arrived.

Is it not a degrading theory of man's origin to say that he came from the anthropoid ape? Homo.

If so, what shall we say of the theory that man came from the dust of the earth? The ape is certainly very much higher in the scale of being than the dust of the earth. It is man's physical nature that is said by the Bible to come from the dust of the earth, and by evolution to have come from the dust of the earth through successive forms of life to its present condition. Man's spirit came from God and this is the part of his nature to which his dignity and glory belong. We cannot see that it makes much difference, as it respects man's dignity, whether we hold that his body was made directly from the dust of the earth, or indirectly through an ascending scale of beings from the lowest forms of life up to the most highly developed.

Who or what are those evil spirits or devils spoken of in the Gospels, which Christ and the apostles cast out? A Disciple.

This is a query which is to be classed with, Who was Melchizedek? and, What is the aurora borealis? There are two general ways of understanding those passages which refer to demoniacal possession: First, that it was literally the possession of a man by an evil spirit who controlled his actions and displaced his own reason and moral nature; second, that the ascription of certain alarming and violent phenomena to evil spirits was the interpretation which that age, not skilled in the diagnosis of disease, placed upon various forms of catalepsy and insanity. Neither interpretation can be accepted without encountering grave difficulties.

1. What is meant by the end of the world in Heb. 9:26?

2. Explain Heb. 6:4-6?

3. Is it known when and by whom the Baptist Church was founded? Inquirer.

1. The phrase "end of the world" in the Old Version is rendered "the end of the ages" in the New Version, and as it refers to the time when Christ was manifested, it evidently means the close of the Jewish age and the beginning of the Christian age.

2. Without going into the meaning of all the terms involved in this somewhat difficult passage, the plain meaning of its teaching is that these Hebrew-Christians were to cease dwelling so much on the first principles of Christ and to press on to perfection in the study of other problems growing out of these first principles, and pertaining to Christian life and duty. Some of these first principles are specified, and they are most of them matters of great importance, but they are not the whole of Christian truth, and we are not therefore to rest content with them, but to go on to a larger understanding of the principles and truths involved in the religion of Christ. The admonition is as timely now as it was when it was first given.

3. We have no desire to get into any debate with our Baptist brethren and hence we refer "Inquirer" to any credible church history. The Baptists in this country, it is generally understood, began with Roger Williams, but there were Christians holding to immersion and believers' baptism, perhaps all the way back through the Christian centuries, though of necessity they must have been at times few, scattered and without much influence. That these Christians, under different names and with varying views on other matters, can be, in any historical sense, identified with the Baptists of our day, except in holding the principles above mentioned, has not been proven. These were the predecessors of all modern Christians who hold to the truths above stated. Disciples of Christ, no less than Baptists, have a right to claim spiritual kinship with all in every age who have stood as witnesses for the baptism of the New Testament—namely, the burial in water of a penitent believer in Christ. But this is a succession of truths and principles, and not of organized churches or movements.

The Church and Temperance Reform

By REV. THEODORE L. CUYLER, D. D.

What God hath joined together, let no man put asunder! Great moral evils involve great moral duties. If there be an enormous evil that is producing fearful destruction of human bodies and souls, then Christianity is bound to furnish a salvation from that evil. No one disputes Mr. Gladstone's famous declaration that war, pestilence and famine are not so destructive as the curse of strong drink. God's word tells us that drunkenness shuts heaven against its victims. The chiefest enemy of Bible religion and the welfare of society is the intoxicating cup; no other has desolated so many homes, wrought such corruption in civil affairs, destroyed so many lives and damned so many immortal souls. If Jesus Christ established his church for the very purpose of saving human society from its sins, then the hugest sin should command the church's most serious attention. For the Christian church to ignore the drink evil is as absurd as for the West Point Military Academy to ignore the use of artillery, or for a medical college to ignore the treatment of fevers.

Some good people regard liquor-drinking simply as a question of dietetics, and turn it over to the doctors. It undoubtedly has its physiological bearings; and in our public schools the nature and effects of alcoholic drinks ought to be thoroughly taught to the young. Thousands use alcoholic stimulants ignorantly. But if it be the duty of the physiologist to keep intoxicants out of men's bodies, it is tenfold more the duty of ministers, teachers and Christ's church to keep them out of men's souls. The moment that an evil lays its hands on man's eternal welfare, that moment must the church of Christ lay her hand upon it. The worst symptom that I see is the strange indisposition of so many of Christ's people to take hold of an evil that takes hold on hell.

Of late years there has been a lamentable tendency to relegate the whole subject of temperance to the domain of politics. This has arisen partly from the prominence given of late to the selling of intoxicants, and to the question of licensing or suppressing the tippling-houses. A mightily important question, too, is this, for both patriot and Christian. The legal suppression of the drinking haunts belongs to the ballot-box, the civil magistrate and the policeman; but unless Christ's followers put their conscience into their citizenship, no prohibitory laws are likely to be enacted, or thoroughly enforced. As an old-time prohibitionist ever since the days when I stood with Neal Dow before state legislatures advocating prohibitory laws, I was greatly gratified during a recent visit to southern California to observe how effectively the dram-shops are closed in many towns. This is done by a stringent law of "local prohibition." People are exhorted to vote down the saloon as a Christian duty; and in the leading pulpits appeals are made to this effect. The great weight of the Christian church is thrown on the side of public order, morality and true religion. Surely no one but a "fogy" or a fool would object to such a wise and beneficent policy for every Christian pulpit. Suppression of the saloons never will be enacted and never enforced unless God's people put their conscience and their courage into their citizenship.

But the duty of Christ's church goes down far deeper than to make public protest againt the legalized sale of intoxicants; it must strike at the use of intoxicants. It must aim at more than the reformation of drunkards—a very difficult process at the best. If one mission of the Christian church is to save men out of drunkenness, then by sound logic it ought to be still more its mission to save men from falling into drunkenness. Every pulpit ought to speak out just as freely and frankly against the temptations of the wine-cup, or the social glass, as against the temptations to gambling, or dishonesty, or Sabbath desecration, or licentiousness. Every Christian church ought to be a school of instruction to teach the young and the inexperienced what a deadly serpent is coiled in every alcoholic stimulant. It ought to enforce the Pauline principle of abstinence, not only for self-protection, but for the welfare of others. By every motive of tender solicitude for the protection of its own children from the horrors of this degrading vice, by every motive of regard for its own spiritual purity, by every prompting of self-denial for the sake of the weak and easily tempted, by every regard for the honor of its King and the spread of his kingdom, every band of Christ's followers ought to come out and be separate, and "touch not this unclean thing." Nineteen centuries of sorrow and of shame and of soul-slaughter ought to have taught Christ's church that she never can be a nursing mother to her children while she mixes the sincere milk of the gospel with one poison-drop of Satan's brewing.

"Would you have every church organize a temperance society of its own?" Yes, where there is material for its efficient management. Such societies have wrought an admirable work in Dr. Newman Hall's church in London, and for many years in the Brooklyn church under my own pastorate, and in many other churches. They held public meetings, and in many ways promoted the spread of temperance principles.

"Would you re-introduce the pledge of total abstinence?" Yes, by all means. In my student days I found such a pledge a strong safeguard under temptation; and so other students found it. The pledge acted as the bond of union among the hundreds of thousands of abstainers—as the vow of loyalty to Christ is the bond of union among church members.

At the present time the most distinguished leaders of the temperance reform in Great Britain—the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Newman Hall, Archdeacon Farrar, Basil Wilberforce, Lady Somerset, and many others—are pledged abstainers and advocate the principle of the pledge. It was a lamentable mistake that this symbo and safeguard has been so far abandoned in our own land; for the days when the abstinence pledge as a measure of prevention was in its widest vogue were the most successful days in the history of our reform. I deplore the abandonment of the pledge and of other methods of "moral suasion." I deplore the policy of directing the chief assault upon the sale of intoxicants, instead of warring upon the use of intoxicants; for, while the majority of people use and purchase intoxicants all attempts at prohibiting the traffic will meet with but partial success. Moral suasion and legal prohibition must be combined; what common-sense and experience have joined together let no man put asunder.

It must never be forgotten for a moment that the temperance reform in America had a Christian birth. The men who rocked its cradle and who girded its vigorous childhood were Dr. Lyman Beecher, and Justin Edwards, and President Nott, and Albert Barnes and Bishop McIlvaine, and Charles Jewett, and other eminent servants of God. The reform was ushered in with prayer. Its most eloquent advocate, John B. Gough, and its most munificent supporter, the Hon. William E. Dodge, made it a part and parcel of their most profound religious convictions. Spurgeon and Moody never divorced their temperance from their other Christian graces. The one crying, burning, indispensable need of the temperance reform in our beloved land is that the church of the Lord Jesus Christ should no longer treat it as an alien, or as a mendicant, but should open her doors to it as an angel of mercy sent to do the bidding of the Lord, and as a true yoke-fellow in the mighty work of saving souls from perdition.

Tartarus.

While in my simple gospel creed
That "God is love" so plain I read,
Shall dreams of heathen birth affright
My pathway through the coming night?
Ah, Lord of life, though spectres pale
Fill with their threats the shadowy vale,
With Thee my faltering steps to aid,
How can I dare to be afraid?

Is there a world of blank despair,
And dwells the Omnipresent there?
Does He behold with smile serene
The shows of that unending scene,
Where sleepless, hopeless anguish lies,
And ever dying, never dies?
Say, does He hear the sufferers groan,
And is that child of wrath His own?

O mortal, wavering in thy trust,
Lift thy pale forehead from the dust!
The mists that cloud thy darkened eyes
Fade ere they reach the o'erarching skies!
When the blind heralds of despair
Would bid thee doubt a Father's care,
Look up from earth, and read above
On heaven's blue tablet, "GOD IS LOVE."

—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

It was kind in you to send the newspaper clipping to me on the question, "Should I join a denominational church if there is none other near me?"

I am, however, compelled to confess that I am not interested in such questions. I was tempted, as I began to write the last sentence to say that I am not especially interested in such questions; but why use the word "especially"? I have no interest whatever in them. Such inquiries are essentially sectarian and are of interest to sectarians. There you have my mind expressed in the bluntest kind of English on the subject to which you call my attention.

There is nothing in the New Testament about uniting with any church. There is much in the New Testament about uniting with the Christ. Men are taught to believe on Him, to love Him, to confess Him, to obey Him, to come into Him. Our latter-day churchianity has almost crowded Christianity out. Not the church, but the Christ. If one will intelligently and heartily commit himself to the Christ, the Christ will lead him into right associations with those who believe in Jesus. Do not worry about what church you will join.

There is only one church recognized in the New Testament. The Church of Moses is spoken of and also the Synagogue of Satan, but the church which the Christ loved and for which he gave Himself is the one recognized church since the return of our Lord to his home in the heavens. This church is composed of men and women who are joined to the Son of God by a living, loving, loyal faith. No one denomination can with any show of reason claim to be the church of which the Master spoke when he said; "On this rock I will build my church." All who belong to the Christ by a personal faith in Him are members of this church. There is no denomination that embraces in its membership all Christians, and until such is the case it is presumption on the part of any person to say: "The church to which I belong, the church of which I am a member, is the Church of Christ."

It is said that Daniel Webster said: "One reason why I believe that Christianity is divine in its origin and nature is the fact that it has survived in spite of the old fashioned high pulpits."

It is probable that this story is apocryphal. It is more than likely that Mr. Webster never said anything of the kind; but he might have said it and have spoken the truth. The old style of meeting house with the high pulpit, removed at a great distance from the people, seems to have been designed to render the preached gospel ineffective. But Christianity lived in spite of this apparent design of Satan to put it to death in its own consecrated places.

One reason why I believe that Christianity is divine in its origin and nature is the fact that it has survived in spite of our foolishness. Time is spent in the discussion of unimportant topics when our Lord calls us to a great work. Our conduct belittles Christianity, to the extent of our influence. The church is broken up into parties over small matters. Divisions, usually, are not about what is taught in the Word but about things that are not taught. One would think, looking over announcements in the daily papers, that there are no great themes in the Bible to occupy the thoughts of preachers and people. It is not necessary, in this letter, to name the subjects announced in the daily papers, for last Sunday's sermons. You saw them. You know what they were. Was there anything in them to give a man a large view? The birth of Christ, the life of Christ, the nature of Christ, the character of Christ, the works of Christ, the doctrine of Christ, the claims of Christ, the influence of Christ, the death of Christ, the resurrection of Christ, the ascension of Christ, the coronation of Christ, the authority of Christ, etc.,etc.,—such thrilling themes are not mentioned. One of the best ways to bring Christians together is to preach Christ. He is the power of God and the wisdom of God. The preaching of the Christ in a large way will make large Christians. The best way to pay current expenses, to pay church debts, to generate an interest in missions, home and foreign, is to preach Christ, and this is the only way to make Christians. Church members can be gained by the hundred without preaching Christ. Sectarians can be made without the glorious gospel of the Son of God—but the only way to make Christians is to preach the Christ.

There never was a more auspicious time than the present for great preaching. The questions before us for solution are almost infinite in variety. Jesus is the Solvent of our hard problems. Our problems are numerous and, some of them, are great. They relate to the individual, to the home, to the municipality, the state, the church, the nation, the world. Your commission, my brother in the ministry, requires you to look these great questions and difficult problems squarely in the face. Dare to look at them! Handle them. Walk about them. Examine them. Study every one of them in the light of the Christ and his teaching. Paul's admonition to the presbyters in the church in Thessalonica, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good," is appropriate for the present time. The most up-to-date preaching is that which has our blessed Lord for its Alpha and Omega.

"Whatsoever ye do, in word or in deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus."

Do you know of anything broader than this? But it is old fashioned. Paul said it. All life becomes sacred from this view point. The distinction between the secular and the sacred has been blotted out. In harmony with the foregoing admonition Paul says in the thirteenth of Romans that the officer of the state, with a sword in his hand, is a minister of God. The preacher is not the only minister of Christ. The mayor of the city, the governor of the state, the president of the United States—these are ministers of God. The man who acts as agent between the producer and the consumer, the merchant, in buying and selling serves God, if he conducts his business in the right spirit, quite as much as when he praises and prays in the church on the Lord's day; and if his business is not conducted in the Spirit of Christ during the week his psalm singing and praying on Sunday are of no value. Work and worship must be in harmony to secure the best results.

When you become interested in this conception and presentation of the Christian religion, such questions as that in the beginning of this letter will have no interest for you, and those to whom you minister will pretty certainly join the right church, for they will be led by the Head of the Body, our Lord Jesus.

An error in last week's letter: I said that Hugh, son of H. T. Morrison, is at Manzanola, Colorada. He is not. H. T. Morrison is at Manzanola. He has examined the Rocky Ford field and has found about fifty Disciples. Rocky Ford is near Manzanola. It is probable that a Church of Christ will be organized at Rocky Ford.

What Most Interests Me Now.

By J. S. Lamar.

XI.—How He Came.

God's purposes are so far above the plane of human thought that the anticipations of men respecting them are seldom correct. They view divine prophecy from their own low plane of earthiness, and, even with the best intentions, the view is apt to be partial and indistinct, and perhaps colored by local and personal hopes and feelings. The predictions concerning the coming of the Messiah were thus misunderstood, and possibly we equally misinterpret those relating to his coming again. Nor is it matter of surprise that men failed to penetrate the depths of the divine wisdom, or to understand the thoughts and designs of the divine mind. They are always higher and better than heart of man can conceive.

The Grecian conception of divine incarnations was a caricature of divinity and a false representation of humanity. The products were neither gods nor men, but a sort of commingling of human appetite and passion with superhuman power—a mere deification of the animal man. I do not know that the Jews had formed any definite conception of the modus of his coming, but if so it was probably suggested by Old Testament theophanies, leading them to anticipate the sudden appearance in a humano-angelic form of a mysterious being clothed with divine attributes. But we may well believe that the idea of his coming in a way at once natural and supernatural had never entered their minds. If they thought that he was to be "born"—as their prophets clearly taught—this must have meant to them only that he was to come as a man, and that any divine qualities subsequently manifested were to be superadded. By an apotheosis the man was to be divinized, and exalted to the high messianic rank foretold of him.

But the fact was that, though conceived by a woman, it was through spiritual influence alone—the special presence and power of the highest. Miraculous it certainly was, but miraculous only to us—only because extraordinary and abnormal. To profound and reverent thought it was not more wonderful, not more mysterious, involved no more of divine power, than ordinary generation. All children are his children; all men are his sons, deriving their birth and their being from the power of the highest, but Christ alone was begotten without the intervention of a human father, and was hence, distinctively and by pre-eminence, "the only begotten of the Father." While, therefore, it may be in a lower sense and less indicative of special nearness and immediate intimacy, still in a true sense, we are all his children and may address him in believing prayer, as "Our Father which art in heaven."

In limiting the application of the phrase "only begotten" to the one historical begetting in time, I would not be understood as abating in the slightest degree the doctrine of our Savior's eternal pre-existence. I mean only to exclude the theological language which has come down to us in the symbols of the fourth century and later, and which represents him as eternally begotten language which is so remote from human experience and observation, and consequently from the usus loquandi of the human race, that it conveys no definite meaning. This is not to say that the doctrine is incomprehensible by finite minds, for that might well be, but that the words themselves, thus used, can not be understood without predicating eternity of the virgin mother, and thus making her a deess. This would be not only absurd in itself and directly contrary to Scripture, but would give up the humanity of Christ. Hence I hold that it is sounder in faith, as well as more wholesome for thought, to speak of the pre-existence in the language of inspiration: "In the beginning was the word and the word was with God, and the word was God. . . . The word was made flesh and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father." This may be too deep for us to fathom, but we can at least perceive that their relation was in the beginning—in eternity—analogous to that of a word to its idea—the expression and revelation of it; the means by which it communicates itself, manifests its nature, exerts its power and accomplishes its objects; and that they are distinct yet one—the word being in the idea and the idea in the word.

While no human mind could have anticipated his coming thus, now that he has come, we can recognize the infinite wisdom in it—nor can we think of any other possible way by which he could, not only have appeared to be, but actually have been, at the same time true and perfect man, and true and perfect God; not merely a divinized man, nor yet a humanized God, but essentially and absolutely, in the unity of his being, the God-man.

In sending his only begotten Son into the world, the Father might have selected his birthplace anywhere within it. Royal palaces, luxurious mansions, comfortable homes, the humble houses of the poor and the costly residences of the rich, all were before him, and he could have so directed his providences and have brought them into concurrence, as to have the birth just where he pleased. It was not of necessity, therefore, nor by chance, but by deliberate choice and actual preference that he selected out of the whole world perhaps the last place that human beings would have looked at for such an event—a place too low and mean and wretched to be considered or thought of for a moment—and he constrained the mother to be there at that particular time, and to shelter and shield herself in a miserable stable among brute beasts!—a public stable, with its most offensive filth, its malodorous smells, its gloomy fears, its disturbing and startling noises, its utter cheerlessness—without light, without fire, without the touch of a woman's hand or the sympathy of a woman's heart—far from the loved ones at home, alone in her distress and suffering, miserable and forlorn—it was there that the blessed virgin "brought forth her first born son, wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger."

The world has not forgotten—it can never forget—the unspeakable lowliness and wretchedness of his chosen birthplace. But how truly are God's thoughts higher than ours! Had it been in a palace, or a mansion, or even in a plain, comfortable home of a well-to-do citizen, it could never have so touched humanity's heart, nor have so called out humanity's grateful sympathies. As it was, the highest genius of art has clothed those humble surroundings with beauty, and glorified that rude manger with a divine halo. Eloquence, poetry and music have drawn inspiration from it. In view of it the children of the world, their parents and friends have sung their glad Christmas songs, and have been drawn into sympathy with the divine heart by the attractions of a scene so humanly repulsive, so divinely fascinating! The door of heaven was also opened and the angelic host sang gloria in excelsis, and every inhabitant of earth—the great, the small, the rich the poor, the old, the young, the highest monarch, the humblest shepherd, every one for himself may hear the glad message, "To you is born this day a Savior which is Christ the Lord." Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger—the Son of God—the Son of man.

The Shadowy Side of New York

By H. H. MONINGER.

The tragedy of the people of the lower walks of life is unknown to millions. Being impatient with our own petty troubles we mournfully imagine that we are living in the shadows and darkness, while sunshine is all around our fellows. Did we know of the unnumbered submerged social classes who are truly playing the tragic part, certainly we would gladly utter the publican's prayer, but with a modern meaning: "Lord, I thank thee that I am not as other men are."

With a company of Yale students, for whom arrangements had been made with the wardens of asylums, penitentiaries, work houses and hospitals, the ministers and leaders of the social settlements, and the police department, I recently spent a day and a night in the darker part of the national metropolis.

New York has a population of 3,437,202. It is a world in itself. Going from one part to another, one is first in America, then in Japan, then in China, then in Italy, next among the Russian Jews, and lastly, if he goes to Central Park, he will be in a country of sunshine and flowers.

After a day spent in studying the hospitals, asylums and work-houses on the islands in East River, our party of twenty-five gathered early in the evening under the care of five uniformed policemen. Dividing into squads, each in charge of a policeman, we went through the cheap Bowery lodging houses, charity lodging places, then into Chinatown with its chop suey restaurants and the joss house. We were variously characterized as inspectors, freaks, intruders, guys, and one man in the Atlantic Garden had the audacity to call us "de cheap skates what's too stingy to liquor up." As we had officers to back us we put on bold faces and went as though we owned the city. Tenement after tenement was entered, going up flight after flight, here entering a dining room where onions were being cooked, there entering a sitting room where the inmates were smoking opium. We peered into Chinese departments and Jewish shops. Whenever a desire to enter any of the rooms was manifest, the officer demanded entrance and in we would follow.

One place of especial interest in Chinatown was the joss house. Here the Chinese come, as it were, to consult the oracle. The oracle being dumb they toss up some objects which we might rudely call dice. If the pieces fall in a favorable position, they are rejoiced, for they know they will be successful in the desired work, whatever it may be; but if they receive an unfavorable answer they are prone to give up whatever they may have had in mind. Their belief about the dead is very peculiar. They think that if they bury a chicken and a pig with the body of the deceased Satan will be satisfied when he has devoured the chicken and the pig, and thus will not hurt the body.

We next entered the Chinese theatre. The room was full of cigar smoke and the noise from the stage was ear-splitting. The seats would scarcely have done justice to a backwoods school house of half a century ago. Most of the audience wore their hats, and not a few sat on the backs of the seats. As is the Chinese custom, no women are permitted to sit with the men in the main auditorium, but are placed back in one corner with lace curtains to shield them from the public gaze. The play was entirely beyond our power of comprehension. We could not even appreciate the music. It sounded very like a serenading crowd which uses exclusively tin pans and cornstalk fiddles. Three or four did all the performing and the rest sat in the rear of the stage playing almost continually a sort of monotonous music. The entire entertainment, which was of a historical character, was given in Chinese. The costumes were of the finest silks and satins. The actors wore feathers in their hats at least four feet long. A striking characteristic of the Chinese is the fact that they scarcely ever smile.

The usual flat in the slum district is from 25 to 35 feet front. They range anywhere from two to ten stories high. The board of health has passed a law that only four families may live on a floor, so if the flat contains seven stories, only twenty-eight families can live in it. That is rather a large number, we think, but they don't think so at all. These buildings are inspected regularly by the Board of Health. If a contagious disease breaks out, the patients are taken to the Hospital and the houses are thoroughly renovated.

One-fourth of one of the floors, which is generally three or four small rooms, if in ordinary condition, will rent for twenty-five dollars per month. Poor apartments will yield eighteen dollars per month. But on Seventh Avenue in a good part of the city, a modern flat can be rented for much less. The poor in the slums are almost eaten up by rents and grocery-bills. They not only have to pay higher rents for poorer apartments but they have to pay more for everything which they buy.

The lodging houses in this part of the city are very inferior but they meet a great need. Rooms are rented for fifteen or twenty cents per night with bath. For sanitary reasons no quilts are allowed to be used, only blankets. To meet the needs of those who have no money nor any place to lodge the Y. M. C. A. gives free to all such, supper, bed and breakfast. They aid them also in securing whatever work they can, all the while ministering to the spiritual needs.

The City Charities have built a public bath house in the midst of the slums where 130,000 baths are taken annually. Furthermore the University Settlement is a wonderful blessing to these poor ones who scarcely see the brightness of life. The aim of this settlement is to supply something that is not furnished by other philanthropic organizations. The building is a large, commodious structure furnished with gymnasium, baths, reading room, club rooms, pawn-shop, and other rooms of convenience. One of the trustees of this settlement is a member of the City Charities so by this means they keep in close touch with the needs of the city. The settlement aids in every way possible in developing the physical, material and social life of the poorer classes. They realize that the poor are the subjects of exploitation and intercede for them. The poor are aided in buying and selling. They are taught to know their rights and to insist upon them. Finally they furnish social rooms in which to meet and thus to counteract the social influence of the saloon.

Probably no more successful institutional work has been done in America than that of Bishop Potter and his seven assistants. In their work they are making the church the center and pointing all hearts to the Master. They hold that religion is a way of life and the highest and best way. The church building is in every sense institutional. A kindergarten school is held daily for the children whose mothers have to work away from home. A nursery is provided for infants while the mothers are working. In the afternoon about 200 women come to the church to earn some money by sewing. Girls and women come to the church and are taught how to cook, wash, iron, sew, and to do all kinds of housework.

In the evenings the boy's club, the men's club and various other organizations meet to play games, to read and to have a general social time. The rooms of the church are brightened with pictures, furnished with all sorts of games and gladdened by the various musical instruments. In fact everything is so attractive that they are not able to accommodate all who desire to come.

Only a short distance from the settlement is the Hebrew Educational Alliance where 5,000 Russian and Roumanian Jews meet daily. Sixty per cent. of the Jews that come to our country settle in New York. They know nothing of the English language. They are ignorant of our institutions and do not know what liberty means.

It is the purpose of this school to meet these needs and to prepare the children for public school. It is gratifying to know how much they really are contributing to heal the breach between the Jews and the Christians.

It was a great pleasure to hear five hundred boys and girls who had been in this country less than seven months sing in good, clear English:

My country 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing,

and then waving the flag they repeated with one voice: To this we pledge our hands, our hearts, our honor.

The Jews being religiously inclined must have a religious tone in all their teaching. The children are exceptionally brilliant and take up new languages and customs very readily. They have a passion for solid reading and care nothing for social life or light reading.

When one sees all that is being done to bear the poor man's burden one cannot but be hopeful. The visions of a conquering church are seen on every hand. May God richly bless all those who are spending their time and talents in helping those less fortunate than they.

"There are hermit souls that live withdrawn
In the place of their self-content;
There are souls like stars that dwell apart,
In a fellowless firmament;
There are pioneer souls that blaze their path
Where highways never ran;
But let me live by the side of the road,
And be a friend of Man."

A Chinaman's Lament.

By W. P. Bentley.

Endless chronicles of old,
Full their history unfold,
Of kings, crowns, and scepters passed away,
Blind with grief and shame we bring
Mad'ning song of woe to sing,
And mourn our noble empire's sure decay.

Sages, statesmen of the land,
In our ancient records stand
As peerless heroes, ranking all the world.
O'er the land, and o'er the sea,
Mountains, rivers, fen and lea,
The Dragon flag, all honored, was unfurled.

Ages passed, and pride and pelf,
With the sordid love of self,
Had robbed our lives of nobleness and power.
Mighty forces from afar,
We could neither use nor bar—
And naught could stay for us the fatal hour.

Going on from bad to worse,
Bringing swiftly curse on curse,
The startled people staring in the gloom.
Nor doth aught their health decree,
As with bated breath they see
Their country rushing madly to its doom.

Proud to herald ancient things,
Learning, laws, and rule of kings,
Not knowing progress' call was wisdom's beck,
Lulled to indolent repose,
Crassest folly, sure it knows—
Behold the ship of state a stranded wreck!

From the West our "wise men" came,
Lauding One of fairest fame—
And all the train of blessings follow on.
Why should we the truth reject?
Fail to honor and respect
The mandates which from heaven forth have gone?

Wise, we shall re-read the past,
And our horoscope re-cast.
We shall redeem the fame we won by toil,
Righteousness regain her seat,
Full, free life in pulses beat,
And heroes spring unbidden from the soil.

Some Great Debates.

By A. B. Jones.

Every important reformation of society is brought about by agitation and discussion of its vital issues. The reformation of the nineteenth century, inaugurated by the Campbells, Thomas and his son Alexander, Walter Scott, B. W. Stone and others, is no exception to the rule. At first these men were averse to debates, but the conditions of society were such, and the importunity of friends so great, as to cause them to forego their own preferences. Alexander Campbell, though at first reluctant to enter the arena, yet afterwards developed within himself both a talent and a taste for oral debates, of which he held about half a dozen, while his writings for more than forty years abound with controversy.

This method of defending and disseminating truth, while tending rather to intensify partisan feeling than to foster broad and charitable Christian sentiment, became somewhat contagious among the Disciples, and many of their prominent men took part in these public oral discussions. Among these may be mentioned the names of Isaac Errett, A. I. Hobbs, John S. Sweeney, L. B. Wilkes and J. B. Briney. These debates were with infidels, spiritualists, Universalists and Pedobaptists. Some of them were published and can be obtained of our publishing houses.

The debates, however, of greatest importance and significance, and most thoroughly typical in their character and lasting in their widespread impression and influence were the three following:

I. The debate of Alexander Campbell with the vaunting infidel, Robert Owen. This debate was held in the city of Cincinnati, O., April, 1829. Mr. Owen was in some respects a remarkable man. He was a man of large affairs and successful in a business way. He was at the same time of benevolent and humanitarian feelings. He conceived the idea that society was all wrongly constructed, that religion was a barrier to human progress and happiness. Religion, marriage and the holding of private property were in his views positive evils. He proposed to reconstruct society by a new "social system" leaving these evils out. He announced twelve fundamental facts or laws as the basis of his "social system," the substance of which was that man is a creature of circumstances—he has no choice about his creation, his parentage, the time or place of his birth, the social, moral or religious influences under which he is brought up—that these and other like conditions tend to mold his views, habits and character and make him what he is; that society properly organized would conduce to his highest and best development and happiness.

Mr. Campbell in a general way admitted his twelve fundamental laws, but argued that they applied to man as an animal only, and would apply equally as well to any other animal—that man is not only an animal but he is endowed with a mental, moral and spiritual nature—can think, feel and will, has reason, conscience and spiritual perception, and can by the use of these powers rise above and control his circumstances. And to further enable him to do this God has made a revelation to him, and given him a religion which is itself a mighty influence, a potent circumstance intended to reconstruct society and secure for man his highest possible intellectual, moral and spiritual development and his supreme happiness.

II. The debate of Alexander Campbell with Bishop John B. Purcell, of the Roman Catholic Church. This discussion was also held in Cincinnati, O., and began on January 13, 1837, continuing seven days. The propositions discussed were the following, Mr. Campbell affirming every one:

1. The Roman Catholic institution, sometimes called the "Holy, Apostolic Catholic Church," is not now, nor was she ever, catholic, apostolic or holy; but is a sect, in the fair import of that word, older than any other sect now existing, not the "mother and mistress of all churches," but an apostasy from the only true, holy, apostolic and catholic Church of Christ.

2. Her notion of apostolic succession is without any foundation in the Bible, in reason, or in fact; an imposition of the most injurious consequences, built upon unscriptural and anti-scriptural traditions, resting wholly upon the opinions of interested and fallible men.

3. She is not uniform in her faith, or united in her members; but mutable and fallible, as any other sect of philosophy or religion—Jewish, Turkish or Christian—a confederation of sects, under a politico-ecclesiastic head.

4. She is the "Babylon" of John, the "man of sin" of Paul, and the empire of the "youngest horn" of Daniel's sea monster.

5. Her notions of purgatory, indulgences, auricular confession, remission of sins, transubstantiation, supererogation, etc., essential elements of her system, are immoral in their tendency and injurious to the well being of society, religious and political.

6. Notwithstanding her pretensions to have given us the Bible and faith in it, we are perfectly independent of her for our knowledge of that book and its evidences of a divine original.

7. The Roman Catholic religion, if infallible and unsusceptible of reformation, as alleged, is essentially anti-American, being opposed to the genius of all free institutions, and positively subversive of them, opposing the general reading of the Scriptures and the diffusion of useful knowledge among the whole community, so essential to liberty and the permanency of good government.

These propositions, so clear, sweeping, and aggressive, indicate at once the nature and character of the debate. It is very unusual for one man to affirm all the propositions in a debate. And Mr. Campbell tried to induce Bishop Purcell to assume the affirmative in some form, but ailing in this he boldly took the lead and made an aggressive fight from beginning to end. The discussion covered a wide field of scriptural and historical investigation, in which both disputants displayed a vast amount of learning and research.

In this debate Mr. Campbell found the most astute and learned opponent he ever encountered; and yet his victory was never more easily won or more pronounced. In the closest and sharpest issue they made, that concerning the toleration of concubinage among the Catholic clergy, as found in the moral theology of St. Ligori, which Mr. Campbell affirmed and Bishop Purcell denied and denounced, over and over again, Mr. Campbell's vindication and triumph were overwhelming.

III. The debate of Alexander Campbell with N. L. Rice, a Presbyterian minister. This debate was held in Lexington, Ky., beginning on Nov. 15, 1843, and lasting for sixteen days. There were three moderators, one selected by each of the disputants and these selected the distinguished Henry Clay as president. The following propositions were discussed:

1. The immersion in water of a proper subject into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit is the one only apostolic or Christian baptism.

2. The infant of a believing parent is a scriptural subject of baptism.

3. Christian baptism is for the remission of past sins.

4. Baptism is to be administered only by a bishop or ordained presbyter.

5. In conversion and sanctification the Spirit of God operates on persons only through the word of truth.

6. Human creeds, as bonds of union and communion, are necessarily heretical and schismatical.

Of these six propositions Mr. Campbell affirmed the first, the third, the fifth and the sixth. Mr. Rice affirmed the second and the fourth.

In affirming that "Christian baptism is for the remission of past sins," Mr. C. did not mean that the heart of the divine Father is closed in unforgiveness toward the penitent, believing sinner, until he is baptized, as some persons have supposed, but that baptism brings to man the "formal assurance" of this divine favor, and is thus for the "plenary remission of sins." And in affirming the fifth proposition—"In conversion and sanctification the Spirit of God operates on persons only through the word of truth," he did not, as is supposed by some, mean that the written word is the only influence that converts and sanctifies men; but that the Holy Spirit is always personally and actively present with the word, using the truth in the conversion of men, and not converting them without a knowledge of the truth. Hence our duty to preach the word always and everywhere that the Spirit may have opportunity to operate and co-operate with us in saving the world. The debate and the whole body of Mr. Campbell's teaching indicate his views to be as we have stated. The arguments employed in this debate were drawn chiefly from the definition of words in Greek lexicons, from the Scriptures and from church history.

These three debates of Alexander Campbell: First, with Mr. Owen against infidelity, and in defense of the Bible and Christianity; second, with Mr. Purcell against Roman Catholicism and in defense of Protestantism; third, with Mr. Rice against sectarianism and denominationalism and in defense of primitive Christianity, are confessedly the "great debates of our Pioneers."

The Chum of Chuffy Waite

By BURRIS A. JENKINS

V.—Alphy's Last Exam.

A well-known incident of camp life in the Confederate Army has been read by all America; but its sequel has never been told. The —th Alabama and the —th Louisiana were encamped together at a bend in the Tennessee river after the fall of Ft. Henry, and had been closely associated throughout the war. They were chummy.

Both regiments had popular chaplains—very rare they are indeed. One of these ministers was called Chaplain "Judge." His old college name had clung to him still. That he ever became a preacher was a matter of surprise to all in the college, except the few who knew him well. He had spent his money freely, "been one of the boys," kept horses, dogs, guns and late hours. Whether he had ever been actually questionable in any of his habits was a disputed point among his acquaintance. Chuffy Waite, now colonel of the —th Alabama, insisted that Judge Storey had always been "straight as a string," but then Chuffy's standards might also be open to question.

"No sir," said the colonel, "Judge always had a streak of piety in him—piety of the right sort. I've noticed it every time we've been together, and never more than when we were out making a night of it. I tell you he's —— religious—always was."

At all events, the boys of the —th Alabama believed in their chaplain and would do anything to please him. During the winter camp a revival of religion swept through certain regiments, when they had nothing else to do, and in the —th Louisiana, the neighbor of Chaplain Storey's regiment, one Sunday many men were being baptized in the Tennessee. The whole regiment and many others were present to watch the chaplain, a "Campbellite," so-called, perform the rite, among them, naturally, certain members of the —th Alabama, friends and rivals of the religious regiment.

The unusual gathering excited comment in all the army, and as the spectators from Col. Waite's regiment were returning, that officer summoned his old friend, Lieutenant Andrew Jackson Putnam Barton, and inquired:

"Lieutenant, what in Sam Hill is going on in the —th Louisiana?"

"A revival, sir," answered the lieutenant, seriously, and evidently much impressed by what he had seen. "About thirty men are being baptized by the chaplain. It is truly remarkable, sir, the serious spirit of the men."

"In the name of the Confederate States! We can't afford to be outdone by the —th Louisiana. Lieutenant, order out forty men for baptism," and the colonel turned into his tent, swearing, and without a smile.*

Lieutenant Barton saluted, reported to his captain and had the company ordered out. Then with the chaplain's permission he addressed them in this strain:

"Men, the colonel has asked for forty of you to perform a service for the honor of the regiment. It is not necessarily dangerous, but it is serious, very serious. I desire volunteers. They should be men whose religious condition is satisfactory, and whose devotion to the colonel, to the regiment and to the sacred honor of their country is beyond question."

*This incident in reality happened in the Federal Army, D. R. Lucas, of the - th Indiana being the chaplain—a minister of the Disciples.

To this remarkable call the whole company responded, and the lieutenant was compelled to select the required two score. Rumors had been heard of Yankee gunboats nosing up the river from Ft. Henry and the men naturally supposed their mission had to do with these.

"Lieutenant," said the captain aside, "are your orders secret? What does the colonel want of the men?"

"O, not at all secret. He wants them baptized."

"Great Scott!"

"Yes, that's it. I will send a man for the chaplain."

There was no use arguing with Alphy Barton or laughing at him. Neither laugh nor argument had weight with him and he moved resolutely toward the river, serious and serene.

The captain made for the colonel's headquarters and narrated the remarkable occurrence. Colonel Waite was convulsed. He laughed so long and so loud that the irritated captain, who knew not Alphy Barton and his ways, thought the devil had got into the colonel, too. At last Waite sobered sufficiently to write a note countermanding the order.

"Quick now, captain. Why, Alphy'll drown the last man of them but he'll obey orders. I'm sorry for Chaplain 'Judge.'"

Certain officers had got wind of the affair, and, waylaying the captain detained him first slyly and at last forcibly, that matters might take their course.

Meanwhile Lieutenant Andrew Barton and Chaplain "Judge" at the head of forty men were making for the river, the chaplain greatly amused and expecting contrary orders at any moment. But no orders came.

The lieutenant was for marching directly into full view of the —th Louisiana, but the chaplain, partly to gain time, partly to avoid a scene, insisted that the waters had been already sufficiently disturbed, and that he wished a clear stream for baptism. So past the pickets they marched and down the river a considerable distance, the chaplain still temporizing and confidently expecting a recall, and the lieutenant growing correspondingly impatient for the work to begin.

"It's getting late, 'Judge,' and forty is a lot of men. If I were only a preacher now to help you—"

The chaplain was getting more and more uneasy, for the dusk was coming on apace. At last, having crossed a neck of land between two points where the stream looped and nearly met, they approached the river bank some miles below camp.

"Be quiet, men," commanded the lieutenant, as jokes began to thicken. The men, supposing they were nearing the dangerous culmination, became silent and walked on tip-toe.

Arrived upon the bank the order was given: "Arms stacked! Coats and shoes off!"

There was silent, swift obedience.

"Let us pray," said the chaplain, as the sweat poured from his face.

And pray he did, as he had not prayed for long; only his uttered prayer was not the full expression of his unuttered thoughts The men were deeply impressed that some terrible peril was upon them and were nerved for any deed.

"Coghlan and Davis, step into the water," commanded the lieutenant; and they obeyed with alacrity.

"I see her, sir!" cried Coghlan, in a half-whisper. "What are we to do, sir?"

"See what?" asked Lieutenant Barton.

"The gun-boat, sir. I can just see her smokestack above the bushes round the bend and her flag at the pole."

Instantly Barton was in the water, shoes and dress uniform and all, beside the men. As sure as the world there she came, a light-draught, stern-wheel scouting gunboat—a very little mosquito she was, indeed—that had been destroying whatever she could find along the shores left by the Confederates in their retreat. She had come a trifle too near to the main camp of the southerners and was now dropping back nearer to her own lines.

"We must get her," whispered the lieutenant. "She's been up almost to camp, I swear. Mighty near a hornet's nest she was! That our scouts haven't found her is a miracle. More luck to us!"

Silently she came; no noise allowed in this dangerous neighborhood. Silently the squad of forty withdrew into the bushes.

"When she comes abreast fire into her. Everything'll be open for air this hot day; and there'll be little armor on her sides and stern; she's too small. Coghlan and Davis, you look to the pilot-house. Martin, Maxwell, Corrigan, do all you can to the engine-room. The rest of you clean the decks. Then throw your guns away and swim for her. She'll not be doing much more than drifting with the current. Chaplain, here's a revolver, sir."

Silent as the grave was the company on the bank. The boat, though she had been prepared for attack, was now all unprepared, since the danger seemed past—when suddenly forty shots swept decks and elevations with destruction, and forty rebel yells burst fearful from forty throats.

Scarce could the fire be returned, and even then only harmlessly—cannons were out of the question in so sudden an attack —ere forty dripping men cleared the few feet between bank and boat, and clambered over the rail. Half carried knives, and half fought with naked hands or found weapons where they might on board.

At the first fire six men had wet the decks with blood; but eight more still remained to be disposed of. All these were so taken by surprise that some, penned in the coal-rooms, some in the galley, some in the cabin, surrendered.

Lieutenant Barton, sword in teeth, had boarded first of all and made his way to the pilot-house, close followed by the chaplain. This gained, he said:

"Here 'Judge,' take the wheel. Old days on the Ohio come in well now. We must get her turned back up stream or we'll be in the Yankee nest soon "

Down he plunged to the engine room, and, his prisoners safely stowed below, placed Coghlan in charge of the machinery.

By ten o'clock the little gun-boat "Stealthy," a mere mosquito, but daring, was landed in the baptismal waters of the —th Louisiana and the —th Alabama. At midnight papers were on their way to headquarters, asking "promotion for Lieutenant Andrew Jackson Putnam Barton, and a medal for Chaplain Storey, for valiant service—religiously performed—in the capture of a Federal scouting gunboat."

* * * * * *

Over a year later—summer of '64—on a famous battlefield, in one of those awful conflicts which taught the world that a giant in commotion was in the west, were present most of the boys of that border college, some on one side, some on the other.

"Gentlemen," said the commanding general of the Confederate forces to his staff, "someone must take that battery or our right wing may go to pieces. It is almost certain death, but if he takes the battery he saves the army."

Half a dozen staff officers shouted "I!"

"Lieutenant-colonel Barton, you may go. Will you take that battery?"

"I'll try, sir," said Alphy, unconsciously quoting that historic phrase.

"Colonel, will you take that battery?" asked the general, loud and stern.

"I'll try, sir," replied Alphy, swallowing hard.

"Colonel, will you take that battery?" fairly roared the general.

"Tell him yes. Don't you see what he wants you to say?" whispered Colonel Waite.

"I'll tell him yes when I've taken it. Not before." Then to the general he replied quietly:

"I'll take it or die, sir."

"Go then, and God help you."

Across that open field with a half regiment they saw him charge, a bit pale, but still serene. The eyes of both armies saw him go. Many knew him; but by all on the Federal side, of course, their old mate, butt of all good-natured fun, the sincere and credulous Alphy Barton, was unrecognized. Through the interchange of shell and shot rushed that gallant charge; through the burning missiles hissing death dashed the forlorn hope.

Up the hill to the breastworks gaping with open, salamander mouths, they charged. Half of them still climbed when the top was reached. A fourth of them scaled the works. All of them melted into nothingness within. The brave young colonel, with a struggling few, stood surrounded within the breastworks.

"Yield, man!" shouted the boys in blue, in admiration.

The answer was a pistol shot into the air.

"Die then, fool," growled a New York river-rat, and ere they could strike up the bayonet Alphy fell dead across a gun.

After the battle, in the truce for the burial of the dead, the old friends, Chuffy Waite and Buck Elmer, Judge Storey and a few others, partly Federals, partly Confederates—national enemies but personal friends—met on the bloody field. It was dark and the little group was gathered about an open grave. By the side of it lay a form wrapped in both flags, Union and Confederate. With the rites due such an officer they laid him away, and above him blue and gray clasped hands and shed soldier's tears.

"Dear old boy," muttered Chuffy. "Always brave; he's gone up for the last exam."

"And he'll get through all right, too," said Buck Elmer.

(THE END.)

Children's Day—Lord's Day, June 2

Facts About Children's Day.

Children's Day was observed first by the Disciples of Christ in 1881. In twenty years the Sunday-schools have contributed for foreign missions $373,080.

In the year 1881, 198 schools sent offerings amounting to $750 in all. Last year 3,260 schools contributed $42,705. There has been a growth every year since the first. In the last seven years the number of contributing schools has been doubled. The contributions have been almost doubled.

Last year in Illinois 397 schools made offerings on children's day; in Ohio, 383; in Indiana, 364; in Iowa, 296; in Missouri, 347; in Kansas, 229; in Kentucky, 182. The Sunday-schools in Ohio gave the largest amount, $7,059.46; the schools of Illinois gave $5,137.58; Indiana, $4,343.48; Iowa, $3,563.53; Missouri, $3,322.30; Kentucky, $2,935.04.

The Sunday-schools have helped to establish our work on heathen soil. They have enabled the society to send men and women to India, Japan, China and Africa. These missionaries have been supported while on the field; suitable buildings have been erected for the work; schools, churches, hospitals, orphanages, dispensaries and homes have been provided. These add immensely to the effectiveness of the work.

In order to have a good Children's Day the exercise ought to be prepared thoroughly in advance. A sense of expectation should be created in the community. They should be given to understand that Children's Day is to be the great day of the year. Parents and friends should be invited to attend the service. Money should be collected for months in advance. The missionary pockets should be filled. The birthday boxes should not be neglected. No pains should be spared to secure the full amount requested. Every school in the land should be on the roll of honor. The one dollar league this year should be larger than ever before.

The schools are asked this year for $50,000 on Children's Day. This is not too much to ask and to expect from such a great host. The present indications are that the amount named will be raised. The children are determined to do their part towards raising the $200,000 for the current year.

The pastors of the churches can help Children's Day very much. They can refer to it in their sermons and prayers. They can preach a sermon appropriate to the occasion. When they are visiting among the people they can impress upon the minds of all with whom they come in contact that Children's Day is worthy of the support of the entire community.

The room in which the exercise is given should be beautifully decorated. June is the time for flowers. These can be had by any school in the land. Flags and mottoes can also be employed. Nothing should be left undone that can add to the interest or to the profit or to the enjoyment of the occasion.

The offering should be forwarded promptly to the mission rooms in Cincinnati. No part of it should be diverted to any other purpose. To do so is to break faith with the children who give the money.

Some Suggestions.

By W. F. Richardson.

Children's Day is coming to be looked forward to with eagerness by the boys and girls of our Sunday-schools as the brightest and happiest day of the year. This is because it is the day when their offerings are made for the work of foreign missions, the most unselfish work which is committed to the church of God. To send to those of distant lands, and of alien race and strange speech, the sweet tidings of a Savior's love is a work that makes the angels of heaven rejoice. To this appeal the hearts of the little ones promptly and cheerfully respond. It is easy to secure liberal gifts from them for this cause. Many sacrifices will they cheerfully make that they may save a goodly sum for this offering. A few suggestions may be useful, as to the best method of making Children's Day one of delightful and spiritual help to old and young.

1. Give it a special service. Do not crowd it into the regular Sunday-school hour, passing it with a brief announcement and a hastily taken collection, satisfied with a few stray pennies and nickels that may be given on the impulse of the moment. Take the Sunday evening hour for the Children's Day exercises. The preacher may well stand aside on that one occasion, to let the little lips speak sweetly for Jesus. He may rest assured that the story of infinite love will lose nothing by being told in their sweet and artless words. This will bring out the older people, too, and enlist them in the sacred cause of the world's evangelization. They will add their offerings to those of the children, and thus the amount of the gift will be increased.

2. Make special preparation for this service. Our Foreign Society will send you the beautiful exercises they have prepared, and the songs, recitations and illustrated exercises will charm and instruct the audience.

3. Have the children, and older ones too, begin saving for that occasion, supplying them with the missionary collection pockets which the Foreign Society will send you, if you write for them. By daily putting aside the small coins that are in their hands, they will have a generous sum to give when the first Sunday in June comes.

4. Announce it every Sunday, and have something said about the work of the foreign missionaries, by someone whose heart is in the work. Let the children see that you are in earnest in the matter, and they will respond gladly. Pray for a glorious day and work for it. If possible have many flowers to adorn the church, and cages of singing birds will often add to the bright and beautiful effect of the floral decorations. Above all, do not neglect to prepare for it because it calls for some trouble and work. Nothing good is accomplished without effort, and nothing better than a happy Children's Day and a large offering can be brought about by any church and Sunday-school.

Children's Day Blessings.

Children's Day is a great boon to the Sunday-school observing it. It enables the members to lift up their eyes upon the heathen field and to consider the vast difference between the people who know not God and those who do know and serve him.

It is educational as well as benevolent. It should be a special time for instruction. The love which Jesus bore and still bears to the world should be impressed. If we have fellowship with him, possess his spirit, we will desire to co-operate with him in saving the whole race.

When men now past forty were children, there was no children's day. The pitiful state of heathen children and women was not declared. The deplorable condition of heathen was a secret unknown. The power of the gospel and the will of God to save the millions of pagans on earth were not realized. Now men believe God is able and willing to save all the heathen who will receive the gospel and that we Christians are not true to our Lord and his commandment if we do not send the gospel or take it into all the world and deliver it to every creature.

Children's day should be made a bright, cheerful, grateful occasion—for the Lord hath done great things for us and our children. The offering of hearts and lives, as well as the gift of money, should characterize the day. Every boy and girl should be led to give from a loving desire to give. Every teacher should bring the cause of heathen missions tenderly home to his or her class. Every superintendent has an opportunity to stimulate in his school the most Christlike benevolence. While the offering should be large if possible, it is even more important for it to be announced, urged, fostered and made in the spirit of Christ. The minister should add his influence in making children's day, the offering and all the exercises connected with the day delightful and permanently helpful. In short, every Sunday-school should obtain great spiritual benefit from the observance.

"I Love You."

Once on returning home from calling we found scrawled with crayon on our doorstep the following words:

"I love you. Neva."
"I love you. Vivian."

Neva and Vivian were two little girls who lived across the street from us. No expression of affection was ever more appreciated by us than this. And by little acts of thoughtfulness and self-sacrifice they were always proving that they loved us.

There are few, if any, children who do not love Jesus with all their hearts. They naturally desire to tell him so in recitation and song, and to prove their love by bringing their offerings to him. And I am sure no one ever receives their love with such appreciation as Jesus does. It is the business of the church to give the little ones the opportunity to show their love. Let us remember that the first Sunday in June is Children's Day. Let us aid them in giving full expression to their love for Jesus.

Current Literature.

Whatever stimulates interest in Bible study and gives intelligent direction as to how this study may be pursued with the best results, deserves the highest commendation. It is not too much to say of Prof. Lockhart's Principles of Interpretation that it is well calculated to accomplish both these results. The Professor has written with a clearness and cogency that leaves little to be desired. The work is marked by that "good judgment and sound common sense" without which, as the author states, no axioms and rules of interpretation will be of any avail. The first chapter is devoted to "The Value of Laws of Interpretation." This is followed by the "Axioms of Hermeneutics," of which fifteen are specified, together with the underlying principles on which they are based. After this comes Rules of Interpretation, of which fifty-two are given. The necessity for these rules is first clearly pointed out, and then the principle is applied to one or more passages of Scripture and from these the rule is deduced. One of the most profitable features of the book is the application of these principles to many difficult passages of Scripture, with very satisfactory results in the way of interpretation. Any Bible student will be interested in and profited by these rules and their practical illustrations. The closing chapters deal with methods of biblical study such as "Interpretations of Whole Books" and "The Interpretation of the Bible as a Whole." The book is indexed textually and topically besides the general table of contents.

Prof. Lockhart has embodied in this little volume the best results of study in the field of biblical interpetation, and has produced a work of substantial value which should receive recognition not only at the hands of his brethren but from all who are deeply interested in Bible study. (Index Publishing Co., Des Moines, Ia. For sale by Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis. $1.25.)

When one applies to a piece of fiction the adjective "powerful," it is generally understood to mean that the story is told with skill and the characters depicted with skill and insight, but that there is something unpleasant about it. A "powerful" novel always deals with a sin; it is, like the old Greek tragedy, a study of the consequences of transgression. Hornung's Peccavi is a powerful story. An English clergyman has committed a great sin, one for which, in the nature of the case, he could not atone to the injured one. His parishioners unanimously turn against him and no man will speak to him or look at him. He moves among the living as one dead. His church is burned down by an enemy and the crime is imputed to him. For five years, the period of his suspension by the church court, he works with his own hands to restore the building, and the heart of the story lies in the workings of his conscience during those years of drudgery. At last the tide of public opinion turns in his favor, but he is still as humble and penitent for his sin as he was. The church has been rebuilt. The bishop has come to consecrate it. The night before this great day, which was to mark his complete reinstatement in his ministerial office and in the hearts of his people, the church is again burnt by the same incendiary who had committed the crime before and Robert Carlton, the clergyman who had sinned and had won forgiveness from all but himself, met his death in the flames in a vain attempt to save the incendiary from the consequences of his own crime. The author of the "Amateur Cracksman" stories could not write such a story without filling it with striking and dramatic situations, but the greatest skill is displayed in the fine touches which depict the workings of the conscience of a penitent sinner who is forced to defend himself against many false accusations.

We do not read sermons much nowadays, and indeed the average congregation gives the preacher very little encouragement toward writing sermons. Nevertheless it is good for the preacher to write, occasionally at least, as well as speak; and it is good for the people to read as well as hear. A new book of sermons entitled The Unaccountable Man is by Dr. David J. Burrell, the widely known pastor of the Collegiate Church in New York City. The volume takes its title from the first sermon, which strikes the keynote of the whole collection. "The church has made an historic blunder in addressing herself so exclusively to dogmatic apologetics rather than to the personal Christ. . . . The question of questions is not 'What think ye of Christianity?' but 'What think ye of Christ?'" The sermons are simple and obvious in their construction, the framework sometimes showing through to a degree which amounts almost to academic formality, but their warmth of tone and richness of substance speedily remove any unpleasant impression which this circumstance might create. These are sermons the reading of which will help to cutivate the sermon reading habit. (Revell. $1.50.)

One of the most remarkable recent books dealing with religious experience is With Christ at Sea, a personal record of religious experience on board ship for fifteen years, by Frank T. Bullen. It is remarkable for two things: first, it is written in a literary style which will win friends and readers even among those who are not naturally predisposed to the reading of religious books; and second, it is without any taint or flavor of goody-goodiness. Mr. Bullen has written books before, strong, stirring sea tales, which have found wide acceptance with the reading public. His "Cruise of the Cachalot," which appeared a year or two ago, was rightly praised as one of the most virile and vivid of all modern stories of the sea. The writer believes profoundly in the efficacy of prayer and in the power of the gospel to transform the life of even the toughest sailor. It is worth while to read what such a man may have to say about his religious experiences on the deep. (Frederick A. Stokes Co., New York. $1.50.)

An artistic booklet of eighty pages entitled In and About Mahoba, has been issued by Miss Mary Graybiel, and will be read with deep interest wherever there is an interest in Christian missions, or the possibility of such an interest. It consists largely of illustrations which, in connection with the well written descriptive text, form a vivid and pleasing presentation of the field and the missionary work which is being done there. The author has wisely avoided every semblance of an appeal, and allows the facts to tell their own story. We bespeak for this little work a wide reading. It will tell you more things which you want to know about this section of India, and will tell them in a more attractive manner, than many a larger and more expensive book. (Address Miss Mary Graybiel, 1 Pearl Place, Buffalo, N. Y. 50 cents.)

It is a somewhat novel experiment to put a Bible dictionary in vest-pocket form, but the experiment is successfully carried out in the Holman Vest-Pocket Pronouncing Bible Dictionary. It contains 5,000 subjects. The definitions are accurate and concise, and the pronunciation and meaning of all proper names are given. A book of this size cannot, of course, attempt to be a biblical encyclopedia, as the larger so-called Bible dictionaries are, but confines itself to definitions and condensed statements of fact. (A. H. Holman & Co., Philadelphia. Morocco, 36c.)

For a statement of the distinctive tenets of the Baptist denomination, one cannot do better than to read the series of articles by eminent Baptists, recently issued in a volume entitled Baptist Principles Reset. More than half of the contents is from the pen of the late Jeremiah B. Jeter, who maintains a conservative position which doubtless accords with the view of a majority of the denomination, but would not be endorsed at all points by the more progressive leaders. Wouldn't Sell It.

Her Pure and Clear Complexion Not For Sale.

A Cornell girl was put on a Grape-Nuts diet and discovered some facts. She says: "While a student at Cornell I suffered from improper diet. The banquets and other social functions—with their rich refreshments—served to completely upset a stomach already weak from rich pastry, highly seasoned meats, and confections furnished by loving parents at home.

I became irritable, nervous, and my appetite became more and more capricious. Only rich, highly seasoned food suited me, and this further wrecked my health. I was sallow, having lost my pink and white complexion. I became dull eyed and dull brained, the victim of agonizing dyspepsia and intestinal trouble.

I was finally forced to leave school and came home an irritable, wretchedly sick girl. The plainest food disagreed with me, and I bade fair to starve to death, when a physician advised my physician to put me on Grape-Nuts Food diet. To make a long story short, the transformation from wretched ill health to good health was marvelous. I liked the new food so well, and it agreed with my tortured stomach perfectly, regulated my bowels, my headaches left, and the color of the skin gradually grew better. In 8 months I found myself rosy, plump and strong.

I would not sell my clear complexion, bright eyes and general good feeling for the costliest, richest mess of Delmonican pottage.

I returned to Cornell, finished my course, and can now study, think and live. The food that enabled me to regain my health I shall never forget." Name furnished by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., at Battle Creek, Mich.

Our Budget.

—You will not forget Children's Day, June 2.

—Make it the brightest and best day of all the year for the young folks.

—The Missouri Sunday-school Convention, Sedalia, June 10-13, is an event of prime interest to all the Sunday-school workers of the state. These conventions reach back in a long succession of inspiring gatherings which have been sources of power in the state. We are still waiting for the revised and corrected program. Hope to receive it by next week. Meanwhile remember the time, and get ready to go.

—The Central Board of the Christian churches of St. Louis held another meeting on Thursday evening of last week, adopted its constitution and by-laws, appointed various important committees, and laid out much work for the future Its next meeting will be on the first Thursday evening in June. St. Louis Disciples are getting to touch elbows and feel each others' heart-beats as they close up their ranks for a forward, aggressive movement.

—At such a time as this no Disciple of Christ should be found, in the language of Browning, with "the ungirt loin and the unlit lamp." It is a time for action, and it is a time when every one who has any light should let it shine for the benefit of his fellowmen. Preparation should be the watchword of the hour—preparation to meet life's great exigencies as they arise, and to enter the doors of opportunity which God may open for us. The difference between success and failure is the difference between being prepared and being unprepared to meet the demands that are made upon us.

—The prospect for the Foreign Society's reaching two hundred thousand dollars grows brighter. Two generous gifts have just been received, a direct gift of $1,000, and $1,500 on the annuity plan. We must reach the two hundred thousand before Sept. 30, and to do this a gain of about $15,000 must be made in the next four months. The gain in the Home Missionary offering for the second week is only $382.12. It should be much larger. The total receipts for the second week of the May offering this year were $3,805.70. It is not yet too late to take the collection if your church has not done so.

—The twenty-seventh annual meeting of the South Kentucky Christian Missionary and Sunday-school Association will be held at Owensboro, Ky., May 28-30. Reports and business will occupy a considerable part of each session, but the following addresses may be mentioned: "Our Heritage," E. J. Willis, general evangelist; "Christ's Method of Drawing Men to Him," W. E. Mobley; "Woman's Debt to Missions." Mrs. A. M. Harrison; "The Sunday-school—Its Scope, Teachers and Needs," Philip F. King; "Sunday-school Attendance," F. A. Jordan; "Training Teachers," I. H. Teel; "Bringing the Pupils into the Church," W. B. Wright; "Ministerial Relief," A. L. Orcutt; "The Country Preacher," W. H. Moore.

—The annual convention of the Southern Illinois Ministerial Association will be held in Cairo, July 22-26. The entire convention will be devoted to an examination of the principal points of our plea and of the problems raised by it at the present time: The fundamental principles upon which New Testament restoration is attempted; Is it a practicable work? Are its ideas new? Is a re statement needed? Can there be progress in using them? In what sense is the Bible our creed more than that of other bodies, and how does our practice differ from that of others in regard to the use of the creed? What is the meaning, scope and application of "Where the Bible speaks we speak, where the Bible is silent we are silent"? What should be our relation to other religious bodies? To what extent can we work with them? This program has an advantage in its unity and coherence, and the discussion of these closely connected topics will doubtless be of great benefit to those who attend.

—O. P. Wright, of Shelbyville, Ill., and Prof. Isaac N. Jett, of Raymond, former students at Eureka College, were ordained to the ministry by Dr. A. M. Collins at Raymond, May 12. They are promising young preachers, says Dr. Collins, and the brotherhood will hear from them.

—We learn with regret that, owing to the illness of Mrs. J. B. Jones, the jubilee in connection with the commencement of William Woods College, as announced last week, will not be held. The other parts of the program will be carried out according to the announcement.

—Gilbert J. Ellis, secretary of the central district of Iowa, announces that the convention of that district will be held with the church at Pleasantville, May 27-29. The churches and C. W. B. M. auxiliaries of the district should all be represented. The best speakers procurable will be present and a good convention is assured.

—Albert Buxton, of Norfolk, Va., is preparing a book of devotions and will send a copy free to any one who will aid him by suggesting selections from the Psalms or any regular hymn-book as follows: Twenty indispensable hymns and five Psalms; all hymns and Psalms that would be often used; hymns that might be occasionally used.

—Guy B. Williamson, of this city, and Miss Beatrice Harney, of Waverly, Ill., were married at the latter place by Paul H. Castle, of Centralia, on May 15. The bride was ordained to the ministry by Bro. W. W. Weedon, so that she becomes an assistant to her husband in religious work. They go to Fertile, Ia., where they will assist B. F. Hill, of California, Mo, in holding a meeting. Our good wishes go with the happy couple as they enter so joyfully the (to them) untried state of matrimony and of united service.

—The Church of Christ at Canton, Ill., celebrated its tenth anniversary on May 19. After some heroic but unsuccessful attempts to organize during the preceding twelve years, the present congregation was organized in 1891 with a meeting by T. A. Boyer, in which there were more than 300 conversions. The present membership is about 400. J. P. Lichtenberger, now at Buffalo, N. Y., was succeeded in the pastorate in 1899 by S. H. Zendt.

—We gave notice last week of the commencement exercises of William Woods College, Fulton, Mo. The occasion this year will be fraught with special interest in view of the rejuvenation of that institution by the payment of its indebtedness, by its new name and by the new and wider door of opportunity which opens before it. J. B. Jones, the president, deserves special credit for the fidelity with which he has stood by this institution through its days of darkness until the dawning light of a new era of prosperity.

The Stimulus of Pure Blood

That is what is required by every organ of the body, for the proper performance of its functions.

It prevents biliousness, dyspepsia, constipation, kidney complaint, rheumatism, catarrh, nervousness, weakness, faintness, pimples, blotches, and all cutaneous eruptions.

It perfects all the vital processes.

W. P. Keeton, Woodstock, Ala., took Hood's Sarsaparilla to make his blood pure. He writes that he had not felt well but tired for some time. Before he had finished the first bottle of this medicine he felt better and when he had taken the second was like another man—free from that tired feeling and able to do his work.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Promises to cure and keeps the promise. Accept no substitute, but get Hood's today.

—H. W. Dill, a young minister, unmarried, with good references, would like to locate with some western church. He may be addressed at 320 North 18th Street, Terre Haute, Ind.

—D. B. Titus has begun work with the church at Anita, Ia., and will soon move to that point. The former pastor, F. F. Walters, who was compelled to leave Iowa on account of his health, is now at Salida, Col.

—J. H. Fuller, pastor of the Christian Church at Eureka Springs, Ark., delivered the address to the graduates of the High School at that place on the 13th inst., and judging from the extract in a paper sent us it was worthy of the occasion.

—The University of Pennsylvania is about to erect a new laboratory of medicine which will probably be the most extensive, expensive and complete building of the kind in the world. The event is of particular significance as it will give to the oldest medical school in this country the most perfect equipment.

—A minister of education and character, whose name and address we will be glad to give on application, writes to the editor of this paper as follows:

"I want a staid church in Kansas or Missouri where the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is taken and read, and which is able to pay about $500 per year, where I can settle down, raise chickens and have a horse and cow. Do you know of such a place?"

We do not have in mind a place that is vacant, but we think it probable that some of our readers do, and we insert the inquiry here for the purpose of putting this party in correspondence with such a church. He desires the privilege of setting hens while he is setting in order the other things that are wanting. Give him a chance.

—For the week ending May 15th the receipts for foreign missions amounted to $2,471.95; a gain of $491.70 over the corresponding time last year.

—J. M. Lowe, who is at present at Boulder, Col., says he can put a churchless preacher in communication with an Iowa church paying $600 a year.

—We call attention to the statement concerning Cotner University which appears elsewhere. It is not much that Cotner asks and even a little given here will secure relatively large results. The institution deserves confidence and substantial support.

—The Church of Christ at Gillespie, Ill., was dedicated May 19, by George F. Hall. A large audience was present and more than enough money was raised. There were five additions to the church on dedication day. The work is prospering under the able ministrations of John G. M. Luttenberger.

—Charles S Earley has resigned the pastorate of the Central Christian Church at Pueblo, Col., to enter the University of Chicago. The church has paid the debt which has hung over it for several years and is in a prosperous condition. There have been additions every Sunday recently. A strong man should be located in this field.

—Christian College, Columbia, will have its annual commencement exercises next week. The baccalaureate sermon for the graduating class will be preached in the Christian Church next Lord's day by the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. This institution is closing up an exceptionally prosperous session, and bids fair, under its present able management, to take its place among the few high grade schools for the education of young women.

—The Central Baptist, of this city, has a very courteous and complimentary notice of Bro. Jones' book on "The Spiritual Side of Our Plea." The editor does not accept the position of its author that baptism is for the remission of sins in any sense, or that it is a formal pledge of forgiveness, but he recognizes the spiritual tone of the book and believes it will do good. Baptists and Disciples can look their differences in the face much more fraternally now than formerly.

—The Church Extension Board received some large gifts last month: $5,000 from the estate of John W. Cassell of Hopedale, O.; $1,347.69 from the estate of Dr. Gerould, of Cleveland and an annuity of $3,000 from Nicholas J. Wirebaugh, of Prairie Depot, O. The total receipts for April were nearly $10,000, a gain of more than $1,600 over last year. The total amount of the Extension Fund on May 1, was $292,754.71.

—The members of the Church of Christ at Williamsville, N. Y., a suburban town three and a half miles northeast of Buffalo, have made arrangements to entertain 500 Pan-American visitors and have fixed their rate at $1 a day for lodging and breakfast. Williamsville is a town of broad lawns, shady trees, good water and beautiful scenery, and is connected with Buffalo by electric railway; thirty-five minutes' ride to the exposition grounds; good church privileges and free access to the famous Blocher Mineral Springs and park. Address E. C. Irvin, Williamsville, N. Y.

—That was a true note sounded by Moderator Minton in his opening sermon at the Presbyterian General Assembly last Lord's day:

God forbid that I should say an ill word against our public school system, the safeguard of our nation, but is the educational machinery subsidiary to the only worthy end of fashioning character? Have we, so morbidly afraid of uniting church with state, gone so far as to disunite God with state? This is a most serious question. The faith of our sons and daughters is involved and the kingdom of God in our country is involved. It is not an organized skepticism that threatens, but a God-forgotten secularism.

—J. W. Lowber, of Austin, Tex., will preach the commencement sermon at the Texas State Normal College.

—Mokane, Mo., May 19.—The union church of the Christian and Baptist congregations at Dixie, ten miles northwest of this city, was dedicated to-day. Fully 2,000 people were present and about $800 was raised, this being the entire amount remaining due.—Special dispatch in daily press.

And yet there are those who deny that there are any signs of the millennium!

—Dr. Pearson, the Chicago millionaire, who passed through this city toward the southwest recently, has returned, and in an interview said to a reporter:

"I came back from the west with my mind made up. I have drawn a chalk line north and south through Chicago, and I shall never go east of that line. I have not forgotten Chicago, and I am going to do something handsome for the city before long. I have my plans all laid now. After I saw those tall, clear-eyed young fellows out in Missouri, I made up my mind where the rest of my money should go."

There is something for the "effete" regions east of the Alleghanies to ponder over. They have too long looked down upon the imperial commonwealth of Missouri, with its "tall, clear-eyed young fellows." But here is a clear-eyed man of capital, who has been among us and has learned where to invest his money to insure the best returns in a high type of manhood.

—The following extract from the Post Dispatch of this city, touching matters ecclesiastical, shows that certain bad habits and evil tendencies are not confined, unfortunately, to any one religious body:

In the course of a sermon last Sunday, Rev. Dr. Babbitt, of the Church of the Epiphany, made some frank statements in answer to the question: What is the matter with the churches?

He declared that "when a parish is vacant candidates are pitted against each other as rivals, point by point, as to their hair, eyes, teeth, age, education; as to having or not having private means; as to social standing, probable acceptability to the pew-renter with the longest purse or greatest social prestige, while all questions as to spiritual power or lofty character are regarded as almost irrelevant."

This is most extraordinary, but to cap the climax, the reverend rhetorician winds up his indictment thus: "And along with this is the craze for divinity neophytes just fresh from their teens, and their New Testaments to take the place of honorable, learned men, whose chief fault is that they are '40 and have a family.'"

Think of it—40 and a family. If men are superannuated at 40 and disqualified by the possession of a family, the fund for aged ministers will have to be increased.

But perhaps Dr. Babbitt is mistaken.

A New Experiment in Journalism.

The Christian Century is about to adopt a new departure in religious journalism. Its aim is to reach a constituency not ordinarily reached by any of the papers devoted to the principles of what we are in the habit of calling the current reformation. To do this the paper proposes to associate with it two able and widely-known men of the Congregational body, namely: Professor W. Douglas MacKenzie, of Chicago Theological Seminary, and Dr. James M. Campbell, of Lombard, a suburb of Chicago. The details of the plan are thus stated in last week's Century:

The attitude of the paper will remain unchanged. The same vital elements of Christian truth which have been emphasized heretofore will be kept at the front. At the same time larger attention will be given to the work of all the churches, and contributions from leading men in the Christian world will appear from time to time. Two editions of the paper will be issued, one continuing, as at present, to devote a suitable amount of space to our own church news, and the other for circulation among those outside of our own ranks whose interest we hope to enlist in the principles for whose advocacy we stand. From this latter edition the less important news features of our own work will be omitted. In other respects the two editions will be alike. In this work, which involves not a little courage and sacrifice, we confidently count upon the sympathy and support of our present constituency, by whose appreciation our hands have been strengthened in the past. Our one aim in this new movement is the glory of our common Lord and Master.

The end which is aimed at in this arrangement is altogether praiseworthy. It has been a matter of common regret that we are reaching so few comparatively outside of the ranks of our own membership with the plea we are making for Christian union. We are thus depriving others of what is true and valuable in our plea, and ourselves of the benefit that would come from a fraternal comparison of views with those who have different points of view. It will require experience to test whether the plan of publishing two editions of a paper is the best way to reach the end in view. Our own idea has been different from that It has been our ideal towards which we are striving to make a religious journal so loyal to the spirit and teaching of Jesus Christ as to commend it to those of every religious body seeking the truth, and to print in it, as we have been doing the present year, in larger measure than ever before, communications from eminent writers of various denominations, desiring our readers to have the benefit of their view of things as well as to give others the benefit of our plea for union and for the Christianity of Christ.

We shall watch the new experiment with interest and with the hope that it may result in a freer interchange of thought among brethren of different names and a closer unity among the people of God.

Kidney and Bladder Troubles Promptly Cured.

A Sample Bottle Sent FREE by Mail.

Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the wonderful new discovery in medical science, fulfills every wish in promptly curing kidney, bladder and uric acid troubles, rheumatism and pain in the back. It corrects inability to hold water and scalding pain in passing it, or bad effects following the use of liquor, wine or beer, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to go often during the day and to get up many times during the night. The mild and the extraordinary effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases.

Swamp-Root is not recommended for everything, but if you have kidney, liver, bladder or uric acid trouble you will find it just the remedy you need.

If you need a medicine you should have the best. Sold by druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes. You may have a sample bottle of this wonderful new discovery and a book that tells all about it and its great cures, both sent absolutely free by mail. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. When writing, mention that you read this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Correspondence.

New York Letter.

The Rev. Mr. Harcoat, of the People's M. E. Church, in Reading, Pa., recently preached a sermon on "The Minister in the Sick Room" in which he said the preachers should be kept out of the chamber of the sick altogether, because the long-faced sepulchral-voiced Christian in the sick room means almost certain death to the patient. The sick room, said he, is not the place to prepare for death, but the preacher calls on the sick, heaves a deep sigh, feels the pulse of the sufferer and says, "Let us pray." Such a dose of professional ministration is enough to make a well man sick. No one has a right to extort a confession from the sick, or a promise to reform, for in their condition they are not able to defend themselves against any one. The preacher further said the way many preachers deal with the condemned criminal is a burning disgrace to the Christian religion and it does bring the teaching of Christ into contempt. Character is not made by a few puffs of breath we call prayer—and it is character alone that tells here and hereafter. The preacher said too many ministers are given to taking advantage of a man in the hour of weakness, when he is unable to defend himself. This, however, does not touch the real difficulty of the minister's dealing with the afflicted family, as it seems to me. More harm is done by the preacher's making extravagant and false statements at the funeral service than in the sick room. But most preachers endeavor to be honest with the afflicted and the suffering, while they also try to express words of cheer and comfort. And after all, the hearts of the people turn to the preacher of the gospel in their distress, more than to any one else, simply because they look upon the minister of the Christian faith as in some sense the representative of Christ, the source of their consolation and their hope.

The Rev. Lyman Abbott in his recent discourse to the graduating class at Yale Divinity School said, "The papers tell us that the minister of to-day must shorten his sermons; that the churches must have good circulating libraries; that good music must be provided; free stereopticon lectures must be provided; smoking rooms for the men members of the church must open out of the vestry, if we would bring people into the church. Let us have all these things if necessary, but let us remember that it is not these things that the people go to church to seek; but they do go to learn more about God than the men about them. People are seeking a life of love and peace, and the minister to succeed must give it to them." But dealing with the theological side of his discourse Dr. Abbott said, "What difference does it make whether Jesus was raised from the dead 2,000 years ago or not? What we want to know is that he is in New Haven to night as he was in Capernaum; that he is a living factor among us, that he is as certainly among us in this church at this moment as he was with his disciples in Palestine." Again he says, 'I sometimes wonder if I really believe in the incarnation or not, or if the church ever truly believed in it, and I often doubt both. Yet it is easier to believe that God could have done such a thing than to believe that man could have imagined it. And as I grow older I disbelieve more and more in mere doctrinal discussions." It does not seem to me that this sermon would feed the faith of the young men who are starting out to preach the gospel of the Son of God. The story of the New Testament is true or it is false. If it is true, those set apart to proclaim it should do it with all their strength. It should be set forth in all the simplicity and beauty of the sacred story. If it is false it should be discarded as such and no man should be asked to accept the claims of Christ. It is the spirit of anti-Christ that says that Jesus Christ has not come in the flesh. To doubt this is to doubt one of the fundamentals of the Christian revelation.

The new church at East Orange, New Jersey, was dedicated to Christ on Lord's day, May 5. The cost of the chapel was about $2,100, and most of this was provided for. There are only about 23 members of the new congregation, but they are wide-awake and aggressive. They have really accomplished wonders in the building up of this new work. Bro. R. P. Shepherd is the pastor. He is sustained by the American Christian Missionary Society and the lot on which the chapel stands was bought by the Church Extension Society. Thus the national boards of missions are helping to plant the cause of Christ in this needy field. The outlook for this new congregation is bright with promise. Within a few years we expect to see a strong, self-supporting church at this place. We should plan to inaugurate the work at some other of New York's great suburbs as soon as possible.

At a recent anniversary celebration of the Men's Bible-class at the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., the leader of the class, prevailed upon his father to speak to the men. In his address the multi-millionaire told the men how he began when he was 14 or 15 years of age asking people to give so much per week to the church—15 or 20 cents per Sunday to pay off a church debt. He said it has always been his plan to give so as to make others give also. He then said: "Is it right to put your name down when you make a gift? Do you do that or do you write 'A Friend?' I never give money unless I know to what it is to be devoted. I believe that neither you nor I ought to give money unless we know all about the object. And then if we know that, I believe that we ought to indorse it and so influence others to give. Suppose you write 'A Friend,' curiosity is piqued, we all ask and presently find out who the giver is and then all is over; we care no more about it. I say: Do not give unless you know all about the object, and if you do give, put your name down for the purpose of influencing others.

"Are we not receiving all the time, from the rising to the setting of the sun? Not necessarily money, but information, wisdom, whatever it may be? And are you giving it out? Even if it be only a pleasant word, even only a 'God bless you.' I believe that these little exchanges are of the greatest value, greater than money, in the church, in the state, anywhere."

Old Soakers.

Get Saturated With Caffeine.

When a person has used coffee for a number of years and gradually declined in health, it is time the coffee should be left off in order to see whether or not that has been the cause of the trouble.

A lady in Huntsville, Ala., Mrs. S. M. Brazier, says she used coffee for about 40 years, and for the past 20 years was troubled with stomach trouble. "I have been treated by many physicians, but all in vain. Everything failed to perfect a cure. Was prostrated for some time and came near dying. When I recovered sufficiently to partake of food and drink I tried coffee again and it soured on my stomach.

I finally concluded coffee was the cause of my troubles and stopped using it. I tried tea and then milk in its place, but neither agreed with me, then I commenced using Postum Food Coffee. I had it properly made and it was very pleasing to the taste.

I have now used it four months and my health is so greatly improved that I can eat almost anything I want and can sleep well, whereas, before, I suffered for years with insomnia.

I have found the cause of my troubles and a way to get rid of them. You can depend upon it I appreciate Postum."

Texas Letter.

President McKinley in his tour of our country has been enthusiastically received by the South. This is not because we agree with him politically, but because he is our president, and we honor him because of the high place which he occupies. And we hope that this reception will help to fill with frogs the throats of some croakers who live north of of Mason and Dixon's line.

J. N. Crutcher leaves Paris for the pastorate of the Compton Heights Church, St. Louis, and we much regret to lose him. He is a bright young man with the best blood in his veins, and there is every indication of a splendid future. Texas wishes him well in his new work.

S. D. Perkinson is pushing the work at Temple. The Sunday-school is fine, the Endeavorers have adopted two orphans in India, and a new house is one of the certainties of the near future.

Polk C. Webb has just closed a meeting in Cleveland, where he organized a church and a new house is now in process of erection.

C. McPherson, of the First Church of Ft. Worth, is preaching a series of sermons on Acts. This is good news and worthy of general imitation by our preachers.

The annual convention of the Woman's Federation of Clubs recently closed its sessions in this city. It was largely attended and very interesting. The growth has been satisfactory. There are 132 clubs with 3,000 members. The exchequer had $415 in it. The most exciting and interesting session was when the new officers were elected. There were three popular candidates and their friends were active. The first ballot failed to elect. The second was an eye-opener. When the vote was counted the President with much feeling arose and said, "Ladies, ladies, we have too many votes!" and without announcing it, ordered another vote. This showed that in some things at least, some women are no better than men. Stuffing the ballot box is no longer monopolized by the male politicians.

J. B. Sweeney's European trip, delayed about a year, will begin in February. Several will go with him. The time is three months and the program includes the Holy Land If you wish to join the party, write Bro. Sweeney at Gainesville.

The Courier is out on better paper this week. We note with pleasure this evidence of prosperity and trust that it may constantly grow in favor till it has the support of all the people in this territory.

Dr. Buckner, our Ennis pastor, it is said, thinks of returning to Kentucky. This is to be regretted. The work at Ennis, for a long while hindered by local causes, has prospered under the care of Bro. Buckner, and it is now said to be full of promise.

Geo. W. Carroll has been fortunate in his oil investments at Beaumont, and he has shown his gratitude in a gift of $60,000 to Baylor University, the largest Baptist school of the state. How we wish some of our brethren who are making money in that same field would help Add-Ran University.

This is our last opportunity to speak of the State Missionary Convention in Waco, June 5-10. It can and should be a great convention. If our preachers will bestir themselves the churches will be stirred and many will attend and it will be great. But if they are indifferent the churches will be indifferent and it will be a small affair. Will not every one of us do what he can to make it what it should be? Pray and work for it, and God will bless you in your work. Send your name to Addison Clark and a home will be prepared for you. M. M DAVIS.

Kansas City Letter.

Kansas City has recently registered a notable triumph for law and decency. Oddly enough this victory comes through the visit to our city of the reputed law-breaker, Mrs. Nation. Cyclonic is this Kansas product and certainly along eccentric lines moves this new reformer, but set it down always that where Mrs. Nation is and where she goes something happens. This feminine John the Baptist, with all her idiosyncrasies, brings things to pass. Wherever she goes there is the inevitable aftermath of result. Something is done. Six weeks ago she came to Kansas City. Of her turbulent visit, arrest and disgraceful trial the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST doubtless know. Rudely was she thrust across the state line and the saloonists chuckled over their victory. But quite premature was their gratulation. The conscience of our people, long sleeping, was aroused by this outrage, and a great angry tide of public indignation swept over the city. "The saloonists are law-breakers," was the cry. "They violate the law in every way and every day. They sell liquor to minors, to drunkards, and on Sundays fling wide open their doors without sense of shame. The saloonists must obey the law." The preachers waked up, the churches waked up, the business men waked up and through the overmastering impulse newly born the police commissioners, responding to public opinion, issued a Sunday closing order and for two Sundays now the saloons have been closed as tight as drums. It was not to be supposed however that the liquor interests would give way without a struggle. The opponents of Sunday closing have organized themselves into a "Liberal League," composed in the main of brewers, saloonists and their agents, and are protesting against what they term the "blue laws" and swearing right and left against the "preachers" and "temperance cranks." But the law-abiding citizens are not asleep. The Law and Order League has been organized in a business-like way and proposes to fight this fight to a finish. The temperance people here without regard to party are disappointed in Governor Dockery. They were counting on his help, and yet, in an interview while recently in our city, when asked as to his personal opinion on the subject, he declared that he did not care to express an opinion, and bade the reporter assure the people that he never had expressed an opinion in the matter. Governor Dockery is doubtless an able executive and a Christian gentleman, but we miss sadly here the note of manly conviction. How enfeebling and emasculating is this game of politics and good men are found with their ears to the ground listening for the voices of the majority rather than standing erect, looking skyward, listening for the voice of God.

The First Church has adopted the "omnibus" plan in its missionary offerings. The pastor, W. F. Richardson, reports the results thus far satisfactory, but is not ready as yet to give the plan his unqualified endorsement.

The Sixth and Prospect Avenue Church recently enjoyed a visit from W. F. Cowden. His was one of the most telling addresses we have ever heard I say "we"—the congregation worshiping there. Home missions so grew upon us in his magnificent presentation that it seemed simply colossal in its opportunities, its possibilities and its needs. The sermon was both an inspiration and a benediction and the tender charm of the man abides. The offering was not quite what we had hoped, $350, but this we hope to increase somewhat now, and even larger financial returns must be our yields on the to-morrow.

In the evening of this same day the church gave a farewell reception to Bro F. E. Meigs and family. The Sixth and Prospect has now become one of our "Living Link" churches, and Bro. Meigs is our chosen representative. Brief talks were made by the representatives of our various church organizations and then in an informal personal way our brother spoke of his work in Nankin, expressing most cordial appreciation of the warmth of welcome extended him and the cordial "God speed" of our people. At the close of the talk, in which reference had been made to a printing press he hoped to take back with him to China, an ever generous brother subscribed $100 to this fund. With the tender hopes and loves of "God be with you till we meet again," and a tear in the eye at the parting time the "good-bye" was spoken. Regret was everywhere expressed over the unavoidable absence of Sister Meigs, but we were glad to have their little daughter with us. Beyond all question this new relation can but bind this noble church the closer to our great missionary interests, and strength, too, must come to Bro. Meigs as he shall know in the coming years that he is specially remembered in our thoughts and prayers.

There is no space left to tell of Bro. R. L. McHatton's work in our city and his successful meetings at the Springfield Avenue and the West Side Churches. Bro. McHatton needs no eulogy. Ozone is in his matter, the gospel is in his message, the Christ is in his heart God bless him and speed him ever. Kansas City is now "home" to him and his.

Southwest Missouri Institute.

The annual gathering of the preachers of southwest Missouri in institute work was with the Neosho congregation, May 7. About fifty delegates were enrolled.

The papers read in the institute were without exception first class. The reviews and the discussions were vigorous, well timed and instructive, and while the discussions revealed the different types of mind and the differences of opinion along unrevealed lines, there was perfect unity on revealed things, and a loyalty to the word of God that was both healthy and inspiring.

The preachers were not indifferent to the theological problems of the present day, as the query box showed. Bro. J. B. Briney, of Moberly, Mo., for the first time made his appearance at the sessions of our institute, and at our request, conducted the query box. His clear insight into the Word of God afforded us much light and consolation.

In executive session we heard the report of the committee on credentials, and as press correspondent of the institute, I was requested to say in reference to one M. E. Doane, who is constantly imposing himself on the congregations of this district, that he is utterly unworthy of your confidence or help He has no membership in any congregation, and is unworthy a place in our ranks as a minister.

Two other cases were taken up, but the evidence of their immorality was not complete and the matter was referred to the corresponding secretary of our state mission board, who will report at our district convention to be held at Lebanon in October next.

Bro. Moore, of Springfield, was prevented from attending by sickness in his brother's family at Fayetteville.

Many new faces were seen and a number of young preachers were present and took part in the services.

Officers for next year were W. F. Turner, president; M. J. Nicoson, vice-president, and A. L. McQuary, secretary.

The next institute will be held at Springfield, beginning May 5, 1902.

Several preachers of the denominations were present and took part with us.

A great many women are subject to spells of dizziness, spots before the eyes, and a ringing noise in the head. These symptoms are commonly associated with liver "trouble" as the result of a diseased condition of the stomach and other organs of digestion and nutrition.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures diseases of the stomach and the allied organs of digestion and nutrition. It cures through the stomach diseases seemingly remote from that organ, but which have their origin in a diseased condition of the stomach and digestive and nutritive system. Hence, cures of heart, lungs, liver, kidneys, and other organs are constantly effected by the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery.

There is no alcohol in the "Discovery" and it is free from opium, cocaine, and all other narcotics.

Some dealers may offer a substitute as "just as good" as Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. There's more profit in substitutes for the dealer. There's more health in the "Discovery" for you. Don't be imposed on.

"It is with the greatest pleasure I write you the benefit my mother has received from your 'Golden Medical Discovery,'" says Miss Carrie Johnson, of Lowesville, Amherst Co., Virginia. She suffered untold misery with uterine disease and nervousness, and had a constant roaring and ringing noise in her head. After taking six bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery she was entirely cured."

When a laxative is required use Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets.

A Prophetic Day.

"Fair are the flowers and the children
But their subtle suggestion is fairer."

Children's Day for foreign missions among the Disciples of Christ in the first year of the twentieth century should be and doubtless will be a great and happy day. It should yield easily the $50,000 asked by our secretaries of foreign missions. June weather, June flowers and the voices and faces of fresh, unsoiled and fragrant childhood as they sing and smile among the roses should make the heart of the church young again if only for a day. But especially and more than all else it should be and will be a day of prophecy. It will speak to us in its own uniquely beautiful speech of the future—our own not only but the world's also. And like all truest prophecy it will work immediately and mightily for its own fulfillment.

It will predict and help to make a more loyal church. It will help to displace the trifling and the frivolous in the church with the large and serious interest of a world's redemption. It will help to exorcise from her the twin demons of worldliness and covetousness. It will help to teach her the heroism of regular, persistent self-denial. And from her heroic loyalty all far away men and nations shall get richest profits of wisdom and love.

Let us get ready with painstaking care for the children's great day. Let us let them know that we all count it a great day. Then shall we all sit down on the 2nd of June in our churches with a great joy in our hearts to hear the day's sweet prophetic undertone saying, "These little ones shall be pillars in a wider church—living stones in holier altars than you and I have yet known"

A Church Has a Conscience.

I mean that a church feels an obligation and discharges it after this fashion, as explained in the following letter.

"WELLINGTON, NEW ZEALAND,
February 23, 1901.

"DEAR BRO. CARR:—I am sending you herewith a money order drawn in your favor for seven pounds, and ten shillings for the following reasons: Many years ago when you took so much trouble to procure for the church here a preacher to succeed Bro. Maston, you were put to the expense of about five pounds, and it was fully intended that you should be recompensed for this outlay at the time, but as the church was not in funds then, and as we have had several treasurers since I am much afraid the money has never been remitted to you. I have gone through the treasurer's cash book and can find no entry of a refund to you, so putting one thing and another together I feel convinced the money has never been sent to you; I now send you the amount due with two pounds for interest. I am extremely sorry that the matter should have been lost sight of so long, for I assure you the church appreciated your effort in procuring Bro. Floyd for us at the time. Trusting that this may reach you in due course, and hoping that you and Sister Carr are well and happy in your work, believe me, fraternally,

GEO. GRAY."

I never dreamed of receiving remuneration or any return for outlay; nor did I regard anything that I did for the church at Wellington as a debt; hence the above letter was a complete surprise. I carried it around in my pocket, I showed it to my friends, I let the editor of our daily paper see it. He borrowed it to look at over night. He regarded it as a curiosity; and the next day his paper came out with great, flaming head lines: "A CHURCH PAYS A DEBT." "O. A. CARR RECEIVES A MONEY ORDER FROM NEW ZEALAND," etc. I read the letter to the students of Carr-Burdette College, and asked each young lady to write an answer to it and tell what she thought I ought to do with the money. They differed so much that I concluded to let Mrs. Carr decide the matter, and she said: "Expend it on the library of Carr Burdette College, that it may be a permanent blessing to all who may come here." So may it be.

I showed the letter to preachers and they said: "You ought to send that letter to our papers." They tried to make an a fortiori argument out of the simple facts, which ran thus: "If the church away off in New Zealand does that way what ought the churches here in this country to do?"

I send the letter for publication because it shows how the church not only in New Zealand, but throughout the colonies, regards an obligation. It is not simply an obligation, for that letter has "insides to it," as Dr. Pinkerton used to say. It is not simply debt paid; but it is grace and generosity. It has heart in it. Character, correct principle, trustworthiness are revealed in it The church at Wellington sets a good example to all churches that would be honest and live godly. (Excuse the implication.) Well, I was just thinking what a relief it would be to the poor preachers in this country if they could always receive what is due them. If every church had a good, tender conscience and appreciated what may be done by the preacher, like the church in Wellington, how happy it would be—happy all around—happy people, happy preachers. Bro. Gray's letter is placed in the archives of the college as a memento.

Sowing and Reaping.

The following is an extract from a sermon by Dr. Albert Buxton, preached at Norfolk, Va., and printed in the Virginia Pilot. Text Gen. 1:11; Gal. 6:7, 8:

This is the law of our bodies—flesh or brain. Sow gluttony, intemperance, indolence and lust; garner disease, delirium and the hut of the lazy sot. Plant in your lives self-control, industry and purity, and your garden shall blossom in health and bear fruit of honored competence. The law of inverse satisfaction holds true. In proportion as you forge the chains of appetite, until you cannot resist indulgence, the less with each enforced indulgence shall be resulting enjoyment. A terrible law this.

So in mind. Sow listlessness and wasted hours, and you reap a vacillating will and an impoverished mind. The men who have shook our nation with their wealth of brain or strength of will are they who have sowed industry and ambitious struggles in their youth. The young men who loaf in our hotel corridors, with cuffs on their necks in place of collars, and with hair parted to imitate their little sisters, will be the hod-carriers of mature life.

"Do men gather figs of thistles, or grapes of thorns?" Sow the brambles of discontented flippancy, and your vintage shall not be the grapes of honored achievement. Plant deep the burrs of youthful indiscretion and yours shall not be the fig harvest of health and power. No; you shall gather, while successful companions are bearing rich fruit with their song of harvest home, disease, tormenting thirst, the hospital, the pauper's home, the charnel house.

In the rich soil of the brain, sow a thought, and you shall reap an act. In the garden of your life sow an act, you shall reap a habit. In the furrows of your soul, sow a habit, you shall reap a character. Sow on earth a character, in the judgment harvest you shall reap a destiny.

Beyond your to-day stands a to morrow of your making; beyond this year stands the next year of your shaping. Stretching forever beyond this life stands, subject to your fashioning, your eternity.

The Young Man From Middlefield, by Mrs Jessie Brown Pounds, which ran as a Serial in OUR YOUNG FOLKS during the first half of the year 1900, has been issued in book form, making a handsome volume of nearly three hundred pages. It was read with absorbing interest by a multitude of young people as it appeared from week to week in the columns of this journal, and many of them, we doubt not, will be glad of an opportunity to obtain a copy in this more convenient form. It should find a place in every Sunday-school, Endeavor and Family library. Price, in fine cloth, $1.00 per copy, postpaid. Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis.

Cotner University.

Cotner University aims to secure, during 1901-1902, "$25,000 endowment and 350 students." This may seem small to our older schools but after all the discouragements Cotner has had to encounter this means progress.

Cotner now has two agents in the field, H. G. Wilkinson, financial secretary, and Prof. Wm. M. Reeves who has just been sent out for a special campaign before commencement. The raising of endowment is being pushed by two plans: Endowment Notes, for a term of years, bearing interest, which will go in the end to the permanent endowment, and Endowment Pledges, the interest on which is to be paid for an indefinite term of years unless the pledge is recalled by the subscriber. In the last fortnight over $3,000 has been pledged by these two methods.

Commencement day is June 12. Five students expect to take the degree of A. B. and two to receive certificates in English Bible Department. The address for the day will be given by the Hon. E J. Burkett, Congressman from this district. A feature of the Alumni program will be the speech by J. H. Bicknell, '93, pastor of the church at Liverpool, England.

This has been on the whole a prosperous year for Cotner. The new Dental Department opened last year has prospered and this year is organized as one of the independent colleges of the University. Kushi Kumamoto, its first graduate, returns to his native country, Japan, to practice his profession. The Medical College more than doubled its enrollment this year and sent out twelve graduates. The total enrollment of the University for the year in all departments has been 230, an increase of 35 per cent. over last year.

The members of the new board of trustees under the able leadership of their president, Thomas Rawlings, of Wakefield, are manifesting great interest in the institution and are already maturing plans for its future business management.

President Aylsworth was called away a few days ago by the sad news of the death of his father. This was not entirely unexpected as the president went to his bedside last fall realizing that he might pass away at any time.

The university was recently favored with a lecture by Prof. Ott, of Drake University.

Although Lincoln is better supplied with universities, colleges and other educational institutions generally than any other city west of Chicago, Cotner is the only school of the Disciples in this whole vast region west of the Missouri river from North Dakota to Texas. When this great field is considered and the work that Cotner has been able to do in spite of being hampered by financial conditions and hard times since it was first opened in 1889, the hope grows stronger that the brotherhood may realize the need of the hour and give from their abundance to equip this school and build it up for greater usefulness. Nebraska is a young state which cannot do everything at once. The Disciples here cannot make this school what the state really needs without outside help. The appeal is sent forth not only to the rich who can afford to give large sums without sacrificing, but also to those who must needs sacrifice if they help on this school.

SHEM A STORY OF THE CAPTIVITY

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

This is the latest work issued from the press of the Christian Publishing Company. The author is already known as a writer of rare power. His books, "King Saul," "In the Days of Jehu," and "The Fear and Dread of Kings" have been favorably received, and have won him an enviable reputation, which will be greatly enhanced by this new volume.

"Shem" is a story which, in plot and sustained interest, ranks with the best modern fiction. It deals with an interesting period of Biblical history—the days of King Zedekiah and the Babylonian invasion, throwing a flood of light on the relation between the Jews and Egypt on the one hand, and the Babylonian Empire on the other. The old story of human love triumphing over obstacles is told in a way to hold the reader's interest to the end.

"Shem" is a volume of 299 pages, neatly printed and bound. Price, FIFTY CTS.

GOSPEL MELODIES

REVISED AND ENLARGED.

First Lines of Some of the Best Songs in this Excellent Book

Praise Him! Praise Him!
I love to steal awhile away.
Delay not, Delay not.
Softly and tenderly.
If God has riches given you.
Oh, I want to be still nearer.
Where the billows roll the highest.
There is a land beyond somewhere.
Oh, would to me were only given.
The Bible reveals a glorious land.
The voice of the Savior says come.
The path is set with many a thorn.
Oh, the love of God to me.
List to the song of the reapers.
Night with ebon pinion.
In the presence of our God we meet again.
Preaching Jesus on the way.
I ask not earthly treasure.
Oh, bless the Lord, Oh my soul.
There'll be room enough in heaven.
I am going to Jesus.
Broad is the road that leads to death.
There is a home, a beautiful home.
Attend young friends while I relate.
Peacefully lay her down to rest.
In thy name, Oh, Lord, assembling.
Toiling for Jesus day by day.
How sweet 'tis to know.
When our earthly life is ended.
Just beyond the shad'wy valley.
The Lord's our Rock, in Him we hide
Far beyond the rolling Jordan.
Lead me gently home, Father.
How firm a foundation.
Go on, you pilgrims.
Oh, how lovely! (Anthem.)
List to the voice of the Savior.
In our Father's home above.
There is one thought that cheers my way.
Make channels for the streams of love.
I've found a friend in Jesus.
It is the hour of prayer.
When storm-clouds arise in the sky.
I wonder if any poor sinner will come.
Oh, the wondrous love of Jesus.
See the ranks of sin approaching
A thousand lords had gathered in the palace of Belshazzar.
Glory and praise to the Lord who died for me
See! on the cross, the Savior bleeds.
There's a city of light 'mid the stars, we are told.
Just over the river are palaces grand.
Christians, are you growing weary?
There is a rock in a weary land.
O pilgrims, look forward to glory.
When the day is full of gladness.
There is a precious fountain.
Beyond the golden sunset sky.
Do you know a soul that's fainting?
Yes, we have a friend in Jesus.
Come now and let us reason.
When the waves are rolling high.
There is a house not made with hands.
Gone from our home.
I am on my journey to Canaan's happy land.
In thy temple, Lord, we gather.
Christ is knocking at my sad heart.
Let me sing the old song o'er again.
I will tell you an old simple story.
I'll rejoice in the love of Jesus.
There's a beautiful land far beyond the sky.
There's a hand ever ready to lift up all the fallen.
All for Jesus, all for Jesus.
There's a city that is far, far away.
When the trump of God shall sound.
Where are the ones we love fondly?
Teach me thy way.
God of our salvation.
Oh, there is joy in believing.
Praise Him, praise the name of God most high (Anthem.)
Great is the Lord. (Anthem.)
One sweetly solemn thought.
Make a joyful noise unto the Lord. (Anthem.)
Hear the call to labor for the Lord.
Savior while my heart is tender.
Of the old time I'm thinking.
Twilight is stealing.
At home or away, in the alley or street
Mother, tell me of the angels.

GOSPEL MELODIES contains several good easy anthems that will please choirs and singing societies. It is the only church music book of its class that does.

CALIFORNIA.

Capay, May 14.—During a week's meeting in Capay, Cal., a dead church was resurrected—dead about five years. Organized a Sunday school of 30 members; raised money for the employment of a preacher and secured the services of George Meeker, of Berkeley, for regular Sunday afternoon meetings.—G. A. RAGAN.

COLORADO.

Florence, May 15.—H. A. Davis, our state evangelist, closed a successful meeting with our church last night. The meetings were held two weeks, with 12 confessions and three additions otherwise.—DAVID LYON.

Wray, Mar. 12.—I began a meeting in the Methodist house April 21, and closed May 5. An organization composed of 32 members was effected, with F. M. Sisson and S. S. Cottingham as elders; Otto Derr and E. B. Remington as deacons, and Mrs. A. G. Sechrist and Mrs. Myrtle Derr, deaconnesses. Twenty four of these were scattered disciples, one from the Baptists, one from the M. E.'s and six by confession and baptism. There are 40 or 50 others in and about Wray who were formerly Disciples who may soon be reached. Then there are about 15 Disciples who have gone into the other churches, who will eventually come home, but not until the Church of Christ has become thoroughly established in that community. The outlook for a good, strong and effective church at Wray is splendid. Steps are being taken toward the erection of a church building. I shall visit them again soon to aid them in perfecting their plans. Services will be held temporarily in the Advent house every Lord's day, with preaching once or twice per month. Mrs. Lucas has been very ill for 12 weeks; is apparently slightly improved, but only temporarily.—J. P. LUCAS, Colorado City.

FLORIDA.

Hampton, May 16.—The church at New River, Fla., has been dead for two or three years. I closed a meeting May 10 with 31 additions.—W. E. DAUGERTY.

ILLINOIS.

Arcola, May 15.—Our home missionary offering is more than four times what it was last year, while the foreign was a gain of 40 per cent. over last year. The G. A. R. have invited me to deliver the sermon memorial Sunday. Three added to the church here recently; one by letter and two by baptism.—L. T. FAULDERS.

Decatur, May 20.—Six added to the Edward Street Church here yesterday by letter. The outlook for our work here is encouraging. We are having a good hearing and our people are enthusiastic in their work.—F. W. BURNHAM.

Jacksonville, May 20.—There were 11 additions here yesterday, eight of them were confessions. There were three additions the Sunday before, two of which were by confession. Our pastor, Geo. L. Snively, is doing the preaching.—J. W. BROCKMAN.

Normal, May 20.—Four added yesterday.—E. B. BARNES.

Saybrook, May 15.—Five additions by letter since last report. I preached the baccalaureate sermon for our high school May 12. Will preach at Woodbine, Ia., May 19 and 26, and will deliver Decoration Day address, May 30. W. H. Boles gave 15 lectures here in our opera house closing May 5. Seventy-four signed a pledge and vote only for candidates pledged to oppose the liquor traffic. Any community desiring a campaign of this sort will do well to secure Bro. Boles.—T. A. LINDENMEYER.

INDIANA.

Bedford, May 18.—S. M. Martin and James Hawes have been with us 12 days with 34 added. Meeting continues with great audiences and interest.—JAS. SMALL.

Madison, May 20.—Four additions here yesterday; two by confession, one from Methodists and one by letter. This makes 28 since coming here the first of the year. Attendance increasing at every service.—J. MURRAY TAYLOR, minister.

Wabash, May 17.—After the dedication of the new house at Albia, Ia., I remained a few days to assist in closing up the business. During the nights of my stay there were six baptisms and three others confessed Christ the last night. One also united from the Baptists, making ten added to the church. I would have been glad to have continued the meeting had not another engagement prevented.—L. L. CARPENTER.

IOWA.

Bedford, May 17.—Eight added last Lord's day. Two the Lord's day previous.—J. WILL WALTERS.

Waterloo, May 14.—One confession Sunday morning.—JOE S. RILEY.

MISSOURI.

Carl Junction, May 13.—I am now at Carl Junction. We have 30 or 40 members here, disorganized and without a house, but I think this meeting will result in a church and house.—JOS. GAYLOR.

Carrollton, May 16.—Three confessions last Sunday and four confessions last night at prayer-meeting.—E. H. KELLAR.

Clarksville, May 14.—We have just closed a two weeks' meeting, conducted by our pastor, J. P. Myers, which resulted in 59 additions. This is one of the most successful meetings known in the history of this church. Bro. Myers was assisted by J. Walter Wilson, the singing evangelist of Indianapolis, whose illustrated songs and solos greatly added to the interest. All departments of church work are steadily growing. At the close of the meeting Bro. Wilson gave his lecture with 160 colored views illustrating Sheldon's "In His Steps."—MOLLIE S. WIRICK AND J. HENRY WELLS.

Farmington.—I begin here with bright prospects. One added yesterday. We are building a house at Elvins and hope to have it finished soon. Elvins is in the mining district of our county, where 15,000 people live, and we have no house of worship.—R. M. TALBERT.

Mound City, May 15.—At a six days' meeting held by the writer with the church at Maitland, nine were added by faith and obedience and one from the Baptists.—GEO L. PETERS.

Harris, May 5.—One confession at regular services, a returned soldier boy from the Spanish-American war.—R. W. BLUNT.

Huntsville, May 20.—One addition at regular service yesterday morning by confession.—L. S. CUPP.

Kirksville, May 16.—We had seven additions to the church here last Sunday, and two at prayer-meeting last night.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Mexico, May 20.—Offering for Home Missions yesterday reached $70, may yet reach $75. My third week with the Mexico church, and am pleased with the offering and the people and the work. The church bravely took the offerings for state and foreign missions without a pastor.—A. W. KOKENDOFFER.

Monroe City, May 20.—The annual missionary rally held in this church yesterday was a splendid success. The offering went beyond that of any previous year in the history of the Monroe City church. Something over $301 was raised, which has been disbursed as follows: $80, home board; $45, foreign board; $35, state board; $25, church extension; $25, Bible-school work; $30, orphans' home; $10, Jacksonville church; $5, special charity; $20, ministerial relief. The $10 for Jacksonville church is to be turned over to them when they have united and formed one church. This offering is remarkable because of unusual expense in the

BRAIN FOOD.

Is of Little Benefit Unless it is Digested.

Nearly everyone will admit that as a nation we eat too much meat and too little of vegetables and the grains.

For business men, office men and clerks, and in fact everyone engaged in sedentary or indoor occupations, grains, milk and vegetables are much more healthful.

Only men engaged in a severe outdoor manual labor can live on a heavy meat diet and continue in health.

As a general rule, meat once a day is sufficient for all classes of men, women and children, and grains, fruit and vegetables should constitute the bulk of food eaten.

But many of the most nutritious foods are difficult of digestion, and it is of no use to advise brain workers to eat largely of grains and vegetables where the digestion is too weak to assimilate them properly.

It is always best to get the best results from our food, that some simple and harmless digestive should be taken after meals to assist the relaxed digestive organs, and several years' experience have proven Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets to be a very safe, pleasant and effective digestive and a remedy which may be taken daily with the best results.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets can hardly be called a patent medicine, as they do not act on the bowels nor any particular organ, but only on the food eaten. They supply what weak stomachs lack, pepsin diastase, and by stimulating the gastric glands increase the natural secretion of hydrochloric acid.

People who make a daily practice of taking one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after each meal are sure to have perfect digestion, which means perfect health.

There is no danger of forming an injurious habit, as the tablets contain absolutely nothing but natural digestives; cocaine, morphine and similar drugs have no place in a stomach medicine, and Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are certainly the best known and most popular of all stomach remedies.

Ask your druggist for a fifty cent package of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and after a week's use note the improvement in health, appetite and nervous energy.

way of improvements at home, pipe organ, etc.—R. B. BRINEY.

Nevada, May 20.—Two additions at Walker yesterday. Will observe children's day with elaborate services.—S. MAGEE.

Salem, May 20 —I closed my work here last night with a fine audience and good interest. Three baptisms and one confession at last night's service. No man has been secured for the work here as yet. It is a promising field. My first work in the field is Leon, Kan.—E. E. DAVIDSON.

Springfield, May 15.—Recently closed a short meeting at Ash Grove, six baptisms, three added by letter. Prof. Roberts, of Springfield High School, is doing good work as regular preacher at Ash Grove. One added by commendation prayer-meeting night to the First Church.—E. W. BOWERS.

St. Louis, May 14.—One accession to the Ellendale church Sunday.—L. B. COGGINS, pastor.

Villa Ridge, May 13.—The new Christian Church here was formally set apart to God's service on Sunday, May 12, by Evangelist R. B. Havener, assisted by the writer. A large audience was present and everything passed off nicely. An indebtedness of $84 remained to be provided for, and $115 was secured at the morning service. The building cost $1,200, and is a neat, well appointed house of worship. It was built under great discouragement. To the Bible school Board and Bro. R B Havener, who started the work, much praise is due. The writer follows with a meeting.—G. E. JONES.

Warrensburg, May 20.—One addition at Lee's Summit yesterday; four since last report; also one at Osceola.—KING STARK.

Wheatland.—It is taking a great deal of patience and hard labor to get the work started in this county, but the three churches that I am laboring for are taking on new life since the small-pox is over. I have additions at my regular appointments. Will have one baptism next Sunday.—I. JONES.

OHIO.

Greenfield, May 13.—Evangelist D. W. Besaw, of Cleveland, just closed a four weeks' meeting here last evening with 19 additions; 15 by baptism, 2 by statement, and 2 by letter. The work prospers.—CLYDE V. CALLAHAN, minister.

OKLAHOMA.

Oklahoma City, May 15.—There were seven added to the congregation here last Sunday. Five by confession and two by letter. Sixty-five have been added since we commenced work here in February. The work is prospering in every way, This seems a Missouri church. We have some of the best workers we have known in our Missouri churches. There is room for more. It is a good place. Just come on.—S. D. DUTCHER.

TEXAS.

Manor, May 17.—I am closing the first year of my second pastorate with the church here. This has been a fruitful year in every respect. Since January we have remodeled our house at a cost of about $500; raised more than 25 per cent. over our apportionment for foreign missions, and will do as well for the home field. Will christen our new baptistry next Sunday by baptizing two who made the confession sometime before. We closed on May 5, the best C. E. convention in the history of the district.—W. H. TROINUM.

Marfa, May 16.—Our two weeks' meeting, conducted by J. W. Marshall, resulted in 22 additions, 15 by baptism. The audiences and the number of additions were the largest ever had at Marfa.—T. D. SECREST.

San Antonio, May 13.—Wilson and Huston meeting still continues. 113 additions to date, 18 yesterday. They go to Waxichachie next.—JAY E. ADAMS.

A GREAT BOOK FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

The Young Man from Middlefield

By MRS. JESSIE BROWN POUNDS

THIS ENTRANCING STORY of twenty-six chapters ran as a serial in the columns of OUR YOUNG FOLKS during the first half of the year 1900, and was followed with absorbing and ever-increasing interest by the many thousands of readers of that weekly journal. It relates, in the popular author's most charming style, the trials and triumphs of a plain young man from the country, who left his father's farm and went to the great city to fill a position in the lumber yard of his uncle. In his new surroundings he came into contact with a variety of people, every way different from the plain, honest country folks with whom he had formerly associated; but in the midst of his new surroundings, with their many temptations, he maintained his Christian integrity and lived up to the motto he had adopted, to "Make Christ First in Everything."

His good influence soon began to be felt in his uncle's family, among his fellow-workmen, and most of all among the young Christian Endeavorers with whom he associated, whose society was in due time revolutionized.

EVERY YOUNG PERSON should read this charming volume, and it should at once find a place in every Christian Endeavor and Sunday-school Library.

SIZE AND PRICE.—One handsome volume of 257 pages, beautifully printed and substantially bound in cloth, price 75 cents per copy, prepaid.

SHEM A STORY OF THE CAPTIVITY

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

This is the latest work issued from the press of the Christian Publishing Company. The author is already known as a writer of rare power. His books, "King Saul," "In the Days of Jehu," and "The Fear and Dread of Kings" have been favorably received, and have won him an enviable reputation, which will be greatly enhanced by this new volume.

"Shem" is a story which, in plot and sustained interest, ranks with the best modern fiction. It deals with an interesting period of Biblical history—the days of King Zedekiah and the Babylonian invasion, throwing a flood of light on the relation between the Jews and Egypt on the one hand, and the Babylonian Empire on the other. The old story of human love triumphing over obstacles is told in a way to hold the reader's interest to the end.

"Shem" is a volume of 299 pages, neatly printed and bound. Price, FIFTY CTS.

The Eternal Goodness.

[In response to the request of one of our readers for reference to a certain poem, Fannie M. Craven, of Wichita, Kan., has been kind enough to look it up and send it to us in full. It can be found in any complete edition of Whittier's poems, but is worth printing here in full.]

O Friends! with whom my feet have trod
The quiet aisles of prayer,
Glad witness to your zeal for God
And love of man I bear.

I trace your lines of argument;
Your logic linked and strong,
I weigh as one who dreads dissent,
And fears a doubt as wrong.

But still my human hands are weak
To hold your iron creeds:
Against the words ye bid me speak
My heart within me pleads.

Who fathoms the Eternal Thought?
Who talks of scheme and plan?
The Lord is God! He needeth not
The poor device of man.

I walk with bare, hushed feet the ground
Ye tread with boldness shod;
I dare not fix with mete and bound
The love and power of God.

Ye praise His justice; even such
His pitying love I deem:
Ye seek a king; I fain would touch
The robe that hath no seam.

Ye see the curse which overbroods
A world of pain and loss;
I hear our Lord's beatitudes
And prayer on the cross.

More than your schoolmen teach, within Myself, alas! I know;
Too dark ye cannot paint the sin,
Too small the merit show.

I bow my forehead to the dust,
I veil mine eyes for shame,
And urge, in trembling self-distrust,
A prayer without a claim.

I see the wrong that round me lies,
I feel the guilt within;
I hear, with groan and travail cries,
The world confess its sin.

Yet, in the maddening maze of things,
And tossed by storm and flood,
To one fixed stake my spirit clings;
I know that God is good!

Not mine to look where cherubim
And seraphs may not see,
But nothing can be good in Him
Which evil is in me.

The wrong that pains my soul below
I dare not throne above;
I know not of his hate,—I know
His goodness and His love.

I dimly guess from blessings known
Of greater out of sight,
And with the chastened Psalmist, own
His judgments too are right.

I long for household voices gone,
For vanished smiles I long,
But God hath led my dear ones on,
And He can do no wrong.

I know not what the future hath
Of marvel or surprise,
Assured alone that life and death
